First. Which these great commandments are, ver. 37—39: not the judicial law; those could not be the greatest, now the people of the Jews, to whom they pertained, were so little; not the ceremonial laws; those could not be the greatest, now they were waxen old, and were ready to vanish away; nor any particular moral precept; but the love of God and our neighbour, which are the spring and foundation of all the rest, which (these being supposed) will follow of course. 1. "All the law is fulfilled in one word," and that is "love," see Rom. xiii. 10; all obedience begins in the affections; and nothing in religion is done right that is not done there first. Love is the leading affection, which gives law and gives ground to the rest; and therefore that, as the main fort, is to be first secured, and garrisoned for God. Man is a creature cut out for love; thus therefore is the law "written in the heart," that it is a law of love. Love is a short and sweet word; and if that be the fulfilling of the law, surely the yoke of the command is very easy. Love is the rest and satisfaction of the soul: if we walk in this good old way, we shall find rest. 2. The "love of God is the first and great commandment of all;" and the summary of all the commands of the first table. The proper act of love being complacency, good is the proper object of it. Now God being good, infinitely, originally, and eternally, he is to be loved in the first place, and nothing loved beside him but what is loved for him. Love is the first and great thing that God demands from us, and therefore the first and great thing that we should devote to him.

Now here we are directed, 1st. To love God as ours. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God" as thine. The first commandment is, "Thou shalt have no other God;" which implies, that we must have him for our God; and that will engage our love to him: those that made the sun and moon their gods, loved them, Jer. lvi. 2; Jud. xviii. 24. To love God as ours, is to love him because he is ours; our creator, owner, and ruler; and carry ourselves to him as ours, with obedience to him; and dependence on him. We must love God as reconciled to us, and made ours by covenant; that is the foundation of this, "thy God." 2nd. To love him "with all our heart, and soul, and mind." Some make these to signify one and the same thing: "love him with all thy powers;" others distinguish them: the heart, soul, and mind, are the will, affections, and understanding, or the vital, sensitive, and intellectual faculties. Our love of God must be a sincere love; and not in word and tongue only, as theirs is, who say they love him, but their hearts are not with him. It must be a strong love; we must love him in the most intense degree; as we must praise him, so we must love him with all that is within us, Ps. ciii. 1. It must be a singular and superlative love; we must love him more than any thing else; this way the stream of our affections must entirely run. The heart must be united to love God, in opposition to a divided heart. All our love is too little to bestow upon him; and therefore all the powers of the soul must be engaged for him, and carried out towards him. "This is the first and great commandment;" for obedience to this is the spring of obedience to all the rest; which is then only acceptable when it flows from love. 3rd. To love our neighbour as ourselves, is the second great commandment, ver. 39. It is like unto that first; it is inclusive of all the precepts of the second table, as that is of the first. It is like it, for it is founded upon it, and flows from it; and a right love to our brother, whom we have seen, is both an instance and an evidence of our love to God, whom we have not seen, 1 Jno. iv. 20. First. It is implied that we do and should love ourselves; there is a self-love which is corrupt, and the root of the greatest sins; and it must be put off and mortified; but there is a self-love which is natural, and the rule of the greatest duty; and it must be preserved and sanctified. We must love ourselves, that is, we must have a due regard to the dignity of our own natures, and a due concern for the welfare of our own souls and bodies. Secondly. It is prescribed, that we "love our neighbour as ourselves." We must honour and esteem all men, and must wrong and injure none; must have a good will to all, and good wishes for all, and, as we have opportunity, must do good for all. We must love our neighbour as ourselves, as truly and sincerely as we love ourselves, and in the same instances; nay, in many cases we must deny ourselves for the good of our neighbour; and must make ourselves servants to the true welfare of others; and be willing to spend and be spent for them; to lay down our lives for the brethren.

Secondly. Observe what the weight and greatness of these commandments is, ver. 40: "On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets;" that is, this is the sum and substance of all those precepts relating to practical religion which were written in men's heart by nature, revived by Moses, and backed and enforced by the preaching and writing of the prophets. All hang upon the law of love; take away this, and all falls to the ground, and comes to nothing. Rituals and ceremonials must way give to these, as must all spiritual gifts, for love is the "more excellent way." This is the spirit of the law, which animates it; the cement of the law, which joins it; it is the root and spring of all other duties; the compendium of the whole Bible; not only of the law and the prophets, but the Gospel too; only supposing this love to be the fruit of faith, and that we love God in Christ, and our neighbour for his sake. All hangs on these two commandments, as the effect doth, both on its efficient and on its final cause; for the fulfilling of the law is love, Rom. xiii. 10; and the end of the law is love, 1 Tim. i. 5; the law of love is the nail—is the nail in the sure place, fastened by the masters of assemblies, Eccl. xii. 11—on which is hung all the glory of the law and the prophets, Isa. xxii. 24; a nail that shall never be drawn; for on this nail all the glory of the New Jerusalem shall eternally hang. Love never faileth. Into these great commandments, therefore, let our hearts be delivered, as into a of them, but it is evident that as a whole they do not come before Jesus until verse 41. The question put by the lawyer was one of a class about which the thoughts of the Pharisees were occupied. They wanted to settle some nice and delicate distinction, and were more concerned about their theological hair-splittings than about the hearty service of the living God. The Pharisees of all ages are wonderfully alike, caring more for rites and definitions than for true holiness.

xxii. 37—39. It has been said that the two great commandments ould; in the defence and evidence of these let us spend our zeal, and not in notions, names, and strifes of words; as if those were the mighty things on which the law and the prophets hung, and to them the love of God and our neighbour must be sacrificed; but to the commanding power of these let every thing else be made to truck.

41 While the Pharisees were gathered together, Jesus asked them, 42 Saying, What think ye of Christ? whose son is he? They say unto him, The son of David. 43 He saith unto them, How then doth David in spirit call him Lord, saying, 44 The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand, till I make thine enemies thy footstool? 45 If David then call him Lord, how is he his son? 46 And no man was able to answer him a word, neither durst any man from that day forth ask him any more questions.

Many questions the Pharisees had asked Christ, by which, though they thought to pose him, they did but expose themselves. But now let him ask them a question, and he will do it when they are gathered together, ver. 41. He did not take some one of them apart from the rest; ne Hercules contra duos,—Hercules himself may be overmatched; but to shame them the more, he took them all together, when they were in confederacy and consult against him, and yet puzzled them. Note, God delights to baffle his enemies, when they most strengthen themselves; gives them all the advantages they can wish for, and yet conquers them. Associate yourselves, and you shall be broken in pieces, Isa. iii. 3, 9, 10. Now here,

1. Christ proposeth a question to them, which they could easily answer: it was a question in their own Catechism: "What think ye of Christ? whose son is he?" "Whose son do you expect the Messiah to be, who was promised to the fathers?" This they could easily answer, "The son of David." It was the common periphrasis of the Messiah, they called him the son of David. So the scribes, who expounded the Scripture, had taught them from Ps. lxxxix. 35, 36, "I will not lie unto David; his seed shall endure for ever;" Isa. ix. 7, "upon the throne of David;" and Isa. xi. 1, "A rod out of the stem of Jesse." The covenant of royalty made with David was a figure of the covenant of redemption made with Christ; who, as David, was made king with an oath, and was first humbled and then advanced. If Christ was the son of David, he was really and truly man; Israel said, "We have ten parts in David," and Judah said, "He is our bone and our flesh;" what part have we then in the son of David, who took our nature upon him? "What think ye of the Christ?" They had put questions to him, one after another, out of the law; but he comes and puts a question to them upon the promise. Many are so full of the law, that they forget Christ, as if their duties would save them, without his merit and grace. It concerns each of us seriously to ask ourselves, What think we of Christ? Some think not of him at all: he is not in all, not in any of their thoughts: some think meanly, and some think hardly of him; but "to them that believe he is precious;" and how precious then are the thoughts of him! While the daughters of Jerusalem think no more of Christ than of another beloved, the spouse thinks of him as the chief of ten thousands.

11. He starts a difficulty upon their answer, which they could not so easily solve, ver. 43—45. Many can so readily affirm the truth, that they think they have knowledge enough to be proud of, who when they are called to confirm the truth, and to vindicate and defend it, shew they have ignorance enough to be ashamed of. The objection Christ raised was, "if Christ be David's son, how then doth David in spirit call him Lord?" He did not hereby design to ensnare them, as they did him; but to instruct them in a truth they were loath to believe, that the expected Messiah is God.

First. It is easy to see that David calls Christ Lord, and this in spirit, being divinely inspired, and acted therein by a spirit of prophecy; for it was the Spirit of the Lord that spake by him, 2 Sam. xxiii. 1, 2. David was one of those holy men that spake as he was moved by the Holy Ghost, especially in calling Christ Lord; for it was then, as it is still, 1 Cor. xii. 3, that no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost. Now to prove that David in spirit called Christ Lord, he quotes Ps. cx. 1; which Psalm the scribes themselves understood of Christ; of him it is certain the prophet there speaks; of him, and of no other man. And it is a prophetic summary of the doctrine of Christ: it describes him executing the offices of a prophet, priest, and king, both in his estate of humiliation, and exaltation. Christ quotes the whole verse, which shews the Redeemer in his exaltation. 1. "Sitting at the right hand of God." His sitting, notes both rest and rule; his sitting at God's right hand, notes superlative honour, and sovereign power. See in what great words this is expressed, Heb. viii. 1: "He is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty;" see Phil. ii. 9; Eph. i. 21. He did not take this honour to himself, but was entitled to it by covenant with his Father, and invested in it by commission from him; and here is that commission. 2. Subduing his enemies. There he shall sit till they be made either his friends or his footstool. The carnal mind, wherever it is, is enmity to Christ, and that is subdued in the conversion of the willing people that are called to his foot, as the expression is, Isa. xli. 2; and in the confusion of his impenitent adversaries that shall be brought under his foot, as the kings of Canaan were under the feet of Joshua. But that which this verse is quoted for, is that David calls the Messiah his Lord, "the Lord Jehovah said unto my Lord." This intimates to us that, in expounding Scripture, we must take notice of, and improve, not only that which is the main scope and sense of a verse, but of the words and phrases by which the Spirit chooseth to express that sense, which have many times a very useful and instructive significance. Here is a good note from that word, "my Lord."

Secondly. It is not so easy for those who believe not the godhead of the Messiah to clear this from an absurdity, if Christ be David's son. It is incongruous for the father to speak of his son, the predecessor of his successor, as his lord. "If David call him Lord," that is laid down, ver. 45, as the magis notum,—the more evident truth; for whatever is said of Christ's humanity and humiliation must be construed and understood in consistency with the truth of his Divine nature and dominion. We must hold this fast, that he is David's Lord; and by that explain his being David's son. The seeming differences of Scripture, as here, may not only be accommodated, but contribute to the beauty and harmony of the whole: amica Scripturarum lites, ut nam et notata—the differences observable in the Scriptures are of a friendly kind: would to God that our differences were of the same kind.

were not so much a part of the law as the principle of religion; but see Deut. vi. 5, Lev. xix. 18. The fact that these two precepts are embodied in the Mosaic law elevates it above all other known systems prior to the Christian era.

xxii. 44. Upon this quotation it has been very well remarked that if the person of Christ were simply human, and his kingdom of an earthly nature, the language would be inconsistent and improper. The question was proposed, not merely to overcome his opponents, Thirdly. We have here the success of this gentle trial, which Christ made of the Pharisees' knowledge, in two things: 1. It puzzled them, ver. 46: "No man was able to answer him a word:" either it was their ignorance, that they did not know, or their impiety, that they would not own, the Messiah to be God, which truth was the only key to unlock this difficulty. What those rabbis could not then answer, blessed be God, the plainest Christian, that is led into the understanding of the Gospel of Christ, can now account for; that Christ, as God, was David's Lord; and Christ, as man, was David's son. This he did not now himself explain, but reserved it till the proof of it was completed by his resurrection; but we have it fully explained by him in his glory, Rev. xxii. 16: "I am the root and offspring of David." Christ, as God, was David's root; Christ, as man, was David's offspring. If we hold not fast this truth, that Jesus Christ is over all, God blessed for ever, we run ourselves into inextricable difficulties; and well might David, his remote ancestor, call him, Lord; when Mary, his immediate mother, after she had conceived him, called him Lord, and God her Saviour, Lu. i. 46, 47. 2. It silenced them, and all others that sought occasion against him; "neither durst any man from that day forth ask him any more," such captious, tempting, ensnaring "questions." Note, God will glorify himself in the silencing of many, whom he will not glorify himself in the salvation of. Many are convinced, that are not converted by the Word. Had these been converted, they would have asked him more questions, especially that great question, "What must we do to be saved?" But since they could not gain their point, they would have no more to do with him. But thus all that strive with their Master shall be convinced, as these Pharisees and lawyers here were, of the inequality of the match.

CHAPTER XXIII.

In the foregoing chapter we had our Saviour's discourses with the scribes and Pharisees; here we have his discourse concerning them, or rather, against them. I. He allows their office, ver. 2, 3. II. He warns his disciples not to imitate their hypocrisy and pride, ver. 4—12. III. He exhibits a charge against them for divers high crimes and misdemeanors—corrupting the law, opposing the Gospel, and treacherous dealing, both with God and man; and to each article he prefixes a woe, ver. 13—33. IV. He passeth sentence upon Jerusalem, and foretells the ruin of the city and temple, especially for the sin of persecution, ver. 34—39.

HEN spake Jesus to the multitude, and to his disciples, 2 Saying, The scribes and the Pharisees sit in Moses' seat: 3 All therefore whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do; but do not ye after their works: for they say, and do not. 4 For they bind heavy burdens and grievous to be borne, and lay them on men's shoulders; but they themselves will not move them with one of their fingers. 5 But all their works they do for to be seen of men: they make broad their phylacteries, and enlarge the borders of their garments, 6 And love the uppermost rooms at feasts, and the chief seats in the synagogues, 7 And greetings in the markets, and to be called of men, Rabbi, Rabbi. 8 But be not ye called Rabbi: for one is your Master, even Christ; and all ye are brethren. 9 And call no man your father upon the earth: for one is your Father, which is in heaven. 10 Neither be ye called masters: for one is your Master, even Christ. 11 But he that is greatest among you shall be your servant. 12 And whosoever shall exalt himself shall be abased; and he that shall humble himself shall be exalted.

We find not Christ, in all his preaching, so severe upon any sort of people as upon these scribes and Pharisees: for the truth is, nothing is more directly opposite to the spirit of the Gospel than the temper and practice of that generation of men, who were made up of pride, worldliness, and tyranny, under a cloak and pretence of religion. Yet these were the idols and darlings of the people, who thought, if but two men went to heaven, one would be a Pharisee. Now Christ directs his discourse here "to the multitude, and to his disciples," ver. 1, to rectify their mistakes concerning these scribes and Pharisees, by painting them out in their true colours; and so to take off the prejudice which some of the multitude had conceived against Christ and his doctrine, because it was opposed by those topping men of their church, that called themselves the people's guides. Note, It is good to know the true characters of men, that we may not be imposed upon by great and mighty names, titles, and pretensions to power. People must be told of the wolves, Acts xx. 29, 30; the dogs, Phil. iii. 2; the deceitful workers, 2 Cor. xi. 13; that they may know where to stand upon their guard. And not only the mixed multitude, but even the disciples need these cautions; for good men are apt to have their eyes dazzled with worldly pomp. Now in this discourse,

1. Christ allows their office as expositors of the law. "The scribes and Pha-

but to direct attention to his own dignity and dominion, as the object of faith, the fulfilment of prophecy, the Lord and Saviour of mankind. All the conditions of the query imply that the Jews understood Psalm cx. of the Messiah.

xxiii. 2—4. It is only in a special sense that the scribes and Pharisees sat in the seat of Moses, or occupied his place. The nation had a directing head in the person of Moses when he lived, and now the directing body was made up of scribes and Pharisees.

riases," (that is, the whole sanhedrim, who sat at the helm of church government, who were all called scribes, and were some of them Pharisees,) they "sit in Moses' seat," ver. 2, as public teachers and interpreters of the law; and the law of Moses being the municipal law of their state, they were as judges, or a bench of justices. Teaching and judging seem to be equivalent, comparing 2 Chr. xvii. 7, 9, with 2 Chr. xix. 5, 6, 8. They were not the itinerant judges, that rode the circuit; but the standing bench, that determined on appeals, specific verdicts, or writs of error, by the law. They sat in Moses' seat; not as he was mediator between God and Israel, but only as he was chief justice, Ex. xviii. 26; or we may apply it, not to the sanhedrim, but to the other Pharisees and scribes that expounded the law, and taught the people how to apply it to particular cases. The pulpit of wood, such as was made for Ezra, that ready scribe in the law of God, Neh. viii. 4, is here called Moses' seat, because Moses had those in every city (so the expression is, Acts xv. 21), which in those pulpits preached him. This was their office; and it was just and honourable. It was requisite there should be some at whose mouth the people might inquire the law, Mal. ii. 7. Note, 1. There is many a good place filled with bad men. It is no new thing for the vilest men to be exalted, even to Moses' seat, Ps. xii. 8. And when it is so, the men are not so much honoured by the seat, as the seat is dishonoured by the men. Now they that sat in Moses' seat were so wretchedly degenerate as they were, it was time for the great Prophet to arise, like unto Moses, to erect another seat. 2. Good and useful offices and powers are not therefore to be presently condemned and abolished, because they fall sometimes into the hands of ill men, that abuse them. We must not therefore pull down Moses' seat, because scribes and Pharisees have got possession of it; rather than so, "let both grow together until the harvest," ch. xiii. 30. Hence heifers, ver. 3: "Whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do." As far as they sit in Moses' seat, that is, read and preach the law that was given by Moses, (which as yet continued in full force, power, and virtue,) and judge according to that law, so far you must hearken to them, as remembrancers to you of the written word. The scribes and Pharisees made it their business to study the Scripture, and were well acquainted with the language, history, and customs of it, and its style and phraseology. Now Christ would have the people to make use of the helps they gave them for the understanding of the Scripture, and do accordingly. As long as their comments did illustrate the text, and not pervert it—did make plain, and not make void, the commandment of God, so far they must be observed and obeyed; but with caution, and a judgment of discretion. Note, We must not think the worse of good truths, for their being preached by bad ministers; nor of good laws, for their being executed by bad magistrates. Though it is most desirable to have our food brought by angels, yet, if God send it to us by ravens, if it be good and wholesome, we must take it, and thank God for it. Our Lord Jesus premiseth this to prevent the cavil which some would be apt to make at his following discourse; as if, by condemning the scribes and Pharisees, he designed to bring the law of Moses into contempt, and to draw the people off from it; whereas, he came not to destroy, but to fulfil. Note, It is wisdom to obviate the exceptions which may be taken at just reproofs, especially when there is occasion to distinguish between officers and their offices, "that the ministry be not blamed," when the ministers are.

II. He condemns the men. He had ordered the multitude to do as they taught; but here he annexeth a caution, not to do as they did; to beware of their leave, "Do not ye after their works." Their traditions were their works—were their idols—the works of their fancy. Or, do not according to their example. Doctrines and practices are both spirits that must be tried; and, where there is occasion, must be carefully separated and distinguished. And as we must not swallow corrupt doctrines, for the sake of any laudable practices of those that teach them; so we must not imitate any ill examples, for the sake of the plausible doctrines of those that give them. The scribes and Pharisees boasted as much of the goodness of their works, as of the orthodoxy of their teaching, and hoped to be justified by them: it was the plea they put in, Lu. xviii. 11, 12. And yet these things, which they valued themselves so much upon, were an abomination in the sight of God. Our Saviour here, and in the following verses, instanceth, in divers particulars of their works, wherein we must not imitate them. In general they are charged with hypocrisy, dissimulation, or double dealing in religion; a crime which cannot be inquired of at men's bar, because we can only judge according to outward appearance; but God, who searcheth the heart, can convict of hypocrisy, and nothing is more displeasing to him, for he desireth truth.

Four things are in these verses charged upon them.

First. Their saying and doing were two things. Their practice was no way agreeable, either with their preaching or with their profession; "for they say, and do not." They teach out of the law that which is good, but their conversation gives them the lie; and they seem to have found another way to heaven, for themselves, than what they shew to others: see this illustrated and charged home upon them, Rom. ii. 17–24. Those are of all sinners most inexcusable that allow themselves in the same sins they condemn in others, or in worse. This doth especially touch wicked ministers, who will be sure to have their portion appointed them with hypocrites, ch. xxiv. 51; for what greater hypocrisy can there be, than to press that upon others, to be believed and done, which they themselves live in unbelief of, and disobedience to?—who pull down in their practice what they build up in their preaching; who, when they are in the pulpit, preach so well, that it is a pity they should ever come out; but when they are out of the pulpit, live so ill, that it is a pity they should ever come in; like bells that call others to church, but hang out themselves; or mercurial posts, that point the way to others, but stand still themselves; such will be judged out of their own mouths. It is applicable to all others that "say, and do not;" that make a plausible profession of religion, but do not live up to that profession; that make fair promises, but do not perform their promises; are full of good discourse, and can lay down the law to all about them, but are as empty of good works; great talkers, but little doers; the voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau; vox et præterea nihil—mere sound: they speak fair, "I go, sir," but there is no trusting them, for there are seven abominations in their heart.

Secondly. They were very severe in imposing upon others those things which they were not themselves willing to submit to the burthen of, ver. 4; "they bind heavy burthens, and grievous to be borne;" not only insisting upon the minute circumstances of the law, which is called a yoke, Acts xv. 10, and pressing the observation of them with more strictness and severity than God himself did, (whereas the maxim of the lawyers is, Apices juris, non sunt jura—Mere points of law are not law,) but by adding to his words, and imposing their own inventions and traditions under the highest penalties. They loved to shew their authority, and to exercise their domineering faculty, lording it over God's heritage, and saying to men's souls, "Bow down, that we may go over." Witness their many additions to the law of the fourth commandment, by which they made the sabbath a burthen on men's shoulders; which was designed to be the joy of their hearts. Thus with force and cruelty did those shepherds rule the flock, as of old, Eze. xxxiv. 4. But see their hypocrisy, "they themselves will not move them with one of their fingers." 1. They would not exercise themselves in those things which they imposed upon others. they pressed upon the people a strictness in religion, which they themselves would not be bound by; but secretly transgressed their own traditions, which they publicly enforced. They indulged their pride in giving law to others, but consulted their ease in their own practice. Thus it has been said to the reproach of the Popish priests, that they fast with wine and sweetmeats, while they force the people to fast with bread and water, and decline the penances they enjoin the laity. 2. They would not ease the people in these things—not put a finger to lighten their burthen, when they saw it pinched them: they could find out loose constructions to put upon God's law, and could dispense with that, but would not bate an ace of their own impositions, nor dispense with a failure in the least punctilio of them; they allowed no chancery to relieve the extremity of their common law. How contrary to this was the practice of Christ's apostles, who would allow to others that use of Christian liberty which, for the peace and edification of the church, they would deny themselves in; they would lay no other burthen but necessary things, and those easy, Acts xv. 29. How carefully doth Paul spare those to whom he writes, 1 Cor. vii. 28; ix. 12.

Thirdly. They were all for show, and nothing for substance, in religion, ver. 5: "All their works they do to be seen of men." We must do such good works, that they who see them may glorify God; but we must not proclaim our good works with design that others may see them, and glorify us; which our Saviour here chargeth upon the Pharisees in general, as he had done before in the particular instances of prayer and giving of alms. All their end was to be praised of men; and therefore all their endeavour was to be seen of men—to make a fair show in the flesh. In those duties of religion which fall under the eye of men, none so constant and abundant as they; but in what lies between God and their souls, in the retirements of their closets, and the recesses of their hearts, they desire to be excused. The form of godliness will get them a name to live, which is all they aim at; and therefore trouble not themselves with the power of it, which is essential to a life indeed. He that doth all to be seen, doth nothing to the purpose.

He instanceth in two things which they did "to be seen of men:" 1. "They made broad their phylacteries." Those were little scrolls of paper, or parchment, wherein were written, with great niceness, these four paragraphs of the law: Ex. xiii. 2–10; 11–16; Deu. vi. 4–9; xi. 13–21. These were sewn up in leather, and worn upon their foreheads and left arms; it was a tradition of the elders, which had reference to Ex. xiii. 9, and Pr. vii. 3, where the expressions seem to be figurative; intimating no more but that we should bear the things of God in our minds as carefully as if we had them bound between our eyes. Now the Pharisees made broad these phylacteries, that they might be thought more holy, and strict, and zealous for the law, than others. It is a gracious ambition to covet to be really more holy than others; but it is a proud ambition to covet to appear so. It is good to excel in real piety, but not to exceed in outward shows, for overdoing is justly suspected of design, Pr. xxvii. 14. It is the guise of hypocrisy to make more ado than needs in external services; more than is needful either to prove or to improve the good affections and dispositions of the soul. 2. They "enlarged the borders of their garments." God appointed the Jews to make borders or fringes upon their garments, Num. xv. 38, to distinguish them from other nations, and to be a memorandum to them of their being a peculiar people; but the Pharisees were not content to have these borders like other people's, which might serve God's design in appointing them, but they must be larger than ordinary, to answer their design of making themselves to be taken notice of, as if they were more religious than others. But those who thus enlarge their phylacteries, and the borders of their garments, while their hearts are straitened, and destitute of the love of God and their neighbour, though they may now deceive others, will in the end deceive themselves.

Fourthly. They much affected pre-eminence and superiority, and prided themselves extremely in it. Pride was the darling, reigning sin of the Pharisees, the sin that did most easily beset them, and which our Lord Jesus takes all occasions to witness against. 1. He describes their pride, ver. 6, 7. They courted and coveted, 1st. Places of honour and respect. In all public appearances, as at feasts, and in the synagogues, they expected, and had, to their heart's delight, the uppermost rooms, and the chief seats. They took place of all others, and precedence was adjudged to them as persons of the greatest note and merit; and it is easy to imagine what a complacency they took in it; they loved to have the pre-eminence, 3 Jo. 9. It is not possessing the uppermost rooms, nor sitting in the chief seats, that is condemned, (somebody must sit uppermost,) but loving them. For men to value such a little piece of ceremony as sitting highest, going first, taking the wall, or the better hand, and to value themselves by it, and seek it, and resent it, if they have it not, what is that but making an idol of ourselves, and then falling down and worshipping it?—the worst kind of idolatry. It is bad any where, but especially in the synagogues. There to seek honour to ourselves, where we come to give glory to God, and to humble ourselves before him, is indeed to mock God, instead of serving him. David would willingly lie at the threshold in God's house; so far was he from coveting the chief seat there, Ps. lxxv. 10. It savours much of pride and hypocrisy, when people do not care for going to church, unless they could look fine, and make a figure there. 2nd. Titles of honour and respect. They loved "greetings in the markets;" loved to have people put off their hats to them, and shew them respect when they met them in the streets: O how it pleased them, and fed a vain humour, digito monstrari et dicere, Hic est—to be pointed out, and to have it said, This is he; to have way made for him in the crowd of market people: "Stand off, here is a Pharisee coming;" and to be complimented with the high and pompous title of Rabbi, Rabbi; this was meat, and drink, and dainties to them, and they took as great a satisfaction in it as Nebuchadnezzar did in his palace, when he said, "Is not this great Babylon that I have built?" The greetings would not have done them half so much good, if they had not been in the markets, where every body might see how much they were respected, and how high they stood in the opinion of the people. It was but a little before Christ's time that the Jewish teachers, the masters of Israel, had assumed the titles of Rabbi, Rab, and Rabban, which signifies great, or much, and was construed as doctor, or my lord; and they laid such a stress upon it, that they gave it for a maxim, that he who saluteth his teacher, and doth not call him Rabbi, provokes the Divine Majesty to depart from Israel; so much religion did they place in that which was but a piece of good manners. For him that is taught in the Word to give respect to him that teacheth, is commendable enough in him that gives it; but for him that teacheth to love it, and demand it, and affect it—to be puffed up with it, and to be displeased if it be omitted, is sinful and abominable; and instead of teaching, he has need himself to learn the first lesson in the school of Christ, which is humility. 2. He cautions his disciples against being herein like them: herein they must not do after their works; "but be ye not called so, for ye shall not be of such a spirit," ver. 8, &c. Here is,

1st. A prohibition of pride. They are here forbidden, First. To challenge titles of honour and dominion to themselves, ver. 8, 10. It is repeated twice, "Be not called Rabbi, neither be ye called Master," or guide; not "that it is unlawful to give civil respect to those that are over us in the Lord, say, it is

Their power was, however, very much curtailed, and they could take action in no important public matter without the assent of the Roman authority, to which, in fact, great causes were necessarily referred. The Sanhedrim itself, though a venerable and influential institution, was restrained on every side by foreign supremacy. Hence it is apparent that scribes and Pharisees could assume little more than regulate religious practices on the one hand, and mediate with the Romans on the other, when matters within their province afforded the occasion. As public teachers of the Mosaic law they were to be regarded, though our Lord shows fully enough that neither their lives nor their teachings were wholly according to that law. Verse 3 seems to condemn the inconsistency of their private lives, and verse 4 the severity of the ritualism which they imposed upon the people. Some, however, think that the "burdens" are not traditional observances so much as stern legal exactions. But we cannot forget that these men refined upon the correct letter of

An instance of that honour and esteem of them which is our duty. But, 1st. Christ's ministers must not affect the name of Rabbi, or master, by way of distinction from other people; it is not agreeable to the simplicity of the Gospel for them to covet or accept the honour which they have that are in kings' palaces. 2nd. They must not assume the authority and dominion that is implied in those names; they must not be magisterial, nor domineer over their brethren, or over God's heritage, as if they had dominion over the faith of Christians: what they received of the Lord, all must receive from them; but in other things they must not make their opinions and wills a rule and standard to all other people, to be admitted with an implicit faith, and submitted to with an implicit obedience. The reasons for this prohibition are, First, "One is your Master, even Christ," ver. 8. And again, ver. 10. Note, 1. Christ is our master, our teacher, our guide. Mr. George Herbert, when he named the name of Christ, usually added, 'My master.' 2. Christ only is our master: ministers are but ushers in the school; Christ only is the master, that great prophet, whom we must hear, and be ruled and overruled by—whose word must be an oracle and a law to us: "Verily I say unto you," must be enough for us. And if he only be our master, then for his ministers to set up for dictators, and to pretend to a supremacy, and an infallibility, is a daring usurpation of that honour of Christ which he will not give to another. Secondly, "All ye are brethren." Ministers are not only brethren to one another, but to the people; and therefore it ill becomes them to be masters, when there are none for them to master it over but their brethren; yea, and we are all younger brethren, otherwise the eldest might claim an excellency of dignity and power, Gen. xlix. 3. But to preclude that, Christ himself is "the firstborn among many brethren," Rom. viii. 29. "Ye are brethren," as ye are all disciples of the same master; school-fellows are brethren, and as such should help one another in getting their lesson; but it will by no means be allowed that one of the scholars step into the master's seat, and give law to the school. If we are all brethren, we must not be many masters, Jas. iii. 1.

Secondly. They are forbidden to ascribe such titles to others, ver. 9: "Call no man your father upon the earth." "Constitute no man the father of your religion; that is, the founder, author, director, and governor of it. The fathers of our flesh must be called fathers, and as such we must give them reverence, but God only must be owned as the Father of our spirits, Heb. xii. 9. Our religion must not be derived from, or made to depend upon any man. We are born again to the spiritual and divine life, "not of corruptible seed, but by the Word of God," not "of the will of the flesh, or the will of man, but of God." Now the will of man not being the rise of our religion, must not be the rule of it: we must not jurare in verba magistri—not swear to the dictates of any creature; not the wisest or best, nor pin our faith on any man's sleeve, because we know not whither he will carry it. St. Paul calls himself a father to those whose conversion he had been an instrument of, 1 Cor. iv. 10; Phile. 10: but he pretends to no dominion over them, and useth that title to note, not authority but affection; therefore he calls them not his obliged, but his beloved sons, 1 Cor. iv. 14. The reason given is, "One is your Father, which is in heaven." God is our Father, and is all in all in our religion. He is the fountain of it, and its founder; the life of it, and its Lord; from whom alone, as the original, our spiritual life is derived, and on whom it doth depend. He is Father of all lights, Jas. i. 17; that "one Father, from whom are all things, and we in him," Eph. iv. 6. Christ having taught us to say, "Our Father which art in heaven," let us "call no man father upon earth; no man, because man is a worm, and the son of man is a worm, hewn out of the same rock with us; especially not upon earth, for man upon earth is a sinful worm; there is not a just man upon earth that doth good and sinneth not," and therefore not fit to be called father.

2nd. Here is a precept of humility and mutual subjection, ver. 11. "He that is greatest among you shall be your servant;" not only call himself so; we know of one that styles himself servus servorum Dei—servant of the servants of God; but acts as Rabbi, and Father, and Master, and Dominus Deus noster—"the Lord our God," and what not; but he shall be so: take it as a promise, he shall be accounted greatest, and stand highest in the favour of God that is most submissive and serviceable; or as a precept, he that is advanced to any place of dignity, trust, and honour in the church, "let him be your servant;" (some copies read εταρος for εταρος;) let him not think that his patent of honour is a writ of ease; no, he that is greatest is not a lord, but a minister. St. Paul, who knew his privilege as well as duty, though free from all, yet made himself servant of all, 1 Cor. ix. 19. And our Master frequently pressed it upon his disciples to be humble and self-denying, mild and condescending, and to abound in all offices of Christian love, though mean, and to the meanest, and of this hath set us an example.

3rd. Here is a good reason for all this, ver. 12. Consider, First. The punishment intended for the proud: "Whosoever shall exalt himself shall be abased." If God give them repentance, they will be abased in their own eyes, and will abhor themselves for it; if they repent not, sooner or later they will be abased before the world. Nebuchadnezzar in the height of his pride was turned to be a fellow-commoner with the beasts; Herod to be a feast for the worms; and Babylon, that sat as a queen, to be the scorn of nations. God made the proud and aspiring priests contemptible and base, Mal. ii. 9; and the lying prophet to be the tail, Isa. ix. 15. But if proud men have not marks of humiliation set upon them in this world, there is a day coming when they shall "rise to everlasting shame and contempt," Dan. xii. 2: so plentifully will he reward the proud doer, Ps. xxxi. 23.

Secondly. The preferment intended for the humble: "he that shall humble himself shall be exalted." Humility is that ornament which is in the sight of God of great price. In this world the humble have their honour of being accepted with the holy God, and respected by all wise and good men, of being qualified for, and often called out to, the most honourable services; for honour is like the shadow, which flees from those that pursue it, and grasp at it, but follows those that flee from it. However, in the other world, they that have humbled themselves in contrition for their sin, in compliance with their God, and in condescension to their brethren, shall be exalted to inherit the throne of glory; but be not only owned, but crowned, before angels and men.

13 But woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye shut up the kingdom of heaven against men: for ye neither go in yourselves, neither suffer ye them that are entering to go in. 14 Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye devour widows' houses, and for a pretence make long prayer: therefore ye shall receive the greater damnation. 15 Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte, and when he is made, ye make him twofold more the child of hell than yourselves.

16 Woe unto you, ye blind guides, which say, Whosoever shall swear by the temple, it is nothing; but whosoever shall swear by the gold of the temple, he is a debtor! 17 Ye fools and blind: for whether is greater, the gold, or the temple that sanctifieth the gold? 18 And, Whosoever shall swear by the altar, it is nothing; but whosoever sweareth by the gift that is upon it, he is guilty. 19 Ye fools and blind, for whether is greater, the gift, or the altar that sanctifieth the gift? 20 Whoso therefore shall swear by the altar, sweareth by it, and by all things thereon. 21 And whoso shall swear by the temple, sweareth by it, and by him that dwelleth therein. 22 And he that shall swear by heaven, sweareth by the throne of God, and by him that sitteth thereon. 23 Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye pay tithe of mint and anise and cummin, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith: these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone. 24 Ye blind guides, which strain at a gnat, and swallow a camel. 25 Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye make clean the outside of the cup and of the platter, but within they are full of extortion and excess. 26 Thou blind Pharisee, cleanse first that which is within the cup and platter, that the outside of them may be clean also. 27 Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye are like unto whited sepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's bones, and of all uncleanness. 28 Even so ye also outwardly appear righteous unto men, but within ye are full of hypocrisy and iniquity. 29 Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! because ye build the tombs of the prophets, and garnish the sepulchres of the righteous, 30 And say, If we had been in the days of our fathers, we would not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets. 31 Wherefore ye be witnesses unto yourselves, that ye are the children of them which killed the prophets. 32 Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers. 33 Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell?

In these verses we have eight woes levelled directly against the scribes and Pharisees by our Lord Jesus Christ, like so many claps of thunder, or flashes of lightning from mount Sinai: three woes are made to look very dreadful, Rev. viii. 13; ix. 10; but here are eight woes, in opposition to the eight beatitudes, ch. v. 3. The Gospel has its woes, as well as the law; and gospel curses are, of all other, the heaviest. These woes are the more remarkable, not only because of the authority, but because of the meekness and gentleness of him that denounced them. He came to bless, and loved to bless; but if his wrath be kindled, to be sure there is cause for it; and who shall entreat for him that the great Intercessor pleads against? A woe from Christ is a remediless woe. This is here the burden of the song, and it is a heavy burden; "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites." Note, 1. The scribes and Pharisees were hypocrites; that is in which all the rest of their ill characters are summed up: it was the leaven which gave the relish to all they said and did. An hypocrite is a stage-player in religion; that is the primary signification of the word; he personates or acts the part of one that he neither is nor may be, or perhaps that he neither is nor would be. 2. That the law until their distinctions and exactions became almost intolerable. In all this they protected themselves, consulting their own ease and profit; so that while escaping many of the exactions which they levied upon the general public, they took a prominent part in outward and conspicuous actions which were popularly called religious.

xxiii. 8. In this verse the important words "even Christ" are regarded as an interpolation, or as explanatory of the word master.

xxiii. 9. The words "call no man your father" are simple enough, but expositors have limited them, as they have done others, so as to allow a very extensive practice of what seems to be forbidden. The names even of pope and abbot both signify "father."

xxiii. 14. This verse is altogether omitted by some modern editors, as Tischendorf, Alford, Lachmann, and Tregelles, but some retain it. The words do not occur in the Sinaitic, Vatican, and Cambridge MSS.; they must nevertheless be very ancient if not original. Dr.

hypocrites are in a woful state and condition. 'Woe to hypocrites,' so he said whose saying their case is miserable, makes it so; while they live, their religion is vain; when they die, their ruin is great. Now each of these woes against the scribes and Pharisees has a reason annexed to it, containing a several crime charged upon them, proving their hypocrisy, and justifying the judgment of Christ upon them; for his woes, his curses, are never causeless.

1. They were sworn enemies to the Gospel of Christ, and consequently to the salvation of the souls of men, ver. 13: they "shut up the kingdom of heaven against men;" that is, they did all they could to keep people from believing in Christ, and so entering into his kingdom. Christ came to open the kingdom of heaven; that is, to lay open for us a new and living way into it, to bring men to be subjects of that kingdom. Now the scribes and Pharisees, who sat in Moses' seat, and pretended to be the key of knowledge, ought to have contributed their assistance herein, by opening those scriptures of the Old Testament which pointed at the Messiah and his kingdom in their true proper sense; they that undertook to expound Moses and the prophets should have shewed the people how they testified of Christ; that Daniel's weeks were expiring, the sceptre was departed from Judah; and therefore now was the time for the Messiah's appearing. Thus they might have facilitated that great work, and have helped thousands to heaven; but instead of this they shut up the kingdom of heaven; they made it their business to press the ceremonial law, which was now in the vanishing; and to suppress the prophecies, which were now in the accomplishing; and to beget and nourish up in the minds of people prejudices against Christ and his doctrine.

First. They would not go in themselves: "Have any of the rulers or of the Pharisees believed on him?" Jno. vi. 48. No, they were too proud to stoop to his meanness, too formal to be reconciled to his plainness; they did not like a religion which insisted so much on humility, self-denial, contempt of the world, and spiritual worship. Repentance was the door of admission into this kingdom; and nothing could be more disagreeable to the Pharisees, that justified themselves, and admired themselves, than to repent; that is, to accuse, and abuse, and abhor themselves: therefore they went not in themselves; but that was not all.

Secondly. They would not suffer them that were entering to go in. It is bad to keep away from Christ ourselves, but it is worse to keep others from him: yet that is commonly the way of hypocrites; they do not love that any should go beyond them in religion, or be better than they. Their not going in themselves was a hindrance to many; for having so great an interest in the people, multitudes rejected the Gospel only because their leaders did; but besides that, they opposed both Christ's entertaining of sinners, Luk. vii. 39, and sinners entertaining of Christ. They perverted his doctrine, confronted his miracles, quarrelled with his disciples, and represented him and his institutes and economy to the people in the most disingenuous, disadvantageous manner imaginable; they thundered out their excommunications against those that confessed him, and used all their wit and power to serve their malice against him: and thus they shut up the kingdom of heaven, so that they who would enter into it must suffer violence, ch. xi. 12, and press into it (Luk. xvi. 16) through a crowd of scribes and Pharisees, and all the obstructions and difficulties they could contrive to lay in their way. How well is it for us that our salvation is not intrusted in the hands of any man, or company of men, in the world; if it were, we were undone. They that shut out of the church, would shut out of heaven, if they could; but the malice of men cannot make the promise of God, to his chosen, of none effect. Blessed be God, it cannot.

II. They made religion and the form of godliness a cloak and stalking-horse to their covetous practices and desires, ver. 14. Observe here,

First. What their wicked practices were: they devoured widows' houses, either by quartering themselves and their attendants upon them for entertainment, which must be of the best, for men of their figure; or by insinuating themselves into their affections, and so getting to be the trustees of their estates, which they could make an easy prey of; for who could presume to call such as they were to an account? The thing they aimed at, was to enrich themselves; and this being their chief and highest end, all considerations of justice and equity were laid aside, and even widows' houses were sacrificed to this. Widows are of the weaker sex, in its weakest state, easily imposed upon, and therefore they fastened on them to make a prey of. They devoured those whom by the law of God they were particularly obliged to protect, patronize, and relieve. There is a woe in the Old Testament to those that made widows their prey, Isa. x. 1, 2; and Christ here seconded it with his woe. God is the judge of the widows; they are his peculiar care; he establisheth their border, Pr. xv. 25, and espouseth their cause, Ex. xxii. 22, 23: yet these were they whose houses the Pharisees devoured by wholesale; so greedy were they to get their bellies filled with the treasures of wickedness; their devouring notes, not only covetousness, but cruelty in their oppression, described Mic. iii. 3; they eat the flesh, and flay the skin; and doubtless they did all this under colour of law; for they did it so artfully that it passed uncensured, and did not at all lessen the people's veneration for them.

Secondly. What was the cloak with which they covered this wicked practice? For a pretence they made long prayers; very long indeed, if it be true, which some of the Jewish writers tell us, that they spent three hours at a time in the formalities of meditation and prayer, and did it thrice every day, which is more than an upright soul, that makes conscience of being inward with God in the duty, dares pretend ordinarily to do; but to the Pharisees it was easy enough, who never made a business of the duty, and always made a trade of the outside of it. By this craft they got their wealth, and maintained their grandeur. It is not probable that these long prayers were extemporary; for then (as Mr. Baxter observes) the Pharisees had much more of the gift of prayer than Christ's disciples had; but rather that they were stated forms of words in use among them, which they said over by tale, as the papists drop their beads. Christ doth not here condemn long prayers, as in themselves hypocritical; nay, if there were not a great appearance of good in them, they would not have been used for a pretence; and the cloak must be very thick which was used to cover such wicked practices. Christ himself continued all night in prayer to God; and we are commanded to pray without ceasing too soon. Where there are many sins to be confessed, and many wants to pray for the supply of, and many mercies to give thanks for, there is occasion for long prayers; but the Pharisees' long prayers were made up of vain repetitions, and, which was the end of them, they were for a pretence. By them they got the reputation of pious devout men, that loved prayer, and were the favourites of Heaven; and by this means people were made to believe it was not possible such men as they should cheat them; and therefore happy the widow that could get a Pharisee for her trustee and guardian to her children. Thus, while they seem to soar heavenwards upon the wings of prayer, their eye, like the kite's, was all the while upon their prey on earth, some widow's house or other that lay convenient for them. Thus circumsion was the cloak of the Schemites' covetousness, Gen. xxv. 22, 23; and the payment of a vow in Hebron, the cover of Absalom's rebellion, 2 Sam. xv. 7; and a fast in Jezreel must patronize Naboth's murder, and the extirpation of Baal is the footstool of Jehu's ambition. Popish priests, under pretence of long prayers for the dead, masses and dirges, and I know not what stuff, enrich themselves, by devouring the houses of the widows and fatherless. Note, It is no new thing for the show and form of godliness to be made a cloak to the greatest enormities. But dissembled piety, however it passeth now, will be reckoned for as double iniquity "in the day when God shall judge the secrets of men."

Thirdly. The doom passed upon them for this: "therefore ye shall receive the greater damnation." Note, 1. There are degrees of damnation; there are some whose sin being more inexcusable, their ruin will be more intolerable. 2. The pretences of religion, which hypocrites use to disguise or excuse their sin now, will aggravate their condemnation shortly. Such is the deceitfulness of sin, that that very thing by which sinners hope to expiate and atone for their sins, will come against them, and make their sins more exceeding sinful. But it is sad for the criminal when his defence proves his offence, and his plea, "We have prophesied in thy name, and in thy name made long prayers," heightens the charge against him.

III. While they were such enemies to the conversion of souls to Christianity, they were very industrious in the perversion of them to their faction; they shut up the kingdom of heaven against those that would turn to Christ, but at the same time compassed sea and land to make proselytes to themselves, ver. 15. Observe here,

First. Their commendable industry in making proselytes to the Jewish religion; not only proselytes of the gate, who obliged themselves to no more but the observance of the seven precepts of the sons of Noah, but proselytes of righteousness, who addicted themselves wholly to all the rites of the Jewish religion, for that was the game they flew at; for this, for one such, though but one, they compass sea and land, had many a cunning reach, and laid many a plot, rode, and ran, and sent, and wrote, and laboured unweariedly; and what did they aim at? Not the glory of God, and the good of souls; but that they might have the credit of making them proselytes; and the advantage of making a prey of them, when they were made. Note, 1. The making of proselytes, if it be to the truth and serious godliness, and be done with a good design, is a good work, well worthy of the utmost care and pains. Such is the value of souls, that nothing must be thought too much to do to "save a soul from death." The industry of the Pharisees herein may shew the negligence of many, who would be thought to act from better principles, but will be at no pains or cost to propagate the Gospel. 2. To make a proselyte sea and land must be compassed; all ways and means must be tried; first one way, and then another, must be tried; all little enough; but all well paid, if the point be gained. 3. Carnal hearts seldom stick at pains to carry on their carnal purposes: when a proselyte is to be made to serve a turn for themselves, they will compass sea and land to make him, rather than be balked.

Secondly. Their cursed impiety, in abusing their proselytes, when they were made: ye make him the disciple of a Pharisee presently, and he sucks in all their notions, and so "ye make him twofold more the child of hell than yourselves." Note, 1. Hypocrites, while they fancy themselves heirs of heaven, are, in the judgment of Christ, the children of hell. The rise of their hypocrisy is from hell, for the devil is the father of lies; and the tendency of their hypocrisy is towards hell; that is the country they belong to, the inheritance they are heirs to: they are called children of hell, because of their rooted enmity to the kingdom of heaven, which was the principle and genius of Pharisaism. 2. Though all that maliciously oppose the Gospel are children of hell, yet some are twofold more so than others, more furious and bigoted and malignant. 3. Perverted proselytes are commonly the greatest bigots: the scholars outdid their masters; 1st. In fondness of ceremony. The Pharisees themselves saw the folly of their own impositions, and in their hearts smiled at the obsequiousness of those that conformed to them; but their proselytes were eager for them. Note, Weak heads commonly admire those shows and ceremonies which wise men (however for public ends they countenance them) cannot but think meanly of. 2nd. In fury against Christianity. The proselytes readily imbibed the principles which their crafty leaders were not wanting to possess them with, and so became extremely hot against the truth. The most bitter enemies the apostles met with, in all places, were the Hellenist Jews, that were mostly proselytes, Acts xiii. 45; xiv. 2-19; xvii. 5; xviii. 6. Paul, a disciple of the Pharisees, was exceedingly mad against the Christians, Acts xxvi. 11; when his master, Gamaliel, seems to have been more moderate.

IV. Their seeking of their own worldly gain and honour more than God's glory, put them upon coining false and unwarrantable distinctions, with which they led the people into dangerous mistakes, particularly in the matter of oaths, which, as an evidence of a universal sense of religion, have been by all nations accounted sacred, ver. 16, "ye blind guides." Note, 1. It is sad to think how many are under the guidance of such as are themselves blind; who undertake to shew others that way which they are themselves willingly ignorant of; "His watchmen are blind," Isa. lvi. 10; and, too often, "the people love to have it so," and say to the seers, "See not." But the case is bad when the leaders of the people cause them to err, Isa. ix. 16. 2. Though the condition of those whose guides are blind is very sad, yet that of the blind guides themselves is yet more woful. Christ denounceth a woe to the blind guides, that have the blood of so many souls to answer for. Now to prove their blindness, he instanteth in the matter of swearing, and shews what corrupt casuists they were.

First. He lays down the doctrine they taught. 1. They allowed swearing by creatures, provided they were consecrated to the service of God, and stood in any special relation to him. They allowed swearing by the temple, and the altar, though they were the work of men's hands, intended to be the servants of God's honour, not sharers in it. An oath is an appeal to God, to his omniscience and justice; and to make this appeal to any creature is to put that creature into the place of God: see Deut. vi. 13. 2. They distinguished between an oath by the temple, and an oath by the gold of the temple; an oath by the altar, and by the gift upon the altar; making the latter binding, but not the former. Here was a double wickedness: 1st. That there were some oaths which they dispensed with, and made light of, and reckoned a man was not bound by, to assert the truth, or perform a promise. They ought not to have sworn by the temple or the altar; but when they had so sworn, they were taken in the words of their mouth. That doctrine cannot be of the God of truth, which gives countenance to the breach of faith in any case whatsoever. Oaths are edge tools, and are not to be jested with. 2nd. That they preferred the gold before the temple, and the gift before the altar, to encourage people to bring gifts to the altar, and gold to the treasures of the temple, which they hoped to be gainers by. They who had made gold their hope, and whose eyes were blinded by gifts in secret, were great friends to the Corban; and gain being their godliness, by a thousand artifices they made religion truckle to their worldly interests. Corrupt church guides make things to be sin, or no sin, as it serves their purposes, and lay a much greater stress on that which concerns their own gain, than that which is for God's glory, and the good of souls.

Secondly. He shews the folly and absurdity of this distinction, ver. 17, 19: "Ye fools and blind." It was in the way of a necessary reproof, not an angry

Conant says it is omitted in the oldest MSS. versions and citations, which is an exaggerated statement, as it occurs in both the Peshito and the Curetonian Syriac, and some other very early authorities. Still, the verse must be regarded as a doubtful one.

xxiii. 16-22. Among the idle distinctions introduced were those concerning oaths, some of which were regarded as binding, and others not so, for reasons as trivial as those which the Jesuit theologians have urged in like cases. "The gold of the Temple" was apparently its money, or the wealth resulting from offerings. Jahn says, "The Jews in the time of Christ were in the habit of swearing by the altar, by Jerusalem, by heaven, by the earth, by themselves, by their heads, by the gold of the Temple, by sacrifices, &c." The oaths in which the name of God was not introduced were reckoned of little obligation, unless, as it would seem, an offering of some kind or other to the Temple altar or treasury was implied or expressed. The expression in verse 18, "he is guilty," fails to convey the real reproach, that Christ called them fools. Let it suffice us, from the Word of wisdom, to shew the folly of sinful opinions and practices; but for the fastening of the character upon particular persons, leave that to Christ, who knows what is in man, and hath forbidden us to say, "Thou fool." To convict them of folly, he appeals to themselves. "Whether is greater, the gold," (the golden vessels and ornaments, or the gold in the treasury,) "or the temple that sanctifieth the gold? the gift, or the altar that sanctifieth the gift?" Any one will own, Propter quod aliquid est tute, id est magis tale,—that, on account of which any thing is qualified in a particular way, must itself be much more qualified in the same way. They that swore by the gold of the temple had an eye to it as holy; but what was it that made it holy, but the holiness of the temple, to the service of which it was appropriated? And therefore the temple cannot be less holy than the gold, but must be more so; for the less is blessed and sanctified of the better, Heb. vii. 7. The temple and altar were dedicated to God fixedly, the gold and gift but secondarily. Christ is our altar, Heb. xiii. 10; our temple, Jno. ii. 21; for it is he that sanctifies all our gifts, and puts an acceptableness in them, 1 Pet. ii. 5. Those that put their own works into the place of Christ's righteousness, in justification, are guilty of the Pharisees' absurdity, that preferred the gift before the altar. Every true Christian is a living temple, and by virtue thereof common things are sanctified to him: "unto the pure all things are pure," Tit. i. 15; and the "unbelieving husband is sanctified by the believing wife," 1 Cor. vii. 14.

Thirdly, He rectifies the mistake, ver. 20–22, by reducing all those oaths they had invented, to the true intent of an oath, which is, 'By the name of the Lord'; so that though an oath by the temple, or the altar, or heaven, be formally bad, yet they are binding: Quod fieri non debuit, factum valet. 'Engagements which ought not to have been made, are yet, when made, binding.' A man shall never take advantage of his own fault. 1. He that swears by the altar, let him not think to shake off the obligation of it, by saying, The altar is but wood, and stone, and brass; for his oath shall be construed most strongly against himself, because he was culpable, and so as that the obligation of it may be preserved; Ut res potius valeat quam pereat,—the obligation being hereby strengthened, rather than destroyed. And therefore an oath "by the altar" shall be interpreted "by it, and by all things thereon;" for the appurtenances pass with the principal; and the things thereon being offered up to God, to swear by it and them was, in effect, to call God himself to witness; for it was the altar of God, and he that went to that, went to God, Ps. xliii. 4; xxvi. 6. 2. He that swears by the temple, if he understand what he doth, cannot but apprehend that the ground of such a respect to it is, not because it is a fine house, but because it is the house of God, dedicated to his service, the place which he hath chosen to put his name there; and therefore he "swears by it, and by him that dwelleth therein;" there he was pleased, in a peculiar manner, to manifest himself, and give tokens of his presence; so that whoso swears by it, swears by Him who had said, "This is my rest; here will I dwell." Good Christians are God's temples, and the Spirit of God dwells in them, 1 Cor. iii. 16; vi. 19; and God takes what is done to them as done to himself. He that grieves a gracious soul, grieves it and the Spirit that dwells in it, Eph. iv. 30. 3. If a man swear by heaven, he sins, ch. v. 34; yet he shall not therefore be discharged from the obligation of his oath; no, God will make him know that the heaven he swears by is his throne, Isa. lxvi. 1; and he that swears by the throne, appeals to Him that sits upon it, who, as he represents the affront done to him in the form of an oath, so he will certainly revenge the greater affront done to him by the violation of it. Christ will not countenance the evasion of a solemn oath, though never so plausible.

V. They were very strict and precise in the smaller matters of the law, but as careless and loose in the weightier matters, ver. 23, 24. They were partial in the law, Mal. ii. 9; would pick and choose their duty, according as they were interested or stood affected. Sincere obedience is universal; and he that from a right principle obeys any of God's precepts will have respect to them all, Ps. cxix. 6; but hypocrites, who act in religion for themselves, and not for God, will do no more in religion than they can serve a turn by for themselves. The partiality of the scribes and Pharisees appears here in two instances:

First. They observed smaller duties, but omitted greater; they were very exact in paying tithes, till it came to mint, anise, and cummin; their exactness in tithing of which would not cost them much, but would be cried up, and they should buy reputation pretty cheap. The Pharisee boasted of this: "I give tithes of all that I possess," Lu. xvi. 12. But it is likely they had ends of their own to serve, and would find their own account in it; for the priests and Levites, to whom the tithes were paid, were in their interests, and knew how to return their kindness. Paying tithes was their duty, and what the law required. Christ tells them they ought not to leave it undone. Note, All ought, in their places, to contribute to the support and maintenance of a standing ministry. Withholding tithes is called robbing God, Mal. iii. 8–10. They that are taught in the Word, and do not communicate to them that teach them, that love a cheap Gospel, come short of the Pharisees. But that which Christ here condemns them for is, that they "omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith;" and their niceness in paying tithes was, if not to atone to God, yet at least to excuse and palliate to men the omission of those. All the things of God's law are weighty, but those are most weighty which are most expressive of inward holiness in the heart—the instances of self-denial, contempt of the world, and resignation to God, in which lies the life of religion. Judgment and mercy towards men, and faith towards God, are the weighty matters of the law, the good things which the Lord our God requires, Mic. vi. 8; to do justly, and love mercy, and humble ourselves by faith, to walk with God. This is the obedience which is better than sacrifice, or tithing; judgment is preferred before sacrifice, Isa. i. 11. To be just to the priests in their tithe, and yet to cheat and defraud every body else, is but to mock God, and deceive ourselves. Mercy also is preferred before sacrifice, Hos. vi. 6. To feed those who made themselves fat with the offerings of the Lord, and at the same time to shut up the bowels of compassion from a brother or a sister, that is naked and destitute of daily food—to pay tithe—mint to the priest, and to deny a crumb to Lazarus, is to lie open to that judgment without mercy which is awarded to those who pretended to judgment, and shewed no mercy. Nor will judgment and mercy serve, without faith in Divine revelation; for God will be honoured in his truth, as well as in his laws.

Secondly. They avoided lesser sins, but committed greater, ver. 24. "Ye blind guides," so he had called them before, ver. 16, for their corrupt teaching; here he calls them so for their corrupt living; for their example was leading, as well as their doctrine; and in this also they were blind and partial; they strained at a gnat, and swallowed a camel. In their doctrine, they strained at gnats, warned people against every the least violation of the tradition of the elders; in their practice, they strained at gnats, heaved at them with a seeming dread, as if they had a great abhorrence of sin, and were afraid of it in the least instance; but they made no difficulty of those sins which, in comparison with them, were as a camel to a gnat. When they devoured widows' houses, they did indeed swallow a camel; when they gave Judas the price of innocent blood, and yet scrupled to put the returned money into the treasury, ch. xxvii. 6; when they would not go into the judgment hall, for fear of being defiled, and yet would stand at the door, and cry out against the holy Jesus, Jno. cviii. 23, when they quarrelled with the disciples for eating with unwashed hands, and yet, for the filling of the Corban, taught people to break the fifth commandment,—they strained at gnats, or less things, and yet swallowed camels. It is not the scrupling of a little sin that Christ here reproves; if it be a sin, though but a gnat, it must be strained at; but the doing of that, and then swallowing a camel—in the lesser matters of the law to be superstitious, and to be profane in the greater—is the hypocrisy here condemned.

VI. They were all for the outside, and not at all for the inside of religion; they were more desirous and solicitous to appear pious to men, than to approve themselves so towards God. This is illustrated by two similitudes:

First. They are compared to a vessel that is clean washed on the outside, but all dirt within, ver. 25, 26. The Pharisees placed religion in that which, at best, was but a point of decency, the washing of cups, Mar. vii. 4; they were in care to eat their meat in clean cups and platters, but made no conscience of getting their meat by extortion, and using it to excess. Now what a foolish thing would it be for a man to wash only the outside of a cup, which is to be looked at; and to leave the inside dirty, which is to be used: so they who only avoid scandalous sins, that would spoil their reputation with men, but allow themselves in heart wickedness, which renders them odious to the pure and holy God. In reference to this, Observe, 1. The practice of the Pharisees: they made clean the outside. In those things which fell under the observation of their neighbours, they seemed very exact; and carried on their wicked intrigues with so much artifice, that their wickedness was not suspected: people generally took them for very good men; but within, in the recesses of their hearts, and the close retirements of their lives, they were full of extortion and excess, of violence and incontinence; so Dr. Hammond; that is, of injustice and intemperance; while they would seem to be godly, they were neither sober nor righteous; their inward part was very wickedness, Ps. v. 9; and that we are really, that we are inwardly. 2. The rule Christ gives in opposition to this practice, ver. 26. It is addressed to the blind Pharisee. They thought themselves the seers of the land, Jno. ix. 40; but Christ calls them blind. Note, Those are blind in Christ's account, who (how quick-sighted soever they are in other things) are strangers, and no enemies, to the wickedness of their own hearts; that see not, and hate not, the secret sin that lodgeth there. Self-ignorance is the most shameful and hurtful ignorance, Rev. iii. 17. The rule is, "cleanse first that which is within." Note, The principal care of every one of us should be, to wash our hearts from wickedness, Jer. iv. 14. The main business of a Christian lies within, to get cleansed from the filthiness of the spirit. Corrupt affections and inclinations,—the secret lusts that lurk in the soul, unseen and unobserved,—those must first be mortified and subdued; those sins must be conscientiously abstained from, which the eye of God only is a witness to, who searcheth the heart. Observe, The method prescribed: "cleanse first that which is within;" not that only, but that first; because, if due care be taken concerning that, the outside will be clean also. External motives and inducements may keep the outside clean, while the inside is filthy; but by renewing, sanctifying grace make clean the inside, that will have an influence upon the outside, for the commanding principle is within. If the heart be well kept, all is well: "for out of it are the issues of life;" the eruptions will vanish of course: if the heart and spirit be made new, there will be a newness of life: here, therefore, we must begin with ourselves; "first cleanse that which is within;" we then make sure work, when this is our first work.

Secondly. They are compared to whitened sepulchres, ver. 27, 28. 1. They were fair without; "like sepulchres, which appear beautiful outward." Some make it to refer to the custom of the Jews to whiten graves, only for the notifying of them, especially if they were in unusual places, that people might avoid them, because of the ceremonial pollution contracted by the touch of a grave, Num. xix. 16. And it was part of the charge of the overseers of the highways to repair that whitening when it was decayed. Sepulchres were thus made remarkable, 2 Kin. xxiii. 16, 17. The formality of hypocrites, by which they study to recommend themselves to the world, doth but make all wise and good men the more careful to avoid them, for fear of being defiled by them: "Beware of the scribes," Lu. xx. 46. It rather alludes to the custom of whitening the sepulchres of eminent persons, for the beautifying of them. It is said here, ver. 29, that they garnished "the sepulchres of the righteous," as it is usual with us to erect monuments upon the graves of great persons, and to strew flowers on the graves of dear friends. Now, the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees was like the ornaments of a grave, or the dressing up of a dead body, only for show. The top of their ambition was to appear righteous before men, and to be applauded and had in admiration by them. But, 2. They were foul within, like sepulchres, "full of dead men's bones and all uncleanness;" so vile are our bodies when the soul has deserted them. Thus were they full of hypocrisy and iniquity. Hypocrisy is the worst iniquity of all other. Note, It is possible for those that have their hearts full of sin, yet to have their lives free from blame, and to appear very good. But what will it avail us to have the good word of our fellow-servants, if our Master do not say, "Well done?" When all other graves are opened, these whitened sepulchres will be looked into, and the dead men's bones and all the uncleanness shall be brought out, and be spread before all the host of heaven, Jer. viii. 1, 2; for it is the day when God shall judge, not the shows, but the secrets of men: and it will then be small comfort to them who shall have their portion with hypocrites, to remember how creditably and plausibly they went to hell, applauded by all their neighbours.

VII. They pretended a deal of kindness for the memory of the prophets that were dead and gone, while they hated and persecuted those that were present with them. This is put last, because it was the blackest part of their character. God is jealous for his honour in his laws and ordinances, and resents it, if they be profaned and abused; but he has often expressed a no less jealousy for his honour in his prophets and ministers, and resents it worse, if they be wronged and persecuted; and therefore, when our Lord Jesus comes to this head, he speaks more fully than upon any of the other, ver. 29–37; for he that toucheth his ministers, toucheth his anointed, and toucheth the apple of his eye. Observe, here,

First. The respect which the scribes and Pharisees pretended for the prophets that were gone, ver. 29, 30. This was the varnish, and that in which they outwardly appeared righteous. 1. They honoured the relics of the prophets; they built their tombs, and garnished their sepulchres. In seems the places of their burial were known: David's sepulchre was with them, Acts ii. 29. There was a title upon the sepulchre of the man of God, 2 Kin. xxiii. 17; and Josiah thought it respect enough not to move his bones, ver. 28. But they would do more, rebuild and beautify them. Now consider this, 1st. As an instance of honour done to deceased prophets, who, while they lived, were counted as the outscouring of all things, and had all manner of evil spoken against them falsely. Note, God can extort, even from bad men, an acknowledgment of the honour of piety and holiness. Them that honour God, he will honour; and sometimes with those from whom contempt is expected, 2 Sam. vi. 27. "The memory of the just is blessed," when the names of those that hated and persecuted them shall be covered with shame. The honour of constancy and resolution in the way of duty will be a lasting honour; and sense to modern ears; the meaning is, "he is bound," or under an obligation to perform his oath. The Syriac idiom scarcely distinguishes between guilt, condemnation, and debt, the notion being that of liability or accountableness.

xxiii. 23. To "tithe" is either to exact or to render a tenth. Here the word is employed to denote that the scribes and Pharisees gave tithes so carefully that even the herbs of their gardens were not overlooked. Yet these punctilious observers of ceremony neglected the vital obligations of God's law. They scrupulously paid their tithes, but were too often unjust, unmerciful, and unfaithful; very much as happens in our own day. Anise is believed to be the plant called dill, which is grown in the East, and is mentioned in the Talmud as liable to tithe. Cummin is similarly cultivated for domestic purposes, as also is mint, which is said to be one of the bitter herbs eaten at the Passover with the lamb.

xxiii. 24. To "strain at a gnat" in colloquial English is to swallow those that are manifest to God, will be manifest in the consciences of those about them. 2nd. As an instance of the hypocrisy of the scribes and Pharisees, who paid this respect to them. Note, Carnal people can easily honour the memories of faithful ministers that are dead and gone; because they do not reprove them, nor disturb them in their sins. Dead prophets are seers that see not, and those they can bear well enough; they do not torment them, as the living witnesses do, that bear their testimony, viva voce,—"with a living voice," Rev. xi. 10. They can pay a respect to the writings of the dead prophets, which tell them what they should be; but not the reproofs of the living prophets, which tell them what they are. Sit divus, modo non sit vivus,—"Let there be saints, but let them not be living here." The extravagant respect which the church of Rome pays to the memory of saints departed, especially the martyrs, dedicating days and places to their names, enshrining their relics, praying to them, and offering to their images, while they make themselves drunk with the blood of the saints of their own day, is a manifest proof that they not only succeed, but exceed, the scribes and Pharisees, in a counterfeit, hypocritical religion, which builds the prophets' tombs, but hates the prophets' doctrine.

2. They protested against the murder of them, ver. 30: "If we had been in the days of our fathers, we would not have been partakers with them." They would never have consented to the silencing of Amos, and the imprisonment of Micahiah; to the putting of Hanani in the stocks, and Jeremiah in the dungeon; to the stoning of Zechariah, and the mocking of all the messengers of the Lord, and the abuses put upon his prophets: no, not they; they would sooner have lost their right hands than have done any such thing: "What! is thy servant a dog?" And yet they were at this time plotting to murder Christ, to whom all the prophets bare witness. They think, if they had lived in the days of the prophets, they would have heard them gladly, and obeyed; and yet rebelled against the light that Christ brought into the world. But it is certain a Herod and a Herodias to John Baptist, would have been an Ahab and a Jezebel to Elijah. Note, The deceitfulness of sinners' hearts appears very much in this, that while they go down the stream of the sins of their own day, they fancy they should have swum against the stream of the sins of the former days; that if they had had other people's opportunities, they would have improved them more faithfully; had been in other people's temptations, they would have resisted them more vigorously; when yet they improve not the opportunities they have, nor resist the temptations they are in. We are sometimes thinking, If we had lived when Christ was upon earth, how constantly we would have followed him; we would not have despised and rejected him, as they then did; and yet Christ, in his Spirit, in his Word, in his ministers, is still no better treated.

Secondly. Their enmity and opposition to Christ and his Gospel notwithstanding, and the ruin they were bringing upon themselves, and upon that generation thereby, ver. 31-33. Observe here, 1. The indictment proved: "Ye be witnesses against yourselves." Note, There are no hopes for sinners' escaping the judgment of Christ, for want of proof against them, when it is easy to find them witnesses against themselves; and their very pleas will not only be overruled, but turned to their conviction; and their own tongues shall be made to fall upon them, Ps. lxxviii. 8. 1st. By their own confession, it was the great wickedness of their forefathers to kill the prophets; so that they knew the fault of it, and yet were themselves guilty of the same fact. Note, They who condemn sin in others, and yet allow the same or worse in themselves, are of all others most inexcusable, Rom. i. 32; ii. 1: they knew they ought not to have been partakers with persecutors, and yet were the followers of them. Such self-contradictions now will amount to self-condemnation in the great day. Christ puts another construction upon their building of the tombs of the prophets, than what they intended; as if, beautifying their graves, they justified their murderers, Lu. xi. 48; for they persisted in the sin. 2nd. By their own confession, these notorious persecutors were their ancestors "ye are the children of them." They meant no more but that they were their children by blood and nature; but Christ turns it upon them, that they were so by spirit and disposition: You are of those fathers, and their lusts you will do. They are, as you say, your fathers, and you do partizare,—"take after your fathers." It is the sin that runs in the blood among you: "As your fathers did, so do ye," Acts vii. 51. They came of a persecuting breed, were a seed of evil doers, Isa. i. 4; risen up in their fathers' stead, Num. xxxii. 14. Malice, and envy, and cruelty were bred in the bone with them; and they had formerly espoused it for a principle, to do as their fathers did, Jer. xlv. 17. And it is observable here, ver. 30, how careful they are to mention the relation; 'they were our fathers that killed the prophets; and they were men in honour and power, whose sons and successors we are.' If they had detested the wickedness of their ancestors, as they ought to have done, they would not have been so fond to call them their fathers; for it is no credit to be akin to persecutors, though they had never so much dignity and dominion.

2. The sentence passed upon them. Christ here proceeds, 1st. To give them up to the sin, as irreclaimable, ver. 32: "Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers." If Ephraim be joined to idols, and hate to be reformed, let him alone. "He that is filthy, let him be filthy still." Christ knew they were now contriving his death, and in a few days would accomplish it. "Well," saith he, "go on with your plot, take your course: walk in the way of your heart, and in the sight of your eyes, and see what will come of it." "What thou doest, do quickly." "You will but fill up the measure of guilt, which will then overflow in a deluge of wrath." Note, First. There is a measure of sin to be filled up, before utter ruin comes upon persons and families, churches and nations. God will bear long, but the time will come when he can no longer forbear, Jer. xlv. 22. We read of the measure of the Amorites, that was to be filled, Gen. xvi. 16; and the harvest of the earth being ripe for the sickle, Rev. xiv. 15, 19; and of sinners making an end to deal treacherously, arriving to a full stature in treachery, Isa. xxxiii. 1. Secondly. Children fill up the measure of their fathers' sins, when they are gone, if they persist in the same, or the like. That national guilt, which brings national ruin, is made up of the sin of many, in several ages; and in the successions of societies there is a score going on: for God justly visits the iniquity of the fathers upon the children that tread in the steps of it. Thirdly. Persecuting Christ, and his people, and ministers, is a sin that fills the measure of a nation's guilt sooner than any other. This was it that brought wrath without remedy upon the fathers, 2 Chr. xxxvi. 16; and wrath to the utmost upon the children too, 1 Thes. ii. 16. This was that fourth transgression which, when added to the other three, the Lord would not turn away the punishment, Am. i. 3, 6, 9, 11, 13. Fourthly. It is just with God to give those up to their own hearts' lusts that obstinately persist in the gratification of them. Those that will run headlong to ruin, let the reins be laid in their neck; and it is the saddest condition a man can be in on this side hell. 2nd. He proceeds to give them up to the ruin, as irrecoverable, to a personal ruin in the other world, ver. 33: "Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell?" These are strange words to come from the mouth of Christ, into whose lips grace was poured; but he can, and will, speak terror; and in these words he explains and sums up the eight woes he had denounced against the scribes and Pharisees. Here is, First. Their description: "Ye serpents." Doth Christ call names? Yes; but this doth not warrant us to do so. He infallibly knew what was in man; and knew them to be subtle as serpents; cleaving to the earth, feeding on dust; they had a specious outside, but were within malignant; had poison under their tongues, the seed of the old serpent. They were "a generation of vipers;" they, and those that went before them: they, and those that joined with them, were a generation of envenomed, enraged, spiteful adversaries to Christ and his Gospel. They loved to be called of men Rabbi, Rabbi; but Christ calls them serpents and vipers; for he gives men their true characters, and delights to put contempt upon the proud. Secondly. Their doom. He represents their condition as very sad, and in a manner desperate: "How can ye escape the damnation of hell?" Christ himself preached hell and damnation, for which his ministers have often been reproached by those that care not to hear it. Note, 1st. "The damnation of hell" will be the fearful end of all impenitent sinners. This doom, coming from Christ, was more terrible than coming from all the prophets and ministers that ever were; for he is the Judge, into whose hands the keys of hell and death are put; and his saying they were damned, made them so. 2nd. There is a way of escaping this damnation; this is implied here: some are delivered from the wrath to come. 3rd. Of all sinners, those who are of the spirit of the scribes and Pharisees are least likely to escape this damnation; for repentance and faith are necessary to that escape; and how will they be brought to these, who are so conceited of themselves, and so prejudiced against Christ and his Gospel as they were? How could they be healed and saved, that would not bear to have their wound searched, nor the balm of Gilead applied to it? Publicans and harlots, who were sensible of their disease, and applied themselves to the Physician, were more likely to "escape the damnation of hell" than those, who, though they were in the high road to it, were confident they were in the way to heaven.

34 Wherefore, behold, I send unto you prophets, and wise men, and scribes: and some of them ye shall kill and crucify; and some of them shall ye scourge in your synagogues, and persecute them from city to city: 35 That upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from the blood of righteous Abel unto the blood of Zacharias son of Barachias, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar. 36 Verily I say unto you, All these things shall come upon this generation. 37 O Jerusalem Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not! 38 Behold, your house is left unto you desolate. 39 For I say unto you, Ye shall not see me henceforth, till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord.

We have left the blind leaders fallen into the ditch under Christ's sentence, into the damnation of hell; let us see what will become of the blind followers of the body of the Jewish church, and particularly Jerusalem.

1. Jesus Christ designs yet to try them with the means of grace: "I send unto you prophets, and wise men, and scribes." The connexion is strange: You are a generation of vipers, not likely to escape the damnation of hell; one would think it should follow, Therefore you shall never have a prophet sent to you any more; no, "therefore I will send you prophets," to see if you will yet at length be wrought upon, or else to leave you inexcusable, and to justify God in your ruin. It is therefore ushered in with a note of admiration, Behold! Observe, First. It is Christ that sends them: "I send." By this he avows himself to be God, having power to gift and commission prophets. It is an act of kingly office; he sends them as ambassadors, to treat with us about the concerns of our souls. After his resurrection he made this word good, when he said, "So send I you," Mat. xx. 21. Though now he appeared mean, yet he was intrusted with this great authority. Secondly, He sends them to the Jews first: "I send them to you." They began at Jerusalem, and wherever they went they observed this rule, to make the first tender of gospel grace to the Jews, Acts xiii. 46. Thirdly, Those he sends are called "prophets, wise men, and scribes,"—Old Testament names for New Testament officers; to shew that the ministers sent to them now, should not be inferior to the prophets of the Old Testament, to Solomon the wise, or Ezra the scribe. The extraordinary ministers, which in the first ages were divinely inspired, were as the prophets, commissioned immediately from Heaven; the ordinary settled ministers that were then, and continue in the church still, and will do to the end of time, are as the wise men and scribes, to guide and instruct the people in the things of God. Or, we may take the apostles and evangelists for the prophets and wise men, and the pastors and teachers for the scribes, instructed to the kingdom of Heaven, ch. xiii. 52; for the office of a scribe was honourable, till the men dishonoured it.

II. He foresees and foretells the ill usage that his messengers would meet with among them: "Some of them ye shall kill, and crucify;" and yet I will send them. Christ knows beforehand how ill his servants will be treated, and yet sends them, and appoints them their measure of sufferings; yet he loves them never the less for his thus exposing them, for he designs to glorify himself by their sufferings, and them after them; and will balance them, though not prevent them. Observe, First. The cruelty of these persecutors: "ye shall kill, and crucify them." It is no less than the blood, the life-blood, that they thirst after; their lust is not satisfied with anything short of their destruction, Ez. xv. 9. They killed the two Jameses, crucified Simon the son of Cleophas, and scourged Peter and John; thus did the members partake of the sufferings of the Head; he was killed and crucified, and so were they. Christians must expect to resist unto blood. Secondly. Their unwearied industry: "Ye shall persecute them from city to city." As the apostles went from city to city to preach the Gospel, the Jews dodged them, and haunted them, and stirred up persecution against them, Acts xiv. 19; xvii. 13. They that did not believe in Judea, were more bitter enemies to the Gospel than any other unbelievers, Rom. xv. 31. Thirdly. The pretence of religion in this: they scourged them in it with difficulty; but it is now generally understood that the Greek means to "strain out." The Jews could not swallow the gnat, but they carefully strained their liquor to avoid it.

xxiii. 25. The religion which is here condemned is that which has more regard to external observances than to internal excellence.

xxiii. 27. Once a year, on the 15th day of the month Adar, the tombs were whitewashed or whitened with a kind of chalk or lime—a practice which was justified by Ezek. xxxix. 15, and was observed not only for the sake of appearance, but to render such places conspicuous, and therefore easily to be avoided. The Jews regarded all connected with the dead as unclean, and therefore never venerated the relics which occupy so prominent a position in some perverted forms of Christianity, especially the Romish.

xxiii. 29. Observe, however, that the Jews erected monuments to some, and decorated the sepulchres of others who had been famous in their lives.

their synagogues, their places of worship, where they kept their ecclesiastical courts; so that they did it as a piece of service to the church; cast them out, and said, "Let the Lord be glorified," Isa. lvi. 5; Jno. xvi. 2.

III. He imputes the sin of their fathers to them, because they imitated it: "That upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth," ver. 35, 36. Though God bear long with a persecuting generation, he will not bear always; and patience abused turns into the greatest wrath. The longer sinners have been heaping up treasures of wickedness, the deeper and fuller will the treasures of wrath be; and the breaking of them up will be like breaking up the fountains of the great deep. Observe,

First. The extent of this imputation. It takes in "all the righteous blood shed upon the earth," that is, the blood shed for righteousness' sake, which has all been laid up in God's treasury, and not a drop of it lost; for it is precious, Ps. lxxii. 14. He dates the account "from the blood of righteous Abel;" thence this Eva Martyrum.—Age of martyrs,—doth commence; he is called "righteous Abel," for he obtained witness from heaven that he was righteous; "God testifying of his gifts." How early did martyrdom come into the world! The first that died, died for his religion; and continues to cry against all that "walk in the way of Cain," and hate and persecute their brethren, because their works are righteous. He extends it to the blood of Zechariah the son of Barachias, ver. 36; not Zechariah the prophet, though he was the son of Barachias, Zec. i. 1, as some would have it; nor Zechariah the father of John Baptist, as others say; but, as is most probable, Zechariah the son of Jehoiada, who was "slain in the court of the Lord's house," 2 Chr. xxiv. 20, 21; his father is called Barachias, which signifies much the same with Jehoiada, and it was usual among the Jews for the same person to have two names; "Whom ye slew;" ye of this nation, though not of this generation. This is instanced in, because the requiring of that is particularly spoken of, 2 Chr. xxiv. 22, as that of Abel's is: the Jews imagined that the captivity had sufficiently atoned for that guilt, but Christ lets them know it was not yet fully accounted for, but remained upon the score. And some think this is mentioned with a prophetic hint, for there was one Zechariah, the son of Baruch, whom Josephus speaks of, De Bel. Judaic. lib. v. c. 1, that was a just and good man, who was killed in the temple, a little before it was destroyed by the Romans. Archbishop Tillotson thinks Christ doth both allude to the history of the former Zechariah in Chronicles, and foretell the death of this latter in Josephus: though the latter was not yet slain, yet before this destruction comes, it would be true that they had slain him; so that all shall be put together from first to last.

Secondly. The effect of it: "all these things shall come," all the guilt of this blood, all the punishment of it, it shall all come upon this generation. The misery and ruin that is coming upon them shall be so very great, that though considering the evil of their own sins, it was less than even those deserved, yet comparing it with other judgments, it would seem to be a general reckoning for all the wickedness of their ancestors, especially their persecutions; to all which God declared this ruin to have special reference and relation. The destruction shall be so dreadful, as if God had once for all arraigned them for all the righteous blood shed in the world. "It shall come upon this generation;" which intimates, that it shall come quickly; some here shall live to see it. Note, The sorer and nearer the punishment of sin is, the louder is the call to repentance and reformation.

IV. He laments the wickedness of Jerusalem, and justly upbraids them with the many kind offers he had made them, ver. 37. See with what concern he speaks of that city: "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem;" the repetition is emphatical, and speaks abundance of commiseration. A day or two before, Christ had wept over Jerusalem, now he sighed and groaned over it; Jerusalem, the vision of peace, so it signifies, must now be the seat of war and confusion; Jerusalem, that had been the joy of the whole earth, must now be a hissing, and an astonishment, and a by-word; Jerusalem, that has been a city compact together, shall now be shattered and ruined by its own intestine broils; Jerusalem, the place that God has chosen to put his name there, shall now be abandoned to the spoil, and the robbers, Lam. i. 1; iv. 1. But wherefore will the Lord do all this to Jerusalem? Why, "Jerusalem hath grievously sinned," Lam. i. 8.

First. She persecuted God's messengers: "thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto thee." This sin is especially charged upon Jerusalem, because there the sanhedrim, or great council, sat, who took cognizance of church matters, and therefore a prophet could not perish but in Jerusalem, Lu. xiii. 33. It is true they had not now a power to put any man to death, but they killed the prophets in popular tumults, mobbed them, as Stephen, and put the Roman powers on to kill them. At Jerusalem, where the Gospel was first preached, it was first persecuted, Acts viii. 1; and that place was the head quarters of the persecutors; thence warrants were issued out to other cities, and thither the saints were brought bound, Acts ix. 2. "Thou stonest them;" that was a capital punishment, in use only among the Jews; by the law false prophets and seducers were to be stoned, Deu. xiii. 10; under colour of which law they put the true prophets to death. Note, It has often been the artifice of Satan to turn that artillery against the church, which was originally planted in the defence of it. Brand the true prophets as seducers, and the true professors of religion as heretics and schismatics, and then it will be easy to persecute them. There was abundance of other wickedness in Jerusalem, but this was the sin that made the loudest cry, and which God had an eye to more than any other, in bringing that ruin upon them; as 2 Kin. xxiv. 4; 2 Chr. xxxvi. 16. Observe, Christ speaks in the present tense; "thou killest, and stonest;" for all they had done, and all they would do, was present to Christ's notice.

Secondly. She refused and rejected Christ and gospel offers. The former was a sin without remedy, this against the remedy. Here is, 1. The wonderful grace and favour of Jesus Christ towards them: "How often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen gathers her chickens under her wings." Thus kind and condescending are the offers of gospel grace, even to Jerusalem's children, as bad as she is, the inhabitants, the little ones, not excepted. 1st. The favour proposed, was the gathering of them. Christ's design is to gather poor souls, gather them in from their wanderings, gather them home to himself, as the centre of unity; for to him must the gathering of the people be. He would have taken the whole body of the Jewish nation into the church, and so gathered them all (as the Jews used to speak of proselytes) under the wings of the Divine Majesty; it is here illustrated by a humble similitude, as a hen clucks her chickens together. Christ would have gathered them, First. With such a tenderness of affection as the hen doth, that has by instinct a strange concern for her young ones: Christ's gathering souls comes from his love, Jer. xxxi. 3. Secondly. For the same end: the hen "gathereth her chickens under her wings" for protection and safety, and for warmth and comfort. Poor souls have in Christ both refuge and refreshment. The chickens naturally run to the hen for shelter, when they are threatened by the birds of prey. Perhaps Christ refers to that promise, Ps. xci. 4, "He shall cover thee with his feathers." There is healing under Christ's wings, Mal. iv. 2; that is more than the hen has for her chickens. 2nd. The forwardness of Christ to confer this favour. His offers are, First. Very free: "I would have done it." Jesus Christ is truly willing to receive and save poor souls that come to him: he desires not their ruin; he delights in their repentance. Secondly. Very frequent: "how often." Christ often came up to Jerusalem, preached and wrought miracles there; and the meaning of all this was, he would have gathered them. He keeps account how often his calls have been repeated. As often as we have heard the sound of the Gospel, as often as we have felt the strivings of the Spirit so often Christ would have gathered us.

Thirdly. Their wilful refusal of this grace and favour; "Ye would not." How emphatically is their obstinacy opposed to Christ's mercy! "I would, and ye would not." He was willing to save them, but they were not willing to be saved by him. Note, It is wholly owing to the wicked wills of sinners, that they are not gathered under the wings of the Lord Jesus. They did not like the terms upon which Christ proposed to gather them, and loved their sins, and yet trusted to their righteousness; they would not submit, either to the grace of Christ, or to his government; and so the bargain broke off.

V. He reads Jerusalem's doom, ver. 38, 39: "Therefore, behold, your house is left unto you desolate;" both the city and the temple, God's house and their own, all shall be laid waste. But it is especially meant of the temple, which they boasted of, and trusted to: that holy mountain, because of which they were so haughty. Note, They that will not be gathered by the love and grace of Christ, shall be consumed and scattered by his wrath. "I would, and you would not;" "Israel would none of me, so I gave them up," Ps. lxxxi. 11, 12.

First. Their house shall be deserted: "it is left unto you." Christ was now departing from the temple, and never came to it again, but by this word abandoned it to ruin. They doted on it, would have it to themselves; Christ must have no room or interest there: "Well," saith Christ, "it is left to you; take it, and make your best of it; I will never have anything more to do with it." They had made it a house of merchandise, and a den of thieves, and so it is left to them. Not long after this the voice was heard in the temple, "Let us depart hence." When Christ went, Ichabod, the glory departed. Their city also was left to them, destitute of God's presence and grace. He was no longer a wall of fire about them, nor the glory in the midst of them.

Secondly. It shall be desolate: "it is left unto you desolate;" it is left ἐρημος, a wilderness. 1. It was immediately, when Christ left it, in the eyes of all that understood themselves, a very dismal, melancholy place: Christ's departure makes the best furnished, best replenished place a wilderness; though it be the temple, the chief place of converse: for what comfort can there be where Christ is not? Though there may be a crowd of other contentments, yet if Christ's special spiritual presence be withdrawn, that soul, that place, is become a wilderness, a land of darkness, a darkness itself; and this comes of men's rejecting Christ, and driving him away from them. 2. It was, not long after, destroyed and ruined, and not one stone left upon another. The lot of Jerusalem's enemies, will now become Jerusalem's lot; to be "made of a city a heap; of a defended city a ruin," Isa. xxv. 2: a lofty city laid low, even to the ground, Isa. xxvi. 5. The temple, that holy and beautiful house, became desolate. When God goes out, all enemies break in.

VI. Here is the final farewell that Christ took of them and their temple: "Ye shall not see me henceforth, till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh." This speaks,

First. His departure from them. The time was at hand when he should leave the world to go to his Father, and be seen no more: after his resurrection he was seen only by a few chosen witnesses, and they saw him not long; but he soon removed to the invisible world, and there will be till the time of the restitution of all things; when his welcome at his first coming will be repeated with loud acclamations, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." Christ will not be seen again till he comes in the clouds, "and every eye shall see him," Rev. i. 7; and then, even they who, when time was, rejected and pierced him, will be glad to come in among his adorers: then every knee shall bow to him, even those that had bowed to Baal; and even the workers of iniquity will then cry, "Lord, Lord," and will own, when his wrath is kindled, that "Blessed are all they that put their trust in him." Would we have our lot in that day, with those that say, "Blessed is he that cometh;" let us be with them now, with them that truly worship and truly welcome Jesus Christ.

Secondly. Their continued blindness and obstinacy: "Ye shall not see me;" that is, not see me to be the Messiah, (for otherwise they did see him upon the cross), not see the light of the truth concerning me, nor the things that belong to your peace, till ye shall say, "Blessed is he that cometh." They will never be convinced till Christ's second coming convince them; when it will be too late to make an interest in him, and nothing will remain but "a fearful looking for of judgment." Note, 1. Wilful blindness is often punished with judicial blindness: if they will not see, they shall not see; with this word he concludes his public preaching. After his resurrection, which was the sign of the prophet Jonas, they should have no other sign given them, till they should see the sign of the Son of man, ch. xxiv. 30. 2. When the Lord comes with ten thousand of his saints, he will convince all, and will force acknowledgments from the proudest of his enemies, of his being the Messiah; and even they shall be found liars to him. They that would not now come at his call, shall then be forced to depart with his curse. The chief priests and scribes were displeased with the children for crying hosanna to Christ; but the day is coming when proud persecutors would gladly be found in the condition of the meanest and poorest they now trample upon. They who now reproach and ridicule the hosannas of the saints, will be of another mind shortly; it were therefore better to be of that mind now. Some make this to refer to the conversion of the Jews to the faith of Christ; then they shall see him, and own him, and say, "Blessed is he that cometh;" but it seems rather to look further, for the complete manifestation of Christ, and conviction of sinners, is reserved to be the glory of the last day.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Christ's preaching was mostly practical; but in this chapter we have a prophetic discourse, a prediction of things to come; but such as had a practical tendency, and was intended not to gratify the curiosity of his disciples, but to guide their consciences and conversations; and it is therefore concluded with a practical application. The church has always had particular prophecies, besides general promises, both for direction and for encouragement of believers; but it is observable, Christ preached this prophetic sermon in the close of his ministry, as the Apocalypse is the last book of the New Testament, and the prophetic books of the Old Testament are placed last, to intimate to us, that we must be well grounded in plain truths and duties, and those must first be well digested, before we dive into those things that are dark and difficult; many run themselves into confusion, by beginning their Bible at the wrong end. Now in this chapter we have, I. The occasion of this discourse, ver. 1—3. II. The discourse itself: in which, 1. The prophecy of divers events, especially referring to the destruction of Jerusalem, and the utter ruin of the Jewish church and nation, which was now hastening on, and was completed about forty years after; the preface to that destruction, the concomitants, and consequences of it; yet looking further to Christ's coming at the end of time, and the consummation of all things, of which that was a type and figure, ver. 4—31. 2. The practical application of this prophecy for the awakening and quickening of his disciples, to prepare for these great and awful things, ver. 32—51.

xxiii. 32. Lange notes that "Chrysostom says this was spoken prophetically; Grotius, permissively. De Wette and Meyer make it an ironical imperative. If this is irony, it is Divine irony." The Pharisees were even now scheming how they might put him to death.

xxiii. 34. The language here rises to a sublime elevation, which is truly heroic, and in it Jesus exhibits himself in a more emphatic manner than before in this Gospel, arrayed in the full grandeur of Messianic dignity. The prophets, wise men, and scribes of the nature are sent by him: "Behold, I send unto you prophets," &c. Language like this represents the claim to authority more than human, and is fatal to Unitarian principles.

xxiii. 37. On the words "as a hen," &c., commentators have remarked that the figure of a hen was often used by the rabbins of the Shechinah, as gathering the proselytes under the shadow of its wings. The children of Jerusalem are the citizens, though all Israel seems to be implied.

AND Jesus went out, and departed from the temple: and his disciples came to him for to shew him the buildings of the temple. 2 And Jesus said unto them, See ye not all these things? verily I say unto you, There shall not be left here one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down. 3 And as he sat upon the mount of Olives, the disciples came unto him privately, saying, Tell us, when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?

Here is, I. Christ's quitting the temple, and his public work there. He had said in the close of the foregoing chapter, "your house is left unto you desolate;" and here he made his words good, "he went out, and departed from the temple." The manner of expression is observable; he not only went out of the temple, but departed from it, took his final farewell of it; he departed from it, never to return to it any more; and then immediately follows a prediction of its ruin. Note, That house is left desolate indeed which Christ leaves. "Woe unto them when I depart," Hos. ix. 12; Jer. vi. 8. It was now time to groan out their lachrymation, "The glory is departed;" "their defence is departed." Three days after this, the veil of the temple was rent: when Christ left it, all became common and unclean. But Christ departed not till they drove him away; did not reject them till they first rejected him.

II. His private discourse with his disciples. He left the temple; but he did not leave the twelve, who were the seed of the gospel church; which the casting off of the Jews was the enriching of. When he left the temple, his disciples left it too, and came to him. Note, It is good being where Christ is, and leaving that which he leaves. They came to him to be instructed in private, when his public preaching was over; for the "secret of the Lord is with them that fear him." He had spoken of the destruction of the Jewish church to the multitude in parables, which here, as usual, he explains to his disciples. Observe,

First. His disciples came to him, "to shew him the buildings of the temple." It was a stately and beautiful structure, one of the wonders of the world; no cost was spared, no art left untried, to make it sumptuous. Though it came short of Solomon's temple, and its beginning was small, yet its latter end did greatly increase. It was richly furnished with gifts and offerings, to which there were continual additions made. They shewed Christ these things, and desired him to take notice of them, either, 1. As being greatly pleased with them themselves, and expecting he should be so too. They had lived mostly in Galilee, at a distance from the temple, had seldom seen it, and therefore were the more struck with admiration at it; and thought he should admire as much as they did all this glory, Gen. xxxi. 1; and would have him divert himself after his preaching, and from his sorrow which they saw him perhaps almost overwhelmed with, with looking about him. Note, Even good men are apt to be too much enamoured with outward pomp and gaiety, and to overvalue it, even in the things of God; whereas we should be as Christ was, dead to it, and look upon it with contempt. The temple was indeed glorious; but, 1st. Its glory was sullied and stained with the sin of the priests and people. That wicked doctrine of the Pharisees, which preferred the gold before the temple that sanctified it, was enough to deface the beauty of all the ornaments of the temple. 2nd. Its glory was eclipsed, and outdone by the presence of Christ in it, who was "the glory of this latter house," Hag. ii. 9; so that the buildings had no glory in comparison with that glory which excelled; or 2. As pitying that this house should be left desolate; they "shewed him the buildings" as if they would move him to reverse the sentence: "Lord, let not this holy and beautiful house, where our fathers praised thee, be made a desolation." They forgot how many providences concerning Solomon's temple had manifested how little God cared for that outward glory, which they had so much admired, when the people were wicked, 2 Chr. vii. 21: "This house, which is high," sin will bring low. Christ had lately looked upon the precious souls, and wept for them, Lu. xix. 41. The disciples look upon the pompous buildings, and are ready to weep for them. In this, as in other things, his thoughts are not like ours. It was weakness, and meanness of spirit in the disciples, to be so fond of fine buildings—it was a childish thing. Animo magno nihil magnum,—"To a great mind nothing is great."—Seneca.

Secondly, Christ hereupon foretells the utter ruin and destruction that was coming upon this place, ver. 2. Note, A believing foresight of the defacing of all worldly glory, will help to take us off from admiring it, and overvaluing it. The most beautiful body will be shortly worm's meat; and the most beautiful building a ruinous heap. And shall we then set our eyes upon that which so soon is not? and look upon that with so much admiration, which ere long, we shall certainly look upon with so much contempt? "See ye not all these things?" They would have Christ look upon them, and be as much in love with them as they were: he would have them look upon them, and be as dead to them as he was. There is such a sight of these things as will do us good; so to see them, as to see through them; and see to the end of them. Christ, instead of reversing the degree, ratifies it: "Verily I say unto you, there shall not be left one stone upon another." 1. He speaks of it as a certain ruin: "I say unto you," I that know what I say, and know how to make good what I say. Take my word for it, it shall be so: I, the Amen, the true witness, say it to you. All judgment being committed to the Son, the threatenings as well as the promises are all yea and amen in him, Heb. vi. 17, 18. 2. He speaks of it as an utter ruin. The temple shall not only be stripped, and plundered, and defaced, but utterly demolished, and laid waste: "not one stone shall be left upon another." Notice is taken in the building of the second temple, of the laying of one stone upon another, Hag. ii. 15; and here, in the ruin, of not leaving one stone upon another. The story tells us, that this was fulfilled in the latter; for though Titus, when he took the city, did all he could to preserve the temple, yet he could not restrain the enraged soldiers from destroying it utterly; and it was done to that degree, that Turnus Rufus ploughed up the ground on which it had stood; and that scripture was fulfilled, Mic. iii. 12: "Sion shall for your sake be ploughed as a field." And afterwards in Julian the apostate's time, when the Jews were encouraged by him to rebuild their temple, in opposition to the Christian religion, what remained of the ruins was quite pulled down, to level the ground for a new foundation; but the attempt was defeated by the miraculous eruption of fire out of the ground, which destroyed the foundation they laid, and frightened away the builders. Now this prediction of the final and irreparable ruin of the temple, includes a prediction of the period of the Levitical priesthood, and the ceremonial law.

Thirdly, The disciples, not disputing either the truth or the equity of this sentence, nor doubting of the accomplishment of it, inquire more particularly of the time when it should come to pass, and the signs of its approach, ver. 3. Observe, 1. Where they made this inquiry, privately, as he sat upon the mount of Olives; probably, he was returning to Bethany, and there sat down by the way to rest him. The mount of Olives directly faced the temple, and from thence he might have a full prospect of it at some distance. There he sat as a judge upon the bench; the temple and city before him as at the bar; and thus he passed sentence on them. We read, Eze. xi. 23, of the removing of the glory of the Lord from the temple to the mountain; so Christ, the great Shechinah, here removes to this mountain. 2. What the inquiry itself was: "When shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" Here are three questions which they put. 1st. Some think these questions do all point at one and the same thing: the destruction of the temple, and the period of the Jewish church and nation, which Christ had himself spoken of as his coming, ch. xvi. 28; and which would be "the consummation of the age;" for so it may be read, the finishing of that dispensation; or, they thought the destruction of the temple must needs be the end of the world. If that house be laid waste, the world cannot stand; for the rabbis used to say, that the house of the sanctuary was one of the seven things for the sake of which the world was made; and they think, if so, the world will not survive the temple. 2nd. Others think their question, "When shall these things be?" refers to the destruction of Jerusalem; and the other two to the end of the world; or, Christ's coming may refer to his setting up his gospel kingdom; and the end of the world to the day of judgment. I rather incline to think, that their question looked no further than the event Christ now foretold; but it appears by other passages, they had very confused thoughts of future events; so that, perhaps, it is not possible to put any certain construction upon this question of theirs. But Christ in his answer, though he doth not expressly rectify the mistakes of his disciples, that must be done by the pouring out of the Spirit, yet looks further than their question, and instructs his church, not only concerning the great events of that age, the destruction of Jerusalem, but concerning his second coming at the end of time: which here he insensibly slides into a discourse of; and of that, it is plain, he speaks in the next chapter, which is a continuation of this sermon.

4 And Jesus answered and said unto them, Take heed that no man deceive you. 5 For many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ; and shall deceive many. 6 And ye shall hear of wars and rumours of wars: see that ye be not troubled: for all these things must come to pass, but the end is not yet. 7 For nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom: and there shall be famines, and pestilences, and earthquakes, in divers places. 8 All these are the beginning of sorrows. 9 Then shall they deliver you up to be afflicted, and shall kill you: and ye shall be hated of all nations for my name's sake. 10 And then shall many be offended, and shall betray one another, and shall hate one another. 11 And many false prophets shall rise, and shall deceive many. 12 And because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold. 13 But he that shall endure unto the end, the same shall be saved. 14 And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come. 15 When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place, (whoso readeth, let him understand;) 16 Then let them which be in Judæa, flee into the mountains: 17 Let him which is on the housetop not come down to take any thing out of his house: 18 Neither let him which is in the field return back to take his clothes. 19 And woe unto them that are with child, and to them that give suck in those days! 20 But pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the sabbath day:

xxiii. 39. Three periods are proposed as intended here—the destruction of Jerusalem, the second advent, and the restoration of the Jews.

xiv. 1. Much has been said on our Lord's final departure from the Temple, as ominous or symbolical of the calamities which were impending. The Jewish writings record that about forty years before the fall of the Temple the central light of the holy candlestick became extinct, the scarlet wool on the horns of the scapegoat lost its colour, the lot of the Lord fell on the left hand, and the doors of the Temple, which were closed at night, were found open in the morning. About the same time the power to pronounce capital sentences was taken away, and the Sanhedrim lost its fixed place of sitting. All these things seemed to forebode greater disasters, and were so explained by the rabbins. It is exceedingly to be regretted that these words have not been left as the conclusion of chap. xiii. At the conclusion of his divine philippic, "Jesus went out and 21 For then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be. 22 And except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved: but for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened. 23 Then if any man shall say unto you, Lo, here is Christ, or there; believe it not. 24 For there shall arise false Christs, and false prophets, and shall shew great signs and wonders; insomuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect. 25 Behold, I have told you before. 26 Wherefore if they shall say unto you, Behold, he is in the desert; go not forth: behold, he is in the secret chambers; believe it not. 27 For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be. 28 For wheresoever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together. 29 Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken: 30 And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven: and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. 31 And he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other.

HOUSETOPS.—See ver. 17.

The disciples had asked concerning the times when these things should be, and Christ gives them no answer to that, after what number of days and years his prediction should be accomplished; for it is not for us to know the times, Acts i. 7; but they had asked, "What shall be the sign?" and that question he answers fully, for we are concerned to understand the signs of the times, ch. xvi. 3. Now the prophecy primarily respects the events near at hand: the destruction of Jerusalem, the period of the Jewish church and state, the calling of the Gentiles, and the setting up of Christ's kingdom in the world; but as the prophecies of the Old Testament, which have an immediate reference to the affairs of the Jews, and the revolutions of their state, yet under the figure of them, do certainly look further to the gospel church, and the kingdom of the Messiah, and are so expounded in the New Testament;—and such expressions are found in those predictions as are peculiar thereto, and not applicable otherwise;—so this prophecy, under the type of Jerusalem's destruction, looks as far forward as the general judgment; and, as is usual in prophecies, some passages are most applicable to the type, and others to the anti-type; and towards the close, as usual, it points more particularly to the latter. And it is observable, that what Christ here saith to his disciples, tends more to engage their caution, than to satisfy their curiosity; more to prepare them for the events that should happen, than to give them a distinct idea of the events themselves. This is that good understanding of the times we should all covet, from thence to infer what Israel ought to do. And so this prophecy is of standing, lasting use to the church, and will be so to the end of time; for "the thing that has been is that which shall be," Eccl. i. 5—7, 9; and the series, connexion, and presages of events, are much the same still that they were then: so that upon the prophecy of this chapter, pointing at that event, moral prognostications may be made, and such constructions of the signs of the times, as the wise man's heart will know how to improve.

1. Christ here foretells the going forth of deceivers. He begins with a caution: "Take heed that no man deceive you." They expected to be told when these things should be, to be let into that secret; but this caution is a check to their curiosity: "What is that you? Mind you your duty, follow me, and be not seduced from following me." Those that are most inquisitive concerning the secret things which belong not to them, are easiest imposed upon by seducers, 2 Thes. ii. 3. The disciples, when they heard that the Jews, their most inveterate enemies, should be destroyed, might be in danger of falling into security; 'Nay,' saith Christ, 'you are more exposed other ways: seducers are more dangerous enemies to the church than persecutors.' Three times in this discourse he mentions the false prophets appearing, which was 1. A presage of Jerusalem's ruin. Justly were they that killed the true prophets, left to be ensnared by false prophets; and that crucified the true Messiah, left to be deceived and broken by false Christs, and pretended Messiahs. The appearing of these was the occasion of dividing that people into parties and factions, which made their ruin the more easy and speedy; and the sin of the many that were led aside by them, helped to fill the measure. 2. It was a trial to the disciples of Christ; and therefore agreeable to their state of probation, that they which are perfect may be made manifest. Now concerning these deceivers, observe here.

First. The pretences they should come under: Satan acts most mischievously when he appears as an angel of light. The colour of the greatest good is often the cover of the greatest evil. 1. There should appear false prophets, ver. 11, 24; the deceivers would pretend to Divine inspiration, an immediate mission, and a spirit of prophecy, when it was all a lie. Such there had been formerly, Jer. xxiii. 16; Eze. xiii. 6; as was foretold, Deu. xiii. 3. Some think the seducers here pointed to, were such as had been settled teachers in the church, and had gained reputation as such; but afterwards betrayed the truth they had taught, and revolved to error; and from such the danger is the greater, because least suspected. One false traitor in the garrison, may do more mischief than a thousand avowed enemies without. 2. There should appear false Christs, coming in Christ's name, ver. 5; assuming to themselves the name peculiar to him, and saying, "I am Christ," pseudo-Christs, ver. 24. There was at that time a general expectation of the appearing of the Messiah: they spoke of him, as he that should come, but when he did come, the body of the nation rejected him; which those who were ambitious of making themselves a name took advantage of, and set up for Christs. Josephus speaks of several such impostors, between this and the destruction of Jerusalem: one Theudas, that was defeated by Cuspius Fadus; another, by Felix; another, by Festus. Dositheus said he was the Christ foretold by Moses, Origen adv. Cels.: see Acts v. 36, 37; xxi. 28: Simon Magus pretended to be "the great power of God," Acts viii. 10. In after ages there have been such pretenders, one about an hundred years after Christ, that called himself Barcochebas, 'the son of a star,' but proved Barcosba, 'the son of a lie'; and about fifty years ago, Sabbati-Levi, set up for a Messiah in the Turkish empire, and was hugely caressed by the Jews, but in a short time his folly was made manifest: see Sir Paul Ricaut's History. The Popish religion doth in effect set up a false Christ: the pope comes in Christ's name as his vicar, but invades and usurps all his offices; and so is a rival with him, and as such an enemy to him, a deceiver, and an anti-Christ. 3. These false Christs, and false prophets, would have their agents and emissaries busy in all places, to draw people in to them, ver. 23; then when public troubles are great and threatening, and people will be catching at any thing that looks like deliverance, then Satan will take the advantage of imposing on them; then they will say, 'Lo, here is a Christ, or there is one, but do not mind them. The true Christ did not strive or cry, nor was it said of him, Lo here, or, Lo there, Lu. xvii. 21; therefore, if any man say so concerning him, look upon it as a temptation. The hermits, that place religion in a monastical life, say, "he is in the desert;" the priests, who make the consecrated wafer to be Christ, say he is en tous rayons,—"in the cupboards," "in the secret chambers;" lo, he is in this shrine, in that image. Thus some appropriate Christ's spiritual presence to one party or persuasion, as if they had the monopoly of Christ and Christianity, and the kingdom of Christ must stand and fall, must live and die with them; lo, he is in this church, in that council; whereas Christ is all in all, not here or there: but meets his people with a blessing, in every place where he records his name.

Secondly. The proofs they should offer for the making good of these pretences: "They shall shew great signs and wonders," ver. 24; not true miracles those are a Divine seal, and with those the doctrine of Christ stands confirmed, and therefore if any offer to draw us from that by signs and wonders, we must have recourse to that rule given of old, Deu. xiii. 1—3: "If the sign or wonder come to pass," yet follow not him that would draw you to serve other gods, or believe in other Christs, for "the Lord your God proveth you." But these were lying wonders, wrought by Satan, (God permitting him,) who is "the prince of the power of the air," 2 Thes. ii. 9. It is not said they shall work miracles, but "they shall shew great signs;" they are but a show; either they impose upon men's credulity by false narratives, or deceive their senses by tricks of legerdemain, or arts of divination, as the magicians of Egypt by their enchantments.

Thirdly. The success they should have in these attempts. 1. They "shall deceive many," ver. 5, and again, ver. 11. Note, The devil and his instrument may prevail far in deceiving poor souls. Few find the strait gate, but many are drawn into the broad way; many will be imposed upon by their signs and wonders, and many drawn in by the hopes of deliverance from their oppressions. Note, Neither miracles nor multitudes are certain signs of a true church, for all the world wonders after the beast, Rev. xiii. 3. 2. They shall deceive, if it were possible, "the very elect," ver. 24. This speaks, 1st. The strength of the delusion; it is such as many shall be carried away by, (so strong shall the stream be,) even those that were thought to stand fast. Men's knowledge, gifts, learning, eminent station, and long profession, will not secure them; but notwithstanding these, many will be deceived; nothing but the almighty grace of God, pursuant to his eternal purpose, will be a protection. 2nd. The safety departed from the Temple;" with which words chap. xxiii. should have closed. The next fact, "and his disciples came to him," &c., though closely following in order of time, should have commenced the following chapter, if a chapter is needed at all. Josephus, in his "Antiquities" (book xv., chap. 11), gives a considerable account of the work of Herod upon the Temple here mentioned.

xxiv. 3. The word for "world" here properly signifies a period of time, and has no reference to the material structure of the globe. Hence various explanations have been suggested as to the period intended. Very likely the dispensation of Judaism was meant primarily.

of the elect, in the midst of this danger; which is taken for granted in that parenthesis, "if it were possible," plainly implying that it is not possible, for they are kept by the power of God, "that the purpose of God, according to the election, may stand." It is possible for those that have been enlightened to fall away, Heb. vi. 4-6, but not for those that were elect. If God's chosen ones should be deceived, God's choice would be defeated, which is not to be imagined, for whom he did predestinate, he called, justified, and glorified, Rom. viii. 30. They were given to Christ, and of all that were given to him, he will lose none, Jno. x. 28. Grotius will have this to be meant of the great difficulty of drawing the primitive Christians from their religion, and quotes it as used proverbially by Galen, when he would express a thing very difficult, and morally impossible, he saith, 'You may sooner draw away a Christian from Christ.'

Fourthly. The repeated cautions which our Saviour gives to his disciples to stand upon their guard against them. Therefore he gave them warning, that they might watch, ver. 25: "Behold, I have told you before." He that is told before where he will be assaulted, may save himself as the king of Israel did, 2 Kin. vi. 9, 10. Note, Christ's warnings are designed to engage our watchfulness; and though the elect shall be preserved from delusion, yet they shall be preserved by the use of appointed means, and a due regard to the cautions of the Word: we are kept through faith: faith in Christ's word, which he has told us before. 1. We must not believe those that say, "Lo, here is Christ, or, Lo, he is there," ver. 23. We believe that the true Christ is at the right hand of God, and that his spiritual presence is where two or three are gathered together in his name; believe not those therefore who would draw you off from a Christ in heaven, by telling you he is any where on earth; or draw you off from the catholic church on earth, by telling you he is here or he is there: believe it not. Note, There is not a greater enemy to true faith than vain credulity; the simple believeth every word, and runs after every cry; Μέμνησο ἀνθρώποι, — beware of believing. 2. We must not go forth after those that say, "He is in the desert, or, He is in the secret chambers," ver. 26; we must not hearken to every empiric and pretender, nor follow every one that puts up the finger to point us to a new Christ and a new Gospel; "go not forth," for if you do, you are in danger of being taken by them: therefore keep out of harm's way; "be not carried about with every wind;" many a man's vain curiosity to go forth hath led him into a fatal apostasy; your strength at such a time is to sit still, "to have the heart established with grace."

11. He foretells wars and great commotions among the nations, ver. 6, 7. When Christ was born there was a universal peace in the empire; the temple of Janus was shut; but think not that Christ came to send or continue such a peace, Lu. xii. 51; no, his city and his wall are to be built even in troublesome times, and even wars shall forward his work. From the time that the Jews rejected Christ, and he left their house desolate, the sword did never depart from their house; the sword of the Lord was never quiet, because he had given it a charge against an hypocritical nation, and the people of his wrath, and by it brought ruin upon them. Here is,

First. A prediction of the event of the day; you will now shortly "hear of wars, and rumours of wars;" when wars are, they will be heard, for "every battle of the warrior is with confused noise," Isa. ix. 5. See how terrible it is, Jer. iv. 19: Thou hast heard, O my soul, the alarm of wars; even the quiet in the land, and the least inquisitive after new things, cannot but hear the rumours of wars. See what comes of refusing the Gospel; those that will not hear the messengers of peace, shall be made to hear the messengers of war. God has a sword ready to avenge the quarrel of his covenant, his new covenant. "Nation shall rise up against nation," that is, one part or province of the Jewish nation against another, one city against another, 2 Chr. xv. 5, 6; and in the same province and city, one party or faction shall rise up against another, so that they shall be devoured by, and dashed in pieces against one another, Isa. ix. 19, 21.

Secondly. A prescription of the duty of the day: "See that ye be not troubled." Is that possible? To hear such sad news, and not be troubled? Yet where the heart is fixed, trusting in God, it is kept in peace, peace; and is not afraid; no, not of the evil tidings of wars and rumours of wars; no, not the noise of "Arm, arm." "Be not troubled," Μη θροισθε; be not put into confusion or commotion; not put into throes, as a woman with child, by a fright. "See that ye be not," ὑμᾶς. Note, There is need of constant care and watchfulness to keep trouble from the heart, when there are wars abroad; and it is against the mind of Christ that his people should have troubled hearts, even in troublous times. We must not be troubled, for two reasons: 1. Because we are bid to expect this. The Jews must be punished, ruin must be brought upon them; by this the justice of God and the honour of the Redeemer must be asserted, and therefore "all those things must come to pass;" the word is gone out of God's mouth, and it shall be accomplished in its season. Note, The consideration of the unchangeableness of the Divine counsels, which govern all events, would compose and quiet our spirits, whatever happens. God is but performing the thing that is appointed for us, and our inordinate trouble is an interpretative quarrel with that appointment. Let us therefore acquiesce, because these things must come to pass, not only necessitate decreti,—as the product of the Divine counsel, but necessitate medii,—as a means in order to a further end. The old house must be taken down (though it cannot be done without noise, and dust, and danger,) ere the new fabric can be erected: the things that are shaken (and ill shaken they were) must be removed, that the things which cannot be shaken may remain, Heb. xii. 27. 2. Because we are still to expect worse: "The end is not yet." The end of time is not, and while time lasts we must expect trouble, and that the end of one affliction will be but the beginning of another; or, the end of these troubles is not yet, there must be more judgments than one made use of to bring down the Jewish power. More vials of wrath must yet be poured out; there is but one woe passed, more woes are yet to come, more arrows are yet to be spent upon them out of God's quiver; therefore be not troubled, do not give way to fear and trouble, sink not under the present burthen, but rather gather in all the strength and spirit you have to encounter what is yet before you. Be not troubled to hear of wars and rumours of wars, for then what will become of you when the famines and pestilences come? If it be to us a vexation but to understand the report, Isa. xxviii. 19, what will it be to feel the stroke when it toucheth the bone and the flesh? If running with the footmen weary us, how shall we contend with horses? And if we be frightened at a little brook in our way, what shall we do in the swellings of Jordan? Jer. xii. 5.

III. He foretells other judgments more immediately sent of God: "Famines, and pestilences, and earthquakes." Famine is often the effect of war, and pestilence of famine. These were the three judgments which David was to choose one out of, and he was in a strait, for he knew not which was the worst; but what dreadful desolations will they make when they all pour in together upon a people? Besides war, and that is enough, there shall be,

First. Famine, signified by the black horse under the third seal, Rev. vi. 5, 6. We read of a famine in Judea, not long after Christ's time, which was very impoverishing, Acts xi. 28, 29; but the sorest famine was in Jerusalem during the siege. See Lam. iv. 9, 10.

xxiv. 6. A simple catalogue of events answering to the details of our Lord's prophecy would require more space than we can allot. The reader would do well to refer to such collections as those which have been made by Dr. Lardner, Bishop Newton, and Dr. Keith, in their published works.

xxiv. 9. The introduction of this premonition shows that the persecutions of the Church of Christ were to commence before the fall of the Temple and nation of the Jews. It was so, for, not to Secondly. Pestilences, signified by the pale horse, and 'death upon him, and the grave at his heels, under the fourth seal, Rev. vi. 7, 8. This destroys without distinction, and in a little time lays heaps upon heaps.

Thirdly. Earthquakes in divers places, or from place to place, pursuing those that flee from them, as they did from the earthquake in the days of Uzziah, Zec. xiv. 5. Great desolations have sometimes been made by earthquakes, of late, and formerly; they have been the death of many and the terror of more. In the apocalyptic visions, it is observable, that earthquakes bode good, and no evil to the church, Rev. vi. 12; compare ver. 15; xi. 12, 13, 19; xvi. 17-19. When God shakes terribly the earth, Isa. ii. 21, it is to shake the wicked out of it, Job xxxviii. 13, and to introduce the desire of all nations, Hag. ii. 6, 7; but here they are spoken of as dreadful judgments, and yet but "the beginning of sorrows," ἀρχὴ πένθους, of travailing pains, which grow even the longer the more quick and violent. Note, When God judgeth, he will overcome; when he begins in wrath, he will make a full end, 1 Sam. iii. 12. When we look forward to the eternity of misery that is before the obstinate refusers of Christ and his Gospel, we may truly say, concerning the greatest temporal judgments, they are but the beginning of sorrows; as bad as things are with them, there is worse behind.

IV. He foretells the persecution of his own people and ministers, and a general apostasy, and decay in religion thereupon, ver. 9, 10, 12, 13. Observe,

First. The cross itself foretold, ver. 9. Note, Of all future events we are as much concerned, though commonly as little desirous, to know of our own sufferings as of any thing else. Then when famines and pestilences prevail, then they shall impute them to the Christians, and make that a pretence for persecuting them; Christianos ad leones,—away with Christians to the lions. Christ had told his disciples, when he first sent them out, what hard things they should suffer; but they had hitherto experienced little of it, and therefore he minds them of it again, that the less they had suffered, the more was behind to be filled up, Col. i. 24. 1. They shall be afflicted with bonds and imprisonments, cruel mockings and scourgings, as blessed Paul, 2 Cor. xi. 23-25; not killed outright, but killed all the day long, in deaths often, killed so as to feel themselves die, made a spectacle to the world, 1 Cor. iv. 9, 11. 2. They shall be killed; so cruel are the church's enemies, that nothing less will satisfy them than the blood of the saints, which they thirst after, suck, and shed like water. 3. They "shall be hated of all nations for Christ's name's sake," as he had told them before, ch. x. 22. The world was generally leavened with an enmity and malignity to Christians. The Jews, though spiteful to the heathen, yet were never persecuted by them, so as the Christians were; they were hated by the Jews that were dispersed among the nations, were the common butt of the world's malice. What shall we think of this world, when the best men had the worst usage in it? It is the cause that makes the martyr, and comforts him; it was for Christ's sake that they were thus hated. Their professing and preaching his name incensed the nations so much against them; the devil finding a fatal shock thereby given to his kingdom, and that his time was likely to be short, came down, having great wrath.

Secondly. The offence of the cross, ver. 10, 12. Satan thus carries on his interest by force of arms, though Christ at length will bring glory to himself out of the sufferings of his people and ministers. Three ill effects of persecution are here foretold: 1. The apostasy of some. When the profession of Christianity begins to cost men dear, "then shall many be offended;" shall first fall out with, and then fall off from, their profession; they will begin to pick quarrels with their religion, sit loose to it, grow weary of it, and at length revolt from it. Note, 1st. It is no new thing (though it is a strange thing) for those that have known the way of righteousness to turn aside out of it. Paul often complains of deserters, who began well, but something hindered them; they were with us, but go out from us, because never truly of us, 1 Jno. ii. 19. We are told of it before. 2nd. Suffering times are shaking times, and those fall in the storm that stood in fair weather, like the stony ground, ch. xii. 21. Many will follow Christ in the sunshine that will shift for themselves, and leave him to do so too in the cloudy dark day. They like their religion while they can have it cheap, and sleep with it in a whole skin; but if their profession cost them any thing, quit it presently. 2. The malignity of others. When persecution is in fashion, envy, enmity, and malice are strangely diffused into the minds of men by contagion; and charity, tenderness, and moderation are looked upon as singularities, which make a man like a speckled bird; then they "shall betray one another," that is, those that have treacherously deserted their religion, shall hate and betray those who adhere to it, for whom they have pretended friendship; apostates have commonly been the most bitter and violent persecutors. Note, Persecuting times are discovering times: wolves in sheep's clothing will then throw off their disguise, and appear wolves. They "shall betray one another and hate one another." The times must needs be perilous when treachery and hatred, two of the worst things that can be, because directly contrary to two of the best, truth and love, shall have the ascendancy. This seems to refer to the barbarous treatment which the several contending factions among the Jews gave to one another; and justly were they who ate up God's people as they ate bread, left thus to bite and devour one another, till they were consumed one of another: or it may refer to the mischiefs done to Christ's disciples, by those that were nearest them, as ch. x. 21: "the brother shall deliver up the brother to death." 3. The general declining and cooling of most, ver. 12. In seducing times, when false prophets arise, in persecuting times, when the saints are hated, expect these two things: 1st. The abounding of iniquity. Though the world always lies in wickedness, yet there are some times in which it may be said, that iniquity doth in a special manner abound; as when it is more extensive than ordinary, as in the old world, when all flesh had corrupted their way; and when it is more excessive than ordinary, when violence is risen up to a rod of wickedness, Eze. vii. 11: so that hell seems to be broke loose in blasphemies against God, and enmities to the saints. 2nd. The abating of love. This is the consequence of the former, "because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold;" understand it in general of true serious godliness, which is all summed up in love: it is too common for professors of religion to grow cool in their profession, when the wicked are hot in their wickedness; as the church of Ephesus, in bad times, left her first love, Rev. ii. 2, 4; or more particularly of brotherly love. When iniquity abounds,—seducing iniquity, persecuting iniquity,—this grace commonly waxes cold; Christians begin to be shy and suspicious one of another, affections are alienated, distances created, parties made, and so love comes to nothing. The devil is the accuser of the brethren, not only to their enemies, which makes persecuting iniquity abound, but one to another, which makes the love of many to wax cold.

This gives a melancholy prospect of the times, that there shall be such a great decay of love; but, First. It is of the love of many, not of all. In the worst of times God has his remnant, that hold fast their integrity and retain their zeal, as in Elijah's days, when he thought himself left alone. Secondly. This love is grown cold, but not dead; it abates, but is not quite cast off. There is life in the root, which will shew itself when the winter is past. The new nature may wax cold, but shall not wax old, for then it would decay and vanish away.

Thirdly. Comfort administered in reference to this offence of the cross, for speak of local persecutions and oppressions, the great persecutions under Nero, in which so many suffered so dreadfully, preceded the victories of Titus and Vespasian. For these see Tacitus ("Annals," book xv., sec. 44).

xxiv. 11. As a specimen of what took place during the crash of Jerusalem and the Jews, see what Josephus reports in his "Wars" (book vi., chap. 5).

xxiv. 14. The word for "world" here is of course not the same the support of the Lord's people under it, ver. 13: "He that endures to the end shall be saved." 1. It is comfortable to those who wish well to the cause of Christ in general, that though many are offended, yet some shall endure to the end; when we see so many drawing back, we are ready to fear that the integrity of Christ will sink for want of supporters, and his name be left and forgotten for want of some to make profession of it; but "even at this time there is a remnant according to the election of grace," Rom. xi. 5. It is spoken of the same time that this prophecy has reference to; a remnant who "are not of them that draw back unto perdition, but believe" and persevere "to the saving of the soul;" they endure "to the end," to the end of their lives, to the end of their present state of probation, or to the end of these suffering, trying times; to the last encounter, though they should be called to resist unto blood. 2. It is comfortable to those who do thus endure to the end, and suffer for their constancy, that they shall be saved. Perseverance wins the crown through free grace, and shall wear it: they shall "be saved;" perhaps they may be delivered out of their troubles, and comfortably survive them in this world; but it is the eternal salvation that is here intended: they that endure to the end of their days, shall then receive the end of their faith and hope, even the salvation of their souls, 1 Pet. i. 9; Rom. ii. 7; Rev. ii. 6. The crown of glory will make amends for all, and a believing regard to that will enable us to choose rather to die at a stake with the persecuted, than to live in a palace with the persecutors.

V. He foretels the preaching of the Gospel in all the world, ver. 14. "This Gospel shall be preached, and then shall the end come." Observe here, 1. It is called the "Gospel of the kingdom," because it reveals the kingdom of grace, which leads to the kingdom of glory; sets up Christ's kingdom in this world, and secures ours in the other world. 2. This Gospel, sooner or later, is to be preached in all the world, to every creature, and all nations disciplined by it; for in it Christ is to be salvation to the ends of the earth: for this end the gift of tongues was the firstfruits of the Spirit. 3. The Gospel is preached "for a witness unto all nations," that is, a faithful declaration of the mind and will of God concerning the duty which God requires from man, and the recompence which man may expect from God. It is a record, 1 Jno. v. 11; it is a witness for those who believe; that they shall be saved; and against those who persist in unbelief, that they shall be damned: see Mar. xvi. 16. But how doth this come in here?

First. It is intimated that the Gospel should be, if not heard, yet at least heard of, throughout the then known world, before the destruction of Jerusalem; that the Old Testament church should not be quite dissolved till the New Testament was pretty well settled; had got considerable footing, and began to make some figure: better is the face of a corrupt degenerate church than none at all. Within forty years after Christ's death, the sound of the Gospel was gone forth to the ends of the earth, Rom. x. 18. St. Paul "fully preached the Gospel from Jerusalem, and round about unto Illyricum;" and the other apostles were not idle. The persecuting of the saints at Jerusalem helped to disperse them, so that they "went every where preaching the Word," Acts viii. 1, 4; and when the tidings of the Redeemer are sent over all the parts of the world, then shall come the end of the Jewish state. Thus that which they thought to prevent, by putting Christ to death, they thereby procured; all men believed on him, and the Romans came and took away their place and nation, Jno. xi. 48. Paul speaks of the Gospel being come to all the world, and preached to every creature, Col. i. 6, 23.

Secondly. It is likewise intimated, that even in times of temptation, trouble, and persecution, the Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached and propagated, and shall force its way through the greatest opposition; though the enemies of the church grow very hot, and many of her friends very cool, yet the Gospel shall be preached. And even then, when many fall by the sword, and by flame, and many do wickedly, and are corrupted by flatteries, yet then the people that do know their God shall be strengthened to do the greatest exploits of all, in instructing many: see Dan. xi. 32, 33; and see an instance, Phil. i. 12-14.

Thirdly. That which seems chiefly intended here is, that the end of the world shall be then, and not till then, when the Gospel has done its work in the world. The Gospel shall be preached, and that work carried on when you are dead; so that all nations, first or last, shall have either the enjoyment or the refusal of the Gospel; and "then cometh the end," when the kingdom shall be delivered up to God, even the Father. When the mystery of God shall be finished, the mystical body completed, and the nations either converted and saved, or convicted and silenced by the Gospel, "and then shall the end come," which he had said before, ver. 6, 7; "not yet," not till those intermediate counsels be fulfilled. The world shall stand as long as any of God's chosen ones remain uncalled; but when they are all gathered in, it will be set on fire presently.

VI. He foretels more particularly the ruin that was coming upon the people of the Jews, their city, temple, and nation, ver. 15, &c. Here he comes more closely to answer their question concerning the desolation of the temple; and what he said here would be of use to his disciples, both for their conduct and for their comfort, in reference to that great event; and here he describes the several steps of that calamity, such as is usual in war.

First. The Romans setting up "the abomination of desolation in the holy place," ver. 15. Now, 1. Some understand by this an image or statue, set up in the temple by some of the Roman governors, which was very offensive to the Jews, provoked them to rebel, and so brought the desolation upon them. The image of Jupiter Olympius, which Antiochus caused to be set up upon the altar of God, is called Βωδάνημα ἐπιώρυσεως,—"the abomination of desolation," the very word here used by the historian, 1 Mac. i. 54. Since the captivity in Babylon, nothing was or could be more distasteful to the Jews than an image in the holy place, as appeared by the mighty opposition they made when Caligula offered to set up his effigies there; which had been of fatal consequence if it had not been prevented, and the matter accommodated by the conduct of Petronius; but Herod did set up an eagle over the temple gate; and some say, the effigies of Titus were set up in the temple. 2. Others choose to expound it by the parallel place, Lu. xxi. 20; "when ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies," Jerusalem was the holy city, Canaan the holy land; the mount Moriah, which lay about Jerusalem, for its nearness to the temple, was, they thought, in a particular manner, holy ground: on the country lying round about Jerusalem, the Roman army was encamped; that was the abomination that made desolate. The land of an enemy is said to be the land which thou abhorrest, Isa. vii. 16; so an enemy's army to a weak but wilful people, may well be called the abomination. Now this is said to be "spoken of by Daniel the prophet," who spoke more plainly of the Messiah and his kingdom, than any of the Old Testament prophets did: he speaks of an abomination making desolate, which should be set up by Antiochus, Dan. xi. 31; xii. 11; but this that our Saviour refers to, we have in the message that the angel brought him, Dan. ix. 27, of what should come at the end of seventy weeks, long after the former, "for the overspreading of abominations," or, as the margin reads it, "with the abominable armies," (which comes home to this here) "he shall make it desolate." Armies of idolaters may well be called abominable armies; and some think the tumults, insurrections, and abominable factions and seditions in the city and temple, may at least be taken in as part of "the abomination making desolate." Christ refers them to that prophecy of Daniel, that they might see how the ruin of their city and temple was spoken of in the Old Testament, which would both confirm his prediction, and take off the odium of it. They might likewise from thence gather the time of it; soon after the cutting off of Messiah the Prince: the sin that procured it, their rejecting him; and the certainty of it, it is a declaration determined. As Christ by his precepts confirmed the law, so by his predictions he confirmed the prophecies of the Old Testament, and it will be of good use to compare both together. Reference being here had to a prophecy, which is commonly dark and obscure, Christ inserts this memorandum, "Whoso readeth, let him understand;" whoso readeth this memorandum, let him understand that it is to have its accomplishment now shortly in the desolations of Jerusalem. Note, Those that read the Scriptures should labour to understand the Scriptures, else their reading is to little purpose: we cannot use that which we do not understand; see Jno. v. 39; Acts viii. 30. The angel that delivered this prophecy to Daniel, stirred him up to know and understand, Dan. ix. 25; and we must not despair of understanding even dark prophecies; the great New Testament prophecy is called a revelation, not a secret. Now things revealed belong to us, and therefore must be humbly and diligently searched into; or, let him understand, not only the Scriptures, which speak of those things, but by the Scriptures let him understand the times, 1 Chr. xii. 32. "Let him observe and take notice," so some read it; let him be assured, that notwithstanding the vain hopes with which the deluded people feed themselves, the abominable armies will make desolate.

Secondly, The means of preservation which thinking men should betake themselves to, ver. 16, 20: "Then let them which be in Judea flee." Then conclude there is no other way to help yourselves but by flying for the same. We may take this, 1. As a prediction of the ruin itself, that it should be irresistible; that it would be impossible for the stoutest hearts to make head against it, or contend with it, but they must have recourse to the last shift of getting out of the way. It speaks that which Jeremiah so much insisted upon, but in vain, when Jerusalem was besieged by the Chaldeans, that it would be to no purpose to resist, but it was their wisdom to yield and capitulate; so Christ here, to show how fruitless it would be to stand it out, bids every one make the best of his way. 2. We may take it as a direction to the followers of Christ what to do; not to say a confederacy with those who fought and warred against the Romans, for the preservation of their city and nation, only that they might consume the wealth of both upon their lusts, (for to this very affair, the struggles of the Jews against the Roman power, some years before their final overthrow, the apostle refers, Jas. iv. 1-3;) but let them acquiesce in the decree that was gone forth, and with all speed quit the city and country, as they would quit a falling house, or a sinking ship, as Lot quitted Sodom, and Israel the tents of Dathan and Abiram. He shews them: 1st. Whither they must flee: from Judea to the mountains; not the mountains round about Jerusalem, but those in the remote corners of the land; which would be some shelter to them, not so much by their strength as by their secrecy. Israel is said to be scattered upon the mountains, 2 Chr. xviii. 16, and see Heb. xi. 38. It would be safer among the lions' dens, and the mountains of the leopards, than among the seditious Jews, or the enraged Romans. Note, In times of imminent peril and danger, it is not only lawful, but duty, to seek our own preservation by all good and honest means; and if God opens a door of escape, we ought to make our escape, otherwise we do not trust God, but tempt him. There may be a time when even those that are in Judea, where God is known, and his name is great, must flee to the mountains; and while we only go out of the way of danger, not out of the way of duty, we may trust God to provide a dwelling for his outcasts, Isa. xvi. 4, 5. In times of public calamity, when it is manifest we cannot be serviceable at home, and may be safe abroad, Providence calls us to make our escape: he that flees may fight again. 2nd. What haste they must make, ver. 17, 18. The life will be in danger, in imminent danger; the scourge will slay suddenly; and therefore, he that is on the housetop when alarm comes, let him not come down into the house, to look after his effects there, but go the next way down to make his escape; and so he that shall be in the field, will find it his wisest course to take to his heels immediately, and not to return to fetch his clothes, or the wealth of his house, for two reasons: First. Because the time which would be taken up in packing up his things would delay his flight. Note, When death is at the door, delays are dangerous; it was the charge to Lot, "Look not behind thee." Those that are convinced of the misery of a sinful state, and the ruin that attends them in that state, and consequently of the necessity of their fleeing to Christ, must take heed, lest after all these convictions, they perish eternally by delays. Secondly. Because the carrying of his clothes and other his movables and valuables with him, would but burden him and clog his flight. The Syrians in their flight, cast away their garments, 2 Kin. vii. 15. At such a time we must be thankful, if our lives be given us for a prey, though we can save nothing, Jer. xlv. 4, 5; for the life is more than meat, ch. vi. 25. Those who carried off least, were safest in their flight: Cantabit vacuus coram latrone viator,—"the penniless traveller can lose nothing by robbers." It was to his own disciples that Christ recommended this forgetfulness of their house and clothes, who had an habitation in heaven; treasure there, and durable clothing, which the enemy could not plunder them of: Omnia mea mecum porto,—"I have all my property with me," said Bias the philosopher, in his flight empty-handed. He that has grace in his heart carries his all along with him, when stripped of all. Now those to whom Christ said this immediately, did not live to see this dismal day; none of all the twelve but John only: they needed not to be hid in the mountains; Christ hid them in heaven: but they left the direction to their successors in profession, who pursued it, and it was of use to them; for when the Christians in Jerusalem and Judea saw the ruin coming on, they all retired to a town called Pella, on the other side Jordan, where they were safe; so that of the many thousands that perished in the destruction of Jerusalem, there was not so much as one Christian; see Euseb. Eccles. Hist. l. iii. c. 5. Thus "the prudent man foresees the evil, and hides himself," Pr. xxii. 3; Heb. xi. 7. This warning was not kept private; St. Matthew's Gospel was published long before that destruction, so that others might have taken the advantage of it; but their perishing through their unbelief of this, was a figure of their eternal perishing through their unbelief of the warnings Christ gave concerning the wrath to come.

Thirdly. Whom it would go hard with at that time, ver. 19; "Woe to them that are with child, and to them that give suck." To this same event that saying of Christ at his death refers, Lu. xxiii. 29: they shall say, "Blessed are the wombs that never bare, and the paps that never gave suck." Happy are they that have no children to see the murder of; but most unhappy they whose wombs are then bearing, their paps then giving suck; they of all other will be in the most melancholy circumstances. 1. To them the famine would be most grievous, when they should see the tongue of the sucking child cleaving to the roof of his mouth for thirst, and themselves by the calamity made more cruel than the sea monsters, Lam. iv. 3, 4. 2. To them the sword would be most terrible, when it is in the hand of worse than brutal rage. It is a direful midwifery, when the women with child came to be ripped up by the enraged conqueror, 2 Kin. xv. 16; Hos. xiii. 16; Am. i. 13; or the children brought in the Greek as the one found in verse 3. Here the habitable world is meant.

xxiv. 15. The reference is to Dan. ix. 27, xii. 11, from which last it appears that "the abomination of desolation" signifies "the abomination which makes desolate." Whether one or more events are included in the prophecy of Daniel is disputed by expositors but it is generally agreed that here the allusion is to the profanation of the Temple by the Romans. The words "whoso readeth let him understand" are not those of Jesus, as Chrysostom and others have supposed, but those of the evangelist inviting special attention.

xxiv. 16. Eusebius records in his "History" (book iii., chap. 5), that before the fall of the city the church at Jerusalem, in obedience to a Divine revelation, retired to Pella beyond the Jordan. This was in the hilly district, which is sometimes called by the name of Perea.

xxiv. 20. Travelling in winter would expose the fugitives to great hardships; and flight on the Sabbath-day would not be much less forth to the murderers, How ix. 13. 3. To them also the flight would be most afflictive: the woman with child cannot make haste, or go far; the sucking child cannot be left behind, or if it should, can a woman forget it, that she should not have compassion on it? And if it be carried along, it retards the mother's flight, and so exposeth her life, and is in danger of Mephibosheth's fate, who was lamed by a fall he got in his nurse's flight, 2 Sam. iv. 4.

Fourthly. What they should pray against at that time, "that your flight be not in the winter, nor on the sabbath day," ver. 20. Observe, in general, it becomes Christ's disciples, in times of public trouble and calamity, to be much in prayer: that is a salve for every sore, never out of season, but in a special manner seasonable when we are distressed on every side. There is no remedy but you must flee, the decree is gone forth: so that God will not be entreated to take away his wrath; no, not if Noah, Daniel, and Job stood before him: "Let it suffice thee: speak no more unto me of this matter," but labour to make the best of that which is, and when you cannot in faith pray that you may not be forced to flee: yet pray that the circumstances of it may be graciously ordered, that though the cup may not pass from you, yet the extremity of the judgment may be prevented. Note, God has the disposing of the circumstances of events, which sometimes make a great alteration one way or other; and therefore in those our eyes must be ever towards him. Christ's bidding them pray for this favour, intimates his purpose of granting it to them; and in a general calamity we must not overlook a circumstantial kindness, but see and own wherein it might have been worse. Christ bids his disciples now and still to pray for themselves and their friends, that whenever they were forced to flee, it might be in the most convenient time. Note, When trouble is in prospect, at a great distance, it is good to lay in a stock of prayers beforehand. They must pray, 1. That their flight, if it were the will of God, might not be in the winter, when the days are short, the weather cold, the ways dirty, and therefore travelling very uncomfortable; especially for whole families. Paul nastens Timothy to come to him before winter, 2 Tim. iv. 21. Note, Though the ease of the body is not to be mainly consulted, it ought to be duly considered; though we must take what God sends, and when he sends it; yet we may pray against bodily inconveniences, and are encouraged to do so, in that "the Lord is for the body." 2. That it might not be on the sabbath day; not on the Jewish sabbath, because travelling then would give offence to them, who were angry with the disciples for plucking the ears of corn on that day; not on the Christian sabbath, because being forced to travel on that day would be a grief to themselves. This intimates Christ's design, that a weekly sabbath should be observed in his church, after the preaching of the Gospel to all the world. We read not of any of the ordinances of the Jewish church which were purely ceremonial that Christ ever expressed any care about, because they were all to vanish; but for the sabbath he often shewed a concern. It intimates likewise that the sabbath is ordinarily to be observed as a day of rest from travel, and worldly labour; but that, according to his own explication of the fourth commandment, works of necessity were lawful on the sabbath day, as this of fleeing from an enemy, to save our lives: had it not been lawful, he would have said, Whatever becomes of you, do not flee on the sabbath day, but abide by it, though you die by it, for we must not commit the least sin to escape the greatest trouble; but it intimates likewise, that it is very uneasy and uncomfortable to a good man to be taken off, by any work of necessity, from the solemn service and worship of God on the sabbath day. We should pray that we may have quiet, undisturbed sabbaths, and may have no other work but sabbath work to do on sabbath days; that we may attend upon the Lord without distraction. It was desirable, that if they must flee, they might have the benefit and comfort of one sabbath more, to help to bear their charges. To flee in the winter, is uncomfortable to the body; but to flee on the sabbath day, is so to the soul; and the more so when it remembers former sabbaths, as Ps. xlii. 4.

Fifthly. The greatness of the troubles which should immediately ensue, ver. 21: "Then shall be great tribulation;" then when the measure of iniquity is full; then when the servants of God are sealed and secured, then comes the troubles; nothing can be done against Sodom, till Lot is entered into Zoar; and then look for fire and brimstone presently. There shall be great tribulation; great indeed, when within the city plague and famine raged, and, worse than either, faction and division; so that every man's sword was against his fellow: then and there it was, that the hands of the pitiful women sod their own children: without the city was the Roman army, ready to swallow them up with a particular rage against them, not only as Jews, but as rebellious Jews. War was the only one of the three sore judgments that David excepted against; but that was it by which the Jews were ruined, and famine and pestilence in extremity besides. Josephus's History of the Wars of the Jews, has in it more tragical passages than perhaps any history whatsoever. 1. It was a desolation unparalleled: "such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be;" many a city and kingdom has been made desolate; but never any with a desolation like this. Let not daring sinners think that God has done his worst; he can heat the furnace seven times, and yet seven times hotter, and will, when he sees greater and still greater abominations. The Romans when they destroyed Jerusalem, were degenerated from the honour and virtue of their ancestors, which had made even their victories easy to the vanquished; and the wilfulness and obstinacy of the Jews themselves contributed much to the increase of the tribulation. No wonder the ruin of Jerusalem was an unparalleled ruin, when the sin of Jerusalem was an unparalleled sin—even their crucifying Christ. The nearer any people are to God in profession and privileges, the greater and heavier will his judgments be upon them, if they abuse those privileges, and be false to that profession, Am. iii. 2. 2. It was a desolation, which if it should continue long, would be intolerable; so that "no flesh should be saved," ver. 22; so triumphantly would death ride, in so many dismal shapes, and with such attendants, that there would be no escaping, but first or last all would be cut off: he that escaped one sword, would fall by another, Isa. xxiv. 17, 18. The computation which Josephus makes of those that were slain in several places amounts to above two millions. "No flesh shall be saved;" he doth not say, "no soul shall be saved;" for the destruction of the flesh may be for the saving of the spirit, in the day of the Lord Jesus; but temporal lives will be sacrificed so profusely, that one would think, if it last awhile, it would make a full end. But here is one word of comfort in the midst of all this terror, that "for the elect's sake these days shall be shortened;" not shorter than what God had determined, for "that determined shall be poured upon the desolate," Dan. ix. 27, but shorter than what he might have decreed, if he had dealt with them according to their sins; shorter than what the enemy designed, who would have cut all off, if God who made use of them to serve his own purpose, had not set bounds to their wrath; shorter than one that judged by human probabilities would have imagined. Note, 1st. In times of common calamity, God manifests his favour to the elect remnant; his jewels, whom he will then make up: his peculiar treasure, which he will secure when the lumber is abandoned to the spoiler. 2nd. The shortening of calamities is a kindness God often grants for the elect's sake. Instead of complaining that our afflictions last so long, if we consider our defects, we shall see reason to be thankful that they do not last always; when it is bad with us, it becomes us to say, 'Blessed be God it is no worse; blessed be God it is not hell, endless and remediless misery.' It was a lamenting church that said, "It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed;" and it is for the sake of the elect, lest their spirit should fail before him, if he should contend for ever; and lest they should be tempted to put forth, if not their heart, yet their hand to iniquity. And now comes in the repeated caution, which was opened before, to take heed of being ensnared by false Christs and false prophets, ver. 23, &c. who would promise them deliverance, as the lying prophets in Jeremiah's time, Jer. xiv. 13; xxiii. 16, 17; xxvii. 19; xxviii. 2, but would delude them. Times of great trouble used to be times of great temptation; and therefore we have need to double our guard then. If they shall say, 'Here is a Christ, or there is one, that shall deliver us from the Romans,' do not heed them; it is all but talk; such a deliverance is not to be expected; and therefore not such a deliverance.

VII. He foretells the sudden spreading of the Gospel in the world, about the time of these great events, ver. 27, 28: "As the lightning comes out of the east, so shall the coming of the Son of man be." It comes in here as an antidote against the poison of those seducers, that said, "Lo, here is Christ, or, Lo, he is there;" compare Lu. xvii. 23, 24. Harken not to them, for the coming of the Son of man will be as the lightning.

First. It seems primarily to be meant of his coming to set up his spiritual kingdom in the world. Where the Gospel came in its light and power, there the Son of man came, and in a way quite contrary to the fashion of the seducers and false Christs, who came creeping in the desert, or the secret chambers, 2 Tim. iii. 6; no, Christ comes not with such a spirit of fear, but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind. The Gospel would be remarkable for two things:

1. Its swift spreading—it shall fly as the lightning; so shall the Gospel be preached and propagated. The Gospel is light, 1 Jo. i. 9; and it is not in this as the lightning, that it is a sudden flash, and away; for it is sunlight, and daylight; but it is as lightning in these respects: 1st. It is light from heaven as the lightning. It is God, and not man, that sends the lightnings, and summons them that they may go and say, "here we are," Job xxxviii. 35; it is God that directs it, Job xxxvii. 3. To man it is one of nature's miracles, above his power to effect; and one of nature's mysteries, above his skill to account for, but it is from above: "his lightnings enlightened the world," Ps. xcvi. 4. 2nd. It is visible and conspicuous as the lightning. The seducers carried on their depths of Satan in the desert, and the secret chambers, shunning the light: heretics were called lucifuge,—"light-shunners." But truth seeks no corners, however it may sometimes be forced into them, as the woman in the wilderness, though clothed with the sun, Rev. xii. 1, 6. Christ preached his Gospel openly, 1 Jo. xviii. 20, and his apostles on the housetop, ch. x. 27, not in a corner, Acts xxvi. 26. See Ps. xcvi. 1. It was sudden and surprising to the world as the lightning. The Jews indeed had predictions of it, but to the Gentiles it was altogether unlooked for, and came upon them with an unaccountable energy, or ever they were aware: it was light out of darkness, ch. iv. 16; 2 Cor. iv. 6. We read of the discomfiting of armies by lightning, 2 Sam. xxii. 15; Ps. cxlv. 6. The powers of darkness were dispersed and vanquished by the Gospel lightning. 4th. It spread far and wide, and that quickly, and irresistibly, like the lightning, which comes (suppose) out of the east, (Christ is said to ascend from the east, Rev. vii. 2; Isa. xli. 2), and lighteneth to the west. The propagating of Christianity to so many distant countries, of divers languages, by such unlikely instruments, destitute of all secular advantages, and in the face of so much opposition, and this in so short a time, was one of the greatest miracles that was ever wrought for the confirmation of it. Here was Christ upon his white horse, noting speed as well as strength, and going on conquering and to conquer, Rev. vi. 2. Gospel light rose with the sun, and went with the same, so that the beams of it reached to the ends of the earth, Rom. x. 18, compare with Ps. xix. 3, 4. Though it was fought against, it would never be cooped up in a desert, or in a secret place, as the seducers were, but by this, according to Gamaliel's rule, proved itself to be of God, that it could not be overthrown, Acts v. 38, 39. Christ speaks of shining unto the west, because it spread most effectually into those countries which lay west from Jerusalem, as Mr. Herbert observes in his Church Militant. How soon did the Gospel lightning reach this island of Great Britain; Tertullian, who wrote in the second century, takes notice of it: Britannorum inaccessible Romanis loca Christo tamen subdita,—"the fastnesses of Britain, though inaccessible to the Romans, were occupied by Jesus Christ." This was the Lord's doing.

2. Another thing remarkable concerning the Gospel, was its strange success in those places to which it was spread; it gathered in multitudes, not by external compulsion, but as it were by such a natural instinct and inclination, as brings the birds of prey to their prey, "for where the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together," ver. 28: where Christ is preached, souls will be gathered in to him. The lifting up of Christ from the earth, that is, the preaching of Christ crucified, which one would think should drive all men from him, will draw all men to him, 1 Jo. xii. 32: according to Jacob's prophecy, that to him shall the gathering of the people be, Gen. xlix. 10: see Isa. lx. 8. The eagles will be where the carcass is, for it is food for them, it is a feast for them; "where the slain are, there is she," Job xxxix. 30. And eagles are said to have a strange sagacity and quickness of scent to find out the prey, and they fly swiftly to it, Job ix. 26. So those whose spirits God shall stir up will be effectually drawn to Jesus Christ to feed upon him. Whither should the eagle go but to the prey? whither should the soul go but to Jesus Christ, who has the words of eternal life? The eagles will distinguish what is proper for them from that which is not; so those who have spiritual senses exercised, will know the voice of the good Shepherd from that of a thief and a robber. Saints will be where the true Christ is, not the false Christs. This is applicable to the desires that are wrought in every gracious soul, after Christ, and communion with him. Where he is in his ordinances, there will his servants choose to be. A living principle of grace is a kind of natural instinct in all the saints, drawing them to Christ, to live upon him.

Secondly. Some understand these verses of the coming of the Son of man to destroy Jerusalem, Mal. iii. 1, 2, 5; so much was there of an extraordinary display of Divine power and justice in that event, that it is called the coming of Christ. Now here are two things intimated concerning it: 1. That to the most it would be as unexpected as a flash of lightning, which indeed gives warning of the clap of thunder which follows, but is itself surprising. The seducers say, Lo, here is Christ to deliver us; or there is one, a creature of their own fancies; but ere they are aware, the wrath of the Lamb, the true Christ, will arrest them, and they shall not escape. 2. That yet it might be as justly expected as that the eagles should fly to the carcasses, though they put far from them the evil day; yet the desolation will come as certainly as the birds of prey to a dead carcass that lies exposed in the open field. 1st. The Jews were so corrupt and degenerate, so vile and vicious, that they were become a carcass, obnoxious to the righteous judgment of God; they were also so factious and seditious, and every way provoking to the Romans, that they had made themselves obnoxious to their resentments, and an inviting prey to them. 2nd. The Romans were as an eagle, and the ensign of their armies was an eagle. The inconvenient. The Jews would only travel a certain distance on that day, and would vex the Christian converts who ventured to do more.

xxiv. 28. This is understood of the Romans who crowded round Jerusalem, exultant over the assurance that it must speedily fall. "The Roman eagles" is an accepted phrase for the imperial armies, whose standards very commonly bore the figure of an eagle.

xxiv. 29. With this verse the sphere of the prediction seems to be enlarged, and what follows appears to relate only in a subordinate sense to the overthrow of Jerusalem and the Jews. That event accomplished, the succession of occurrences proceeds without interruption until the consummation. The word "immediately" cannot mean that all which follows will be realised at once, but that it will commence forthwith, and advance to the end. But although much may intervene between the ruin of Israel and the ultimatum indicated in the prophecy, the chief stress and emphasis of the su-army of the Chaldeans is said to fly as the eagle that hasteth to eat, Hab. i. 8. The ruin of the New Testament Babylon is represented by a call to the birds of prey to come feast upon the slain, Rev. xix. 17, 18. Notorious malefactors have their eyes eaten out by the young eagles, Pr. xxx. 17. The Jews were hung up in chains, Jer. vii. 33; xvi. 4. 3rd. The Jews can no more preserve themselves from the Romans, than the carcass can secure itself from the eagles. 4th. The destruction shall find out the Jews wherever they are, as the eagle scents the prey. Note, When a people do by their sin make themselves carcasses, putrid and loathsome, no other can be expected but that God should send eagles among them to devour and to destroy them.

Thirdly. It is very applicable to the day of judgment, the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ in that day, and our gathering together unto him, 2 Thes. ii. 1. Now see here, 1. How he shall come: as the lightning. The time was now at hand when he should depart out of the world to go to the Father. Therefore those that inquire after Christ must not go into the desert, or the secret place, nor listen to every one that will put up the finger to invite them to a sight of Christ, but let them look upwards, for the heavens must contain him, and thence we look for the Saviour, Phil. iii. 20. He shall come in the clouds, as the lightning doth, and every eye shall see him, as they say it is natural for all living creatures to turn their faces towards the lightning, Rev. i. 7. Christ will appear to all the world, from one end of heaven to the other; nor shall any thing be hid from the light and heat of that day. 2. How the saints shall be gathered to him: as the eagles are to the carcass, by natural instinct, and with the greatest swiftness and alacrity imaginable; saints, when they shall be fetched to glory, will be carried as on eagles' wings, Ex. xix. 4, as on angels' wings. They shall mount up with wings like eagles, and like them renew their youth.

VIII. He foretells his second coming at the end of time, ver. 29—31: "The sun shall be darkened," &c.

First. Some think this is to be understood only of the destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish nation. The darkening of the sun, moon, and stars, notes the eclipse of the glory of that state, its convulsions, and the general confusion that attended that desolation. Great slaughter and devastation is in the Old Testament thus set forth, as Isa. xiii. 10; xxxiv. 4; Eze. xxxii. 7; Joel ii. 31; or, by the sun, moon, and stars, may be meant the temple, Jerusalem, and the cities of Judah, which should all come to ruin: and the sign of the Son of man, ver. 30, means a signal appearance of the power and justice of the Lord Jesus in it, avenging his own blood on them that imprecated the guilt of it upon them and their children; and the gathering of the elect, ver. 31, signifies the delivering of a remnant from this sin and ruin.

Secondly. It seems rather to refer to Christ's second coming. The destruction of the particular enemies of the church was typical of the complete conquest of them all; and therefore what will be done really at the great day may be applied metaphorically to those destructions, but still we must attend to the principal scope of them; and while we are all agreed to expect Christ's second coming, what need we put such strained constructions, as some do, upon these verses, which speak of it so clearly and so agreeably to other scriptures, especially when Christ is here answering an inquiry concerning his coming at the end of the world, which Christ was never shy of speaking of to his disciples? The only objection against this is, that it is said to be "immediately after the tribulation of those days." But as to that, 1. It is usual, in the prophetic style, to speak of things great and certain, as near and just at hand, only to express the greatness and certainty of them. Enoch spoke of Christ's second coming as within ken: "behold, the Lord cometh," Jude 14. 2. A thousand years are in God's sight but as one day, 2 Pet. iii. 8. It is there urged, with reference to this very thing, and so it might be said to be immediately after. The tribulation of those days includes not only the destruction of Jerusalem, but all the other tribulations which the church must pass through; not only its share in the calamities of the nations, but the tribulations peculiar to itself; while the nations are torn with wars, and the church with schisms, delusions, and persecutions, we cannot say that the tribulation of those days is over: the whole state of the church on earth is militant, we must count upon that; but when the church's tribulation is over, her warfare accomplished, and what is behind of the sufferings of Christ filled up, then look for the end.

Now concerning Christ's second coming, it is here foretold, 1st. That there shall then be a great and amazing change of the creatures, and particularly the heavenly bodies, ver. 29, "the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light." The moon shines with a borrowed light, and therefore if the sun, from whom she borrows her light, is turned into darkness, she must fall of course, and become bankrupt. "The stars shall fall," that is, they shall lose their light, and disappear, and be as if they were fallen, and "the powers of the heavens shall be shaken." This intimates, First, That there shall be a great change, in order to the making of all things new. Then shall be "the restitution of all things," when the heavens shall not be cast away as a rag, but changed as a vesture, to be worn in a better fashion, Ps. cii. 26. They "shall pass away with a great noise," that there may be new heavens, 2 Pet. iii. 10, 13. Secondly, It shall be a visible change, and such as all the world must take notice of, for so the darkening of the sun and moon cannot but be; and it will be an amazing change, for the heavenly bodies are not so liable to alteration as the creatures of this lower world are. The days of heaven, and the continuance of the sun and moon, are used to express that which is lasting and unchangeable, as Ps. lxxxix. 29, 36, 37, yet they shall thus be shaken. Thirdly, It shall be a universal change. If the sun be turned into darkness, and the powers of heaven shaken, the earth cannot but be turned into a dungeon, and its foundation made to tremble. How, fir trees, if the cedars be shaken. When the stars of heaven drop, no marvel if the everlasting mountains melt, and the perpetual hills bow. Nature shall sustain a general shock and convulsion, which yet shall be no hindrance to the joy and rejoicing of heaven and earth "before the Lord, when he cometh to judge the world," Ps. xcvi. 11, 13; they shall, as it were, glory in the tribulation. Fourthly, The darkening of the sun, moon, and stars, which were made to rule over the day, and over the night, (which is the first dominion we find of any creature, Gen. i. 16, 18) signifies the putting down of all rule, authority, and power, (even that which seems of the greatest antiquity and usefulness,) that the kingdom may be delivered up to God, even the Father, and he may be all in all, 1 Cor. xv. 24, 28. The sun was darkened at the death of Christ, for then was, in one sense, the judgment of this world, Jno. xii. 31, an indication what would be at the general judgment. Fifthly, The glorious appearance of our Lord Jesus, who will then shew himself as "the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person," will darken the sun and moon, as a candle is darkened in the beams of the noonday sun; they will have no glory, "because of the glory that excelleth," 2 Cor. iii. 10. Then "the sun shall be ashamed, and the moon confounded," when God shall appear, Isa. xxiv. 23. Sixthly, The sun and moon shall then be darkened, because there will be no more occasion for them. To sinners, that choose their portion in this life, all comfort will be eternally denied; as they shall not have a drop of water, so not a ray of light. Now God causeth his sun to rise on the earth, but then interdicto tibi sole et luna,—"I forbid thee the light of the sun and the moon;" darkness must be their portion: and to the saints that had their treasure above, such light of joy and comfort will be given as shall supersede that of the sun and moon, and render it useless. What need we vessels of light when we come to the fountain and Father of lights? See Isa. lx. 19; Rev. xxii. 5.

2nd. That "then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven," ver. 30; that is, the Son of man himself, as it follows here, "they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds." At his first coming he was set for a sign that should be spoken against, Lu. ii. 34; but at his second coming, a sign that should be admired. Ezekiel was a son of man, set for a sign, Eze. xii. 6. Some make this a prediction of the harbingers and forerunners of his coming, giving notice of his approach: a light shining before him, and the fire devouring, Ps. i. 3; 1 Kin. xix. 11, 12; the beams coming out of his hand, where had long been the hiding of his power, Hab. iii. 4. It is a groundless conceit of some of the ancients, that this sign of the Son of man will be the sign of the cross, displayed as a banner. It will certainly be such a clear, convincing sign, as will dash infidelity quite out of countenance, and fill their faces with shame who said, "Where is the promise of his coming?"

3rd. That then "all the tribes of the earth shall mourn," ver. 30. See Rev. i. 7; all the kindreds of the earth shall then wail because of him. Some of all the tribes and kindreds of the earth shall mourn,—for the greater part will tremble at his approach,—while the chosen remnant, one of a family, and two of a tribe, shall lift up their heads with joy, knowing that their redemption draws nigh, and their Redeemer. Note, Sooner or later, all sinners will be mourners: penitent sinners look to Christ, and mourn after a godly sort; and they who sow in those tears shall shortly reap in joy: impenitent sinners shall look unto him whom they have pierced, and, though they laugh now, shall mourn and weep, after a devilish sort, in endless horror and despair.

4th. That "then they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory." Note, First, The judgment of the great day will be committed to the Son of man, both in pursuance, and in recompence, of his great undertaking for us as Mediator, Jno. v. 22, 27. Secondly, The Son of man will at that day come "in the clouds of heaven." Much of the sensible intercourse between heaven and earth is by the clouds; they are betwixt them, as it were the medium participationis,—the medium of participation, drawn by heaven from the earth, distilled by heaven upon the earth: Christ went to heaven in a cloud, and will in like manner come again, Acts i. 9, 11. Behold, he comes in the clouds, Rev. i. 7; a cloud will be the Judge's chariot, Ps. civ. 3; his robe, Rev. x. 1; his pavilion, Ps. xviii. 11; his throne, Rev. xiv. 14. When the world was destroyed by water, the judgment came in the clouds of heaven, for the windows of heaven were opened; so, when it shall be destroyed by fire. Christ went before Israel in a cloud, which had a bright side and a dark side; so will the cloud have in which Christ will come at the great day, it will bring both comfort and terror. Thirdly, He will come "with power and great glory;" his first coming was in weakness and great meanness, 2 Cor. xiii. 4, but his second coming will be with power and glory, agreeable both to the dignity of his person, and to the purposes of his coming. Fourthly, He will be seen with bodily eyes in his coming; therefore the Son of man will be the judge that he may be seen, that sinners thereby may be the more confounded, who shall see him as Balaam did, but not nigh, Num. xxiv. 17; see him, but not as theirs. It added to the torment of the damned sinner, that he saw Abraham afar off. Is this he whom we have slighted, and rejected, and rebelled against; whom we have crucified to ourselves afresh; who might have been our saviour; but is our judge, and will be our enemy for ever? The desire of all nations will then be their dread.

5th. That "he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet," ver. 31. Note, First, The angels shall be attendants upon Christ at his second coming,—they are called his angels, which proves him to be God, and Lord of the angels,—they shall be obliged to wait upon him. Secondly, These attendants shall be employed by him as officers of the court in the judgment of that day: they are now ministering spirits sent forth by him, Heb. i. 14, and will be so then. Thirdly, Their ministration will be ushered in with a great sound of a trumpet, to awaken and alarm a sleeping world. This trumpet is spoken of, 1 Cor. xv. 52, and 1 Thes. iv. 16. At the giving of the law on mount Sinai, the sound of the trumpet was remarkably terrible, Ex. xix. 13, 16, but much more will it be so in the great day. By the law, trumpets were to be sounded for the calling of assemblies, Num. x. 2; in praising God, Ps. lxxxi. 3; in offering sacrifices, Num. x. 10; and in proclaiming the year of jubilee, Lev. xxv. 9; very fitly, therefore, shall there be the sound of a trumpet at the last day, when the general assembly shall be called, when the praises of God shall be gloriously celebrated, when sinners shall fall as sacrifices to Divine justice, and when the saints shall enter upon their eternal jubilee.

6th. That "they shall gather together his elect from the four winds." Note, At the second coming of Jesus Christ there will be a general meeting of all the saints. First, The elect only will be gathered, the chosen remnant, who are but few in comparison with the many that are only called. This is the foundation of the saints' eternal happiness, that they are God's elect; the gifts of love to eternity follow the thoughts of love from eternity; and "the Lord knows them that are his." Secondly, The angels shall be employed to bring them together, as Christ's servants, and as the saints' friends. We have the commission given them, Ps. l. 5, "gather my saints together unto me;" nay, it will be said to them, habetis fratres,—"these are your brethren;" for the elect will then be "equal to the angels," Lu. xx. 36. Thirdly, They shall be gathered "from one end of the heaven to the other;" the elect of God are scattered abroad, Jno. xi. 52; there are some in all places, in all nations, Rev. vii. 9; but when that great gathering day comes, there shall not one of them be missing. Distance of place shall keep none out of heaven, if distance of affection do not. Undique ad calos tantundem est via,—"Heaven is equally accessible from every place." See ch. viii. 11; Isa. xliii. 6; xlix. 12.

32 Now learn a parable of the fig tree; When his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh: 33 So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors. 34 Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled. 35 Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away. 36 But of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels of heaven, but my Father only. 37 But as the days of Noe were, ceeding predictions bears directly upon that ultimatum, when the Lord shall return in his glory. "Sun," "moon," "stars," &c., are certainly spoken of symbolically, and signify human dignities, authorities, and luminaries.

xiv. 32. Dr. Tristram says, "The fig-tree puts forth its earliest fruit-buds before its leaves, and is one of the earliest trees to shoot. In the hill-country it sheds its leaves in November, and we have observed in the passes of Benjamin the buds rapidly pushing as early as the end of February, though the leaves did not unfold for a month later." The fig still flourishes near where this reference was made.

xiv. 34. If the word "generation" is to be rigidly limited to the men of that age then living, it may be questioned whether the prediction extends into a remoter future. There is a sense in which the prophecy was fulfilled in that generation; but if it is admitted that a two-fold application is involved, the question is to be answered in so shall also the coming of the Son of man be. 38 For as in the days that were before the flood they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark, 39 And knew not until the flood came, and took them all away; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be. 40 Then shall two be in the field; the one shall be taken, and the other left. 41 Two women shall be grinding at the mill; the one shall be taken, and the other left. 42 Watch therefore: for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come. 43 But know this, that if the goodman of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched, and would not have suffered his house to be broken up. 44 Therefore be ye also ready: for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh. 45 Who then is a faithful and wise servant, whom his lord hath made ruler over his household, to give them meat in due season? 46 Blessed is that servant, whom his lord when he cometh shall find so doing. 47 Verily I say unto you, That he shall make him ruler over all his goods. 48 But and if that evil servant shall say in his heart, My lord delayeth his coming; 49 And shall begin to smite his fellow-servants, and to eat and drink with the drunken; 50 The lord of that servant shall come in a day when he looketh not for him, and in an hour that he is not aware of, 51 And shall cut him asunder, and appoint him his portion with the hypocrites: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.

We have here the practical application of the foregoing prediction; in general, we must expect and prepare for the events here foretold.

1. We must expect them: "Now learn a parable of the fig tree," ver. 32, 33. Now learn what use to make of the things you have heard; so observe and understand the signs of the times, and compare them with the predictions of the Word, as from thence to foresee what is at the door, that you may provide accordingly. The parable of the fig tree is no more but this, that its budding and blossoming is a presage of summer coming; for as the stork in the heaven, so the trees of the field know their appointed time: the beginning of the working of second causes assures us of the progress and perfection of it. Thus when God begins to fulfil prophecies, he will make an end. There is a certain series in the works of Providence, as there is in the works of nature. The signs of the times are compared with the prognostics of the face of the sky, ch. xvi. 3, so here with those of the face of the earth; when that is renewed, we foresee that summer is coming, not immediately, but at some distance: after the branch grows tender, we expect the March winds, and the April showers before the summer comes, however we are sure it is coming; "so likewise ye," when the gospel day is broke, count upon it that through this variety of events that I have told you of the perfect day will come. The things revealed must shortly come to pass, Rev. i. 1; they must come in their own order, in the order appointed for them. "Know that it is near." He doth not here say what, but it is that which τὰς hearts are upon, and which you are inquisitive after, and long for: the kingdom of God is near, so it is expressed in the parallel place, Lu. xxi. 31. Note, When the trees of righteousness begin to bud and blossom, when God's people promise faithfulness, it is a happy presage of good times. In them God begins his work, first prepares their heart, and then he will go on with it; for "as for God his work is perfect," and he will revive it in the midst of their years. Now touching the events foretold here, which we are to expect,

First, Christ doth here assure us of the certainty of them, ver. 35: "Heaven and earth shall pass away," they continue this day indeed according to God's ordinance, but they shall not continue for ever, Ps. cii. 25, 26; see 2 Pet. iii. 10; "but my words shall not pass away." Note, The word of Christ is more sure and lasting than heaven and earth. "Hath he spoken? and shall he not do it?" We may build with more assurance upon the word of Christ, than we can upon the pillars of heaven, or the strong foundations of the earth; for when they shall be made to tremble and totter, and shall be no more, the word of Christ shall remain, and be in full force, power, and virtue. See 1 Pet. i. 24, 25. "It is easier for heaven and earth to pass," than the word of Christ; so it is expressed, Lu. xvi. 17; compare Isa. liv. 10. The accomplishment of these prophecies might seem to be delayed, and intervening events might seem to disagree with them, but do not think that therefore the word of Christ is fallen to the ground; for that shall never pass away. Though it be not fulfilled, either in the time, or in the way that we have prescribed, yet in God's time, which is the best time, and in God's way, which is the best way, it shall certainly be fulfilled. Every word of Christ is very pure, and therefore very sure.

Secondly, He here instructs us as to the time of them, ver. 34, 36. And as to this, it is well observed by the learned Grotius, that there is a manifest distinction made between the ταῦτα, ver. 34, and the ἐκείνη, ver. 36. "These things," and "that day and hour," which will help to clear this prophecy.

the affirmative, and the ultimate accomplishment is still future. To restrict the prophecy to the fall of Jerusalem and of the Jews is to do violence to the words. We therefore take "generation" as including more than the men of that age. Opinions are very much divided, however, and hence it is undesirable to speak with un-wavering certainty. Some say "generation" means the race of Israel; others, the followers of Christ; others, the human race; and others, the creation itself.

1. As to "these things," the wars, seductions, and persecutions here foretold, and especially the ruin of the Jewish nation. "This generation shall not pass away till all these things be fulfilled," ver. 34. There are those now alive that shall see Jerusalem destroyed, and the Jewish church brought to an end. And because it might seem strange, he backs it with a solemn asseveration, "Verily I say unto you." You may take my word for it; these things are at the door. Christ often speaks of the nearness of that desolation, the more to affect people, and quicken them to prepare for it. Note, There may be greater trials and troubles yet before us in our own day than we are aware of. They that are old know not what sons of Anak may be reserved for their last encounters.

2. But as to "that day and hour," which will put a period to time, that "knows no man," ver. 36. Therefore take heed of confounding these two, as they did who, from the words of Christ and the apostle's letters, inferred that "the day of Christ was at hand," 2 Thes. i. 2. No, it was not; "this generation," and many another shall pass before that day and hour comes. Note, 1st, There is a certain day and hour fixed for the judgment to come, it is called the Day of the Lord, because so unalterably fixed. None of God's judgments are adjourned sine die—without the appointment of a certain day. 2. That day and hour is a great secret.

Prudens futuri temporis exitum Caliginosa nocte premit Deus.

But Heav'n has wisely hid from human sight
The dark decrees of future fate,
And sown their seeds in depth of night.—Hon.

No man knows it, not the wisest by their sagacity, not the best by any Divine discovery. We all know there shall be such a day, but none knows when it shall be. "No, not the angels." Though their capacities for knowledge are great, and their opportunities of knowing this advantageous, they dwell at the fountain head of light, and though they are to be employed in the solemnity of that day, yet they are not told when it shall be; none knows but my Father only. This is one of those secret things which belong to the Lord our God. The uncertainty of the time of Christ's coming is to those who are watchful, "a savour of life unto life," and makes them more watchful; but to those who are careless, it is "a savour of death unto death," and makes them more careless.

11. To this end we must expect these events, that we may prepare for them; and here we have a caution against security and sensuality, which will make it a dismal day indeed to us, ver. 37—41. In which verses we have such an idea given us of the judgment day, as may serve to startle and awaken us, that we may not sleep, as do others. It will be a surprising day, and a separating day.

First, It will be a surprising day, as the deluge was to the old world, ver. 37—39. That which he here intends to describe, is the posture of the world "at the coming of the Son of man;" besides his first coming to save, he has other comings to judge. He saith, Jno. ix. 39, "For judgment I am come," and for judgment he will come; for all judgment is committed to him, both that of the word, and that of the sword. Now this here is applicable,

1. To temporal judgments, particularly that which was now hastening upon the nation and people of the Jews; though they had fair warning given them of it, and there were many prodigies that were presages of it, yet it found them secure, crying, Peace and safety, 1 Thes. v. 3. The siege was laid to Jerusalem by Titus Vespasian, when they were met at the passover in the midst of their mirth. Like the men of Laish, they dwelt careless when the ruin arrested them, Jud. xviii. 7, 27. The destruction of Babylon, both that in the Old Testament, and that in the New, comes when she saith, "I shall be a lady for ever," Isa. xlvii. 7—9; Rev. xviii. 7. Therefore the plagues come in a moment, in one day. Note, Men's unbelief shall not make God's threatenings of none effect.

2. To the eternal judgment; so the judgment of the great day is called, Heb. vi. 2. Though notice has been given of it from Enoch; yet when it comes it will be unlooked for by the most of men: the latter days, which are nearest to that day, will produce scoffers, that say, "Where is the promise of his coming?" 2 Pet. iii. 3, 4; Lu. xviii. 8. Thus it will be when the world that now is shall be destroyed by fire, for thus it was when the old world being overflowed by water perished, 2 Pet. iii. 6, 7. Now Christ here shews what was the temper and posture of the old world when the deluge came.

1st. They were sensual and worldly, "they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage." It is not said, they were killing, and stealing, and whoring, and swearing; these were indeed the horrid crimes of some of the worst of them, "the earth was full of violence;" but they were all of them, except Noah, over head and ears in the world, and regardless of the word of God, and this ruined them. Note, Universal neglect of religion is a more dangerous symptom to any people, than particular instances here and there of daring irreligion. Eating and drinking is necessary to the preservation of man's life, marrying and giving in marriage is so to the preservation of mankind; but licitis perimus omnes—these lawful things undo us, unlawfully managed.

First, They were unreasonable in it, inordinate and entire in the pursuit of the delights of sense, and the gains of the world; they were wholly taken up with these things, ἤσαν τρώγοιτες, "they were eating," they were in these things as in their element, as if they had their being for no other end but to eat and drink, Isa. lvi. 12.

Secondly, They were unseasonable in it; they were entire and intent upon the world and the flesh, when the destruction was at the door which they had had such fair warning of. They were eating and drinking, when they should have been repenting and praying; when God by the ministry of Noah called to weeping and mourning, then joy and gladness. This was to them, as it was to Israel afterwards, the unpardonable sin, Isa. xxii. 12, 14. Especially because it was in defiance of those warnings by which they should have been awakened, "Let us eat, and drink, for to-morrow we die;" if it must be a short life, let it be a merry one. The apostle James speaks of this as the general practice of the wealthy Jews before the destruction of Jerusalem, when they should have been weeping for the miseries that were coming upon them, they were living in pleasure, and nourishing their hearts, as in a day of slaughter, Jas. v. 1, 5.

2nd. They were secure and careless. They "knew not until the flood came," ver. 39. "Knew not?" Surely they could not but know; did not God by Noah give them fair warning of it? Did he not call them to repentance while his long-suffering waited? 1 Pet. iii. 19, 20. But they knew not, i.e., they believed not; they might have known, but would not know. Note, What we know of the things that belong to our everlasting peace, if we do not mix faith with it, and improve it, it is all one as if we did not know it at all. Their not knowing is joined with their eating, and drinking, and marrying; for

First, therefore they were sensual because they were secure. Note, the reason why people are so eager in the pursuit, and so entangled in the pleasures of this world, is, because they do not know, and believe, and consider the eternity which they are upon the brink of. Did we know aright, that all these things must shortly be dissolved, and we must certainly survive them, we would not set our eyes and hearts so much upon them as we do xxiv. 41. It will be remembered that in Eastern countries most families grind their own corn by means of hand-mills. The grinders appear in all ages to have been commonly the women of the house. Shaw says, in his "Travels," that when the millstone is large, or greater expedition is required, a second person is called in to assist. It is usual for women alone to be concerned in this employ, sitting themselves down over against each other with the millstones between them.

Secondly. Therefore they were secure, because they were sensual. Therefore they knew not that the flood was coming, because they were eating and drinking; were so taken up with things seen, and present, that they had neither time nor heart to mind the things not seen as yet, which they were warned of. Note, As security bolsters men up in their brutal sensuality, so sensuality rocks them asleep in their carnal security. "They knew not until the flood came." 1st. The flood did come, though they would not foresee it. Note, Those that will not know by faith, shall be made to know by feeling the wrath of God revealed from heaven against their ungodliness and unrighteousness. The evil day is never the further off for men's putting it far off from them. 2nd. They did not know it till it was too late to prevent it, as they might have done if they had known it in time, which made it so much the more grievous. Judgments are most terrible and amazing to the secure, and those that have made a jest of them.

The application of this concerning the old world we have in these words, "So shall the coming of the Son of man be." That is, 1. In such a posture shall he find people, eating and drinking, and never expecting him. Note, Security and sensuality are likely to be the epidemical diseases of the latter days. All slumber and sleep, and at midnight the bridegroom comes. All off their watch, and at their ease. 2. With such a power, and for such a purpose will he come upon them: as the flood took away the sinners of the old world, irresistibly and irrecoverably, so shall secure sinners that mocked at Christ and his coming, be taken away by the wrath of the Lamb, when the great day of his wrath comes, which will be like the coming of the deluge, a destruction which there is no fleeing from.

Secondly. It will be a separating day, ver. 40, 41. "Then shall two be in the field." Two ways this may be applied: 1. We may apply it to the success of the Gospel, especially at the first preaching of it; it divided the world; "some believed the things which were spoken," and were taken to Christ, others "believed not," and were left to perish in their unbelief. Those of the same age, place, capacity, employment, and condition in the world, "grinding in the same mill," those of the same family, nay, those that were joined in the same bond of marriage, yet one effectually called, the other passed by, and left in the gall of bitterness. This is that division, that separating fire which Christ came to send, Lu. xii. 49, 51. This renders free grace the more obliging, that it is distinguishing; to us, and not to the world, Jno. xiv. 22. Nay, to us, and not to those in the same field, the same mill, the same house.

When ruin came upon Jerusalem, a distinction was made by Divine providence, according to that which had been before made by Divine grace; for all the Christians among them were saved from perishing in that calamity by the special care of Heaven. If two were at work in the field together, and one of them was a Christian, he was taken into a place of shelter, and had his life given him for a prey, while the other was left to the sword of the enemy. Nay, if but two women were grinding at the mill, if one of them belonged to Christ, though but a woman, a poor woman, a servant, yet she was taken to a place of safety, and the other abandoned. Thus the meek of the earth are hid in the day of the Lord's anger; Zep. ii. 3, either in heaven, or under heaven. Note, Distinguishing preservations in times of general destruction are special tokens of God's favour, and ought so to be acknowledged. If we are safe when thousands fall on our right hand, and on our left; are not consumed, when others are consumed round about us, so that we are as brands plucked out of the fire; we have reason to say, "It is of the Lord's mercies," and it is a great mercy.

2. We may apply it to the second coming of Jesus Christ, and the separation which will be made in that day. He had said before, ver. 31, that the elect will be gathered together. Here he tells us, in order to that they will be distinguished from those that were nearest to them in this world; the choice and chosen ones taken to glory, the other left to perish eternally. Those that sleep in the dust of the earth, two in the same grave, their ashes mixed, yet shall arise one to be taken to everlasting life, the other left to shame and everlasting contempt, 1 Jan. xii. 2. Here it is applied to them who shall be found alive. Christ will come unlooked for; will find people busy at their usual occupations, in the field, at the mill, and then, according as they are vessels of mercy, prepared for glory, or vessels of wrath, prepared for ruin, accordingly it will be with them—the one taken to meet the Lord and his angels in the air, to be for ever with him and them; the other left to the devil and his angels, who, when Christ has gathered out his own, will sweep up the residue. This will aggravate the condemnation of sinners, that others shall be taken from the midst of them to glory, and they left behind. And it speaks abundance of comfort to the Lord's people. 1st. Are they mean and despised in the world, as the manservant in the field, or the maid at the mill? Ex. xi. 5; yet they shall not be forgotten, or overlooked in that day. The poor in the world, if rich in faith, are heirs of the kingdom. 2nd. Are they dispersed in distant and unlikely places, where one would not expect to find the heirs of glory, in the field, at the mill? yet the angels will find them there, hid, as Saul among the stuff, when they are to be enthroned, and fetch them thence; and well may they be said to be changed, for a very great change it will be, to go to heaven from ploughing and grinding. 3rd. Are they weak, and unable of themselves to move heavenward? they shall be taken, or laid hold on, as Lot was taken out of Sodom by a gracious violence, Gen. xix. 16. Those whom Christ has once apprehended, and laid hold on, he will never lose his hold of. 4th. Are they intermixed with others, linked with them in the same habitations, societies, employments? let not that discourage any true Christian, God knows how to separate between the precious and the vile, the gold and dross in the same lump, the wheat and chaff in the same floor.

11. Here is a general exhortation to us to watch, and be ready against that day comes, enforced by divers weighty considerations, ver. 42, &c. Observe,

First, The duty required. Watch, and be ready, ver. 42, 44. 1. "Watch, therefore," ver. 42. Note, It is the great duty and interest of all the disciples of Christ to watch, to be awake, and keep awake, that they may mind their business. As a sinful state and way is compared to sleep, senseless and unactive, 1 Thes. v. 4; so a gracious state and way is compared to watching and waking. We must watch for our Lord's coming; to us in particular, at our death, after which is the judgment, that is the great day with us, the end of our time; and his coming at the end of all time to judge the world, the great day with all mankind. To watch for this, is not only to believe that our Lord will come, but to desire that he would come; to be often thinking of his coming, and always looking for it, as sure, and near, and the time of it uncertain. To watch for Christ's coming, is to maintain that gracious temper and disposition of mind, which we would be willing our Lord when he comes should find us in. To watch is to be aware of the first notices of his approach, that we may immediately attend his motions, and address ourselves to the duty of meeting him. Watching is supposed to be in the night, which is sleeping time; while we are in this world it is night with us, and we must take pains to keep ourselves awake. 2. "Be ye also ready." We wake in vain, if we do not get ready. It is not enough to look for such things, but we must therefore give diligence, 2 Pet. iii. 11, 14. We have then our Lord to attend upon, and we must have our lamps ready trimmed; a cause to be tried, and we must have our plea ready drawn and signed by our Advocate; a reckoning to make up, and we must have our accounts ready stated, and balanced; there is an inheritance which we have then to enter upon, and we must have ourselves ready, made meet to partake of it, Col. i. 12.

Secondly. The reasons to induce us to this watchfulness, and diligent preparation for that day, which are two: 1. Because the time of our Lord's coming is very uncertain. This is the reason immediately annexed to the double exhortation, ver. 42, 44, and it is illustrated by a comparison, ver. 43. Let us consider, then,

1st. That we know not what hour he will come, ver. 42. We know not the day of our death, Gen. xxvii. 2. We may know that we have but a little time to live; 2 Tim. iv. 6, "The time of my departure is at hand;" but we cannot know that we have a long time to live, for our souls are continually in our hands; nor can we know how little a time we have to live, for it may prove less than we expect. Much less do we know the time fixed for the general judgment. Concerning both we are kept at uncertainty, that we might expect that every day which may come any day; may never boast of a year's continuance, Jas. iv. 13; no, nor of to-morrow's return, as if it were ours, Pr. xxvii. 1; Lu. xii. 20.

2nd. That he may come at such an hour as we think not, ver. 44. Though there be such uncertainty in the time, there is none in the thing itself. Though we know not when he will come, we are sure he will come. His parting word was, "Surely, I come quickly," his saying, "I come," surely obligeth us to expect him; his saying, "I come quickly," obligeth us to be always expecting him; for it keeps us in a state of expectancy. "In such an hour as ye think not," that is, such an hour as they which are unready and unprepared think not, ver. 50; nay, such an hour, as the most lively expectants, perhaps, think least likely. The bridegroom came when the wise were slumbering. It is agreeable to our present state, that we should be under the influence of a constant and general expectation, rather than that of particular presages and prognostications, which we are sometimes tempted vainly to desire and wish for.

3rd. The children of this world are thus wise in their generation, that when they know of a danger approaching, they will keep awake, and stand on their guard against it. This he shews in a particular instance, ver. 43. If the master of a house had notice that a thief would come such a night, and such a watch of the night, (for they divided the night into four watches, allowing three hours to each,) and would make an attempt upon his house, though it were the midnight watch, when he was most sleepy, yet he would be up, and listen to every noise in every corner, and be ready to give him a warm reception. Now though we know not just when our Lord will come, yet knowing that he will come, and come quickly, and without any other warning than what he hath given in his word, it concerns us to watch always. Note, First. We have every one of us a house to keep, that lies exposed, in which all we are worth is laid up, and that house is our own souls, which we must keep with all diligence. Secondly. The day of the Lord comes by surprise, as a thief in the night. Christ chooseth to come when he is least expected, that the triumphs of his enemies may be turned into the greater shame, and the fears of his friends into the greater joy. Thirdly. If Christ when he comes, finds us asleep and unready, our house will be broken up, and we shall lose all we are worth; not as by a thief, unjustly, but as by a just and legal process; death and judgment will seize upon all we have, to our irreparable damage, and utter undoing. Therefore be ready, be ye also ready; as ready at all times as the good man of the house would be at the hour when he expected the thief; must put on the armour of God, that we may not only stand in that evil day, but as more than conquerors may divide the spoil.

2. Because the issue of our Lord's coming will be very happy and comfortable to those that shall be found ready, but very dismal and dreadful to those that are not, ver. 45, &c. This is represented by the different state of good and bad servants, when their lord comes to reckon with them. It is likely to be well or ill with us to eternity, according as we are found ready or unready at that day; for Christ comes to render to every man according to his works. Now this parable, with which the chapter closeth, is applicable to all Christians, who are in profession and obligation God's servants; but it seems especially intended as a warning to ministers, for the servant spoken of is a steward. Now observe what Christ here saith.

1st. Concerning the good servant; he shews here what he is, a ruler of the household; what being so he should be, faithful and wise; and what if he be so he shall be, eternally blessed. Here are good instructions and encouragements to the ministers of Christ.

First. Here is his place and office. He is one "whom his lord has made ruler over his household, to give them meat in due season." Note, 1st. The church of Christ is his household, or family, standing in relation to him, as the father and master of it. It is the household of God, a family named from Christ, Eph. iii. 15. 2nd. Gospel ministers are appointed rulers in this household; not as princes, Christ has entered a caveat against that, but as stewards, or other subordinate officers; not as lords, but as guides; not to prescribe new ways, but to shew and lead in the ways that Christ has appointed; that is the signification of the ἡγούμενος, which we translate, "having rule over you," Heb. xiii. 17. And as overseers; not to cut out new work, but to direct in, and quicken to the work which Christ has ordered; that is the signification of ἐπισκοπος, bishops. They are rulers by Christ; what power they have is derived from him, and none may take it from them, or abridge it to them; he is one whom "the Lord has made ruler," Christ has the making of ministers. They are rulers under Christ, and act in subordination to him, and rulers for Christ, for the advancement of his kingdom. 3rd. The work of gospel ministers, is to give to Christ's household their meat in due season; as stewards, and therefore they have the keys delivered to them. 1. Their work is to give, not take to themselves, Eze. xxxiv. 8; but give to the family what the Master has bought, to dispense what Christ has purchased. And to ministers it is said, that "it is more blessed to give, than to receive," Acts ix. 35. 2. It is to give meat, not to give law, that is Christ's work; but to deliver those doctrines to the church which, if duly digested, will be nourishment to souls. They must give, not the poison of false doctrines, not the stones of hard and unprofitable doctrines, but the meat that is sound and wholesome. 3. It must be given in due season, ἐν καιρῷ, while there is time for it; when eternity comes it will be too late; we must work while it is day, or, in time, that is, whenever any opportunity offers itself; or, in the stated time, time after time; according as the duty of every day requires.

Secondly. His right discharge of this office. The good servant, if thus preferred, will be a good steward; for, 1st. He is faithful; stewards must be so, 1 Cor. iv. 2. He that is trusted, must be trusty; and the greater the trust is, the more is expected from them: it is a great, good thing that is committed to ministers, 2 Tim. ii. 2; and they must be faithful, as Moses was, Heb. iii. 2. Christ counts those ministers, and those only, that are faithful, 1 Tim. i. 12. A faithful minister of Jesus Christ is one that sincerely designs his Master's honour, not his own; delivers the whole counsel of God, not his own fancies and conceits; follows Christ's institutions, and adheres to them; regards the meanest, reproves the greatest, and doth not respect persons. 2nd. He is wise to understand his duty, and the proper season of it; and in guiding of the flock

xxiv. 51. The expression "shall cut him asunder" is commonly applied to the punishment of cutting or sawing asunder, to which reference is made in some ancient documents. (Compare Dan. ii. 5, iii. 29.) It may be doubted, however, whether the figure is to be interpreted so rigidly, because it follows that the criminal should have his portion with the hypocrites, who were not actually cut asunder under any government. In any case the sense here is generally clear, namely, to inflict the severest punishment. Some have maintained that the phrase here properly means removal from office and the like, answering to the Hebrew "to cut off," when spoken of excommunication, or excision from the body of Israel.

xxv. 1-13. This whole parable is founded on the marriage customs of Oriental countries, and its chief features may be illustrated by what takes place at the present day. The following extract from Ward's there is need, not only of the integrity of the heart, but the skilfulness of the hands. Honesty may suffice for a good servant, but wisdom is necessary to a good steward; for it is profitable to direct. 3rd. He is doing, so doing as his office requires. The ministry is a good work, and they whose office it is have always something to do; they must not indulge themselves in ease, not leave the work undone, or carelessly turn it off to others; but be doing, and doing to the purpose: so doing, giving meat to the household, minding their own business, and not meddling with that which is foreign. So doing, as the master has appointed, as the office imports, and as the case of the family doth require; not talking, but doing. It was the motto Mr. Perkins used, Minister verbi est—be doing. 4th. He is found doing when his master comes; which intimates, 1. Constancy at his work. At what hour soever his master comes, he is found busy at the work of the day. Ministers should not leave empty spaces in their time, lest their Lord should come in one of those empty spaces. As with a good God, the end of one mercy is the beginning of another; so with a good man, a good minister, the end of one duty is the beginning of another. When Calvin was persuaded to remit his ministerial labours, he answered with some resentment, 'What? would you have my Master find me idle?' 2. Perseverance in his work, till his Lord doth come. Hold fast till then, Rev. ii. 25; 'continue in these things,' 1 Tim. iv. 16; vi. 14. Endure to the end.

Thirdly. The recompence of reward intended him for this, in three things: 1st. He shall be taken notice of. This is intimated in these words, 'Who then is that faithful and wise servant?' which suppose that there are but few who answer this character; such an interpreter is one of a thousand, such a faithful and wise steward. Those who thus distinguish themselves now by humility, diligence, and sincerity in their work, Christ will in the great day both dignify and distinguish by the glory conferred on them. 2nd. He shall be blessed: 'Blessed is that servant,' and Christ's pronouncing him blessed makes him so. All the dead that die in the Lord are blessed, Rev. xiv. 13; but there is a peculiar blessedness secured to them that approve themselves faithful stewards, and are found doing. Next to the honour of those who die in the field of battle, suffering for Christ, as the martyrs, is the honour of those that die in the field of service,—ploughing, and sowing, and reaping for Christ. 3rd. He shall be preferred, ver. 47: 'He shall make him ruler over all his goods;' alluding to the way of great men, who, if the stewards of their house carry themselves well in that place, commonly prefer them to be the managers of their estates; thus Joseph was preferred in the house of Potiphar, Gen. xxxix. 4, 6. But the greatest honour which the kindest master ever did to his most tried servants in this world, is nothing to that weight of glory which the Lord Jesus will confer upon his faithful, watchful servants in the world to come. What is here said by a similitude, is the same that is said more plainly, Jno. xii. 26, 'Him will my Father honour.' And God's servants, when thus preferred, shall be perfect in wisdom and holiness to bear that weight of glory; so that there is no danger from these servants when they reign.

2nd. Concerning the evil servant. Here we have, 1. First, His description given, ver. 48, 49; where we have the wretch drawn in his own colours. The vilest of creatures is a wicked man, the vilest of men is a wicked Christian, and the vilest of them a wicked minister. Corruptio optimi est pessima,—'what is best, when corrupted, becomes the worst.' Wickedness in the prophets of Jerusalem is a horrible thing indeed, Jer. xxiii. 14. Here is, 1st. The cause of his wickedness; and that is a practical disbelief of Christ's second coming. He hath said in his heart, 'My Lord delays his coming;' and therefore he begins to think he will never come, but has quite forsaken his church. Observe, 1. Christ knows what they say in their hearts, who with their lips cry, 'Lord, Lord,' as this servant here. 2. The delay of Christ's coming, though it is a gracious instance of his patience, yet is greatly abused by wicked people, whose hearts are thereby hardened in their wicked ways. When Christ's coming is looked upon as doubtful, or a thing at a mighty distance, the hearts of men are fully set to do evil, Ecd. viii. 11; see Eze. xii. 27. They that walk by sense are ready to say of the unseen Jesus, as the people did of Moses, when he tarried in the mount upon their errand, 'We wot not what is become of him;' and therefore 'up, make us gods;' the world a god, the belly a god, any thing but He that should be.

2nd. The particulars of his wickedness; and they are sins of the first magnitude: he is a slave to his passions and his appetites.

1. Persecution is here charged upon him. He begins 'to smite his fellow servants.' Note, 1st. Even the stewards of the house are to look upon all the servants of the house as their fellow servants, and therefore are forbidden to lord it over them. If the angel call himself fellow servant to John, Rev. xix. 10, no marvel if John have learned to call himself brother to the Christians of the churches of Asia, Rev. i. 9. 2nd. It is no new thing to see evil servants smiting their fellow servants—both private Christians and faithful ministers. He smites them, either because they reprove him, or because they will not bow and do him reverence; will not say as he saith, and do as he doth, against their consciences; smites them with the tongue, as they smote the prophet, Jer. xviii. 18; and if he get power into his hand, or can press those into his service that have, as the ten horns upon the head of the beast, it goes further: Pashur the priest smote Jeremiah, and put him in the stocks, Jer. xx. 1. The revolvers have many times been, of all others, most profound to make slaughter, Hos. v. 2. The steward, when he smites his fellow servants, doth it under colour of his master's authority, and in his name he saith, 'Let the Lord be glorified,' Isa. lxvi. 5; but he shall know that he could not put a greater affront upon his master.

2. Profaneness and immorality. He begins 'to eat and drink with the drunken.' 1st. He associates with the worst of sinners, hath fellowship with them, is intimate with them; he walks in their counsel, stands in their way, sits in their seat, and sings their songs. The drunken are the merry, jovial company, and those he is for; and thus he hardens them in their wickedness. 2nd. He doth like them, eats and drinks and is drunken; so it is in Luke. And this is an inlet to all manner of sin. Drunkenness is a leading wickedness; they who are slaves to that, are never masters of themselves in any thing else. The persecutors of God's people have commonly been the most vicious and immoral men. Persecuting consciences, whatever the pretensions be, are commonly the most profligate and debauched consciences. What will not they be drunk with, that will be drunk with the blood of the saints? Well, this is the description of a wicked minister, who yet may have the common gifts of learning and utterance above others; and, as hath been said of some, may preach so well in the pulpit, that it is a pity he should ever come out, and yet live so ill out of the pulpit, that it is a pity he should ever come in.

Secondly. His doom read, ver. 50, 51. The coat and character of wicked ministers will not only not secure them from condemnation, but will greatly aggravate it. They can plead no exemption from Christ's jurisdiction, whatever they pretend to in the church of Rome from that of the civil magistrate,—no benefit of clergy at Christ's bar. Observe,

1st. The surprisingness of his doom, ver. 50: 'The lord of that servant will come.' Note, 1. Our putting off the thoughts of Christ's coming will not put off his coming. Whatever fancy he deludes himself with, his Lord will come.

The unbelief of man shall not make that great promise or threatening, (call it which you will,) of none effect. 2. The coming of Christ will be a most dreadful surprise to secure and careless sinners, especially to wicked ministers: 'He shall come in a day when he looketh not for him.' Note, Those that have slighted the warnings of the Word, and silenced those of their own consciences concerning the judgment to come, cannot expect any other warning; those will be adjudged sufficient legal notice given, whether taken or not; and no unfairness can be charged on Christ if he come suddenly, without giving other notice. Behold, he has told us before.

2nd. The severity of his doom, ver. 51. It is not more severe than righteous, but it is a doom that carries in it utter ruin, wrapt up in two dreadful words—death and damnation.

1. Death. His lord 'shall cut him asunder,' ἀποκομῆσαι αὐτόν,—'he shall cut him off' from the land of the living, from the congregation of the righteous, shall separate him unto evil; which is the definition of a curse, Deu. xxix. 21; shall cut him down, as a tree that cumbereth the ground; perhaps it alludes to the sentence often used in the law, 'That soul shall be cut off from his people,' noting an utter extirpation. Death cuts off a good man, as a choice limb is cut off, to be grafted in a better stock; but it cuts off a wicked man as a withered branch is cut off for the fire; cut him off from this world, which he set his heart so much upon, and was, as it were, one with; or, as we read it, 'shall cut him asunder,' that is, part body and soul; send the body to the grave, to be a prey for worms, and the soul to hell, to be a prey for devils, and there is the sinner cut asunder. The soul and body of a godly man at death part fairly,—the one cheerfully lifted up to God, the other left to the dust,—but the soul and body of a wicked man at death are cut asunder, torn asunder, for to them death is the king of terrors, Job xviii. 14. The wicked servant divided himself between God and the world, Christ and Belial, his profession and his lusts; justly therefore will he thus be divided.

2. Damnation. He shall 'appoint him his portion with the hypocrites;' and a miserable portion it will be, for 'there shall be weeping.' Note, 1st. There is a place and state of everlasting misery in the other world, where there is nothing but 'weeping and gnashing of teeth;' which speaks the soul's tribulation and anguish under God's indignation and wrath. 2nd. The Divine sentence will appoint this place and state as the portion of those who by their own sin were fitted for it. Even he of whom he said that he was his Lord shall thus appoint him his portion. He that is now the Saviour will then be the Judge, and the everlasting state of the children of men will be as he appoints. They that choose the world for their portion in this life, will have hell for their portion in the other life: 'This is the portion of a wicked man from God,' Job xx. 29. 3rd. Hell is the proper place of hypocrites. This wicked servant has 'his portion with the hypocrites.' They are, as it were, the freeholders; other sinners are but as inmates with them, and have but a portion of their misery. When Christ would express the most severe punishment in the other world, he calls it 'the portion of hypocrites.' If there be any place in hell hotter than other, as it is like there is, it will be the allotment of those that have the form but hate the power of godliness. 4th. Wicked ministers will have their portion in the other world with the worst of sinners, even with the hypocrites; and justly, for they are the worst of hypocrites. The blood of Christ, which they have by their profaneness trampled under their feet, and the blood of souls, which they have by their unfaithfulness brought upon their heads, will bear hard upon them in that place of torment. 'Son, remember,' will be as cutting a word to a minister, if he perish, as to any other sinner whatsoever. Let them, therefore, who preach to others, fear, lest they themselves should be castaways.

CHAPTER XXV.

This chapter continues and concludes our Saviour's discourse, which began in the foregoing chapter, concerning his second coming, and the end of the world. This was his farewell sermon of caution, as that, Jno. xiv. xv. and xvi., was of comfort to his disciples; and they had need of both in a world of so much temptation and trouble as this is. The application of that discourse was, 'Watch therefore, and be ye therefore ready.' Now in prosecution of these serious, awakening cautions, in this chapter we have three parables, the scope of which is the same—to quicken us all, with the utmost care and diligence, to get ready for Christ's second coming, which, in all his farewell to his church, mention was made of, as that before he died, Jno. xiv. 2; at his ascension, Acts i. 11; and at the shutting up of the canon of the Scripture, Rev. xxii. 20. Now it concerns us to prepare for Christ's coming, 1. That we may then be ready to attend upon him; and this is shewn in the parable of the ten virgins, ver. 1–13. 11. That we may then be ready to give up our account to him; and this is shewn in the parable of the three servants, ver. 14–30. 111. That we may then be ready to receive from him our final sentence, and that it may be to eternal life; and this is shewn in a more plain description of the process of the last judgment, ver. 31–46. These are things of awful consideration, because of everlasting concern to every one of us.

WHEN shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, which took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom. 2 And five of them were wise, and five were foolish. 3 They that were foolish took their lamps, and took no oil with them: 4 But the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps. 5 While the bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept. 6 And at midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him. 7 Then all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps. 8 And the foolish said unto the wise, Give us of your oil; for our lamps are gone

'View of the Hindoos' affords one of the most remarkable parallels to the parable. It relates to what the writer saw at Serampore:—'After waiting two or three hours, at length, near midnight, it was announced, as if in the very words of Scripture, 'Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him.' All the persons employed now lighted their lamps, and ran with them in their hands, to fill up their stations in the procession. Some of them had lost their lights, and were unprepared, but it was then too late to seek them; and the cavalcade moved forward to the house of the bride, at which place the company entered a large and splendidly illuminated area before the house, covered with an awning, where a great multitude of friends, dressed in their best apparel, were seated upon mats. The bridegroom was carried in the arms of a friend, and placed on a superb seat in the midst of the company, where he sat a short time, and then went into the house, the door of which was immediately shut, and guarded by keepers. I and others expostulated with the

out. 9 But the wise answered, saying, Not so; lest there be not enough for us and you: but go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves. 10 And while they went to buy, the bridegroom came; and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage: and the door was shut. 11 Afterward came also the other virgins, saying, Lord, Lord, open to us. 12 But he answered and said, Verily I say unto you, I know you not. 13 Watch therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh.

Here, First. That in general which is to be illustrated is the kingdom of heaven, the state of things under the Gospel, the external kingdom of Christ, and the administration and success of it. Some of Christ's parables had shewed us what it is like now, in the present reception of it, as ch. xiii.; this tells us what it shall be like, when the mystery of God shall be finished, and that kingdom delivered up to the Father. The administration of Christ's government towards the ready and the unready in the great day, may be illustrated by this similitude; or, the kingdom is put for the subjects of the kingdom. The professors of Christianity shall then be likened to these ten virgins, and shall be thus distinguished.

Secondly. That by which it is illustrated is a marriage solemnity; it was a custom sometimes used among the Jews on that occasion, that the bridegroom came, attended with his friends, late in the night, to the house of the bride, where she expected him, attended with her bridesmaids, who, upon notice given of the bridegroom's approach, were to go out with lamps in their hands, to light him into the house with ceremony and formality, in order to the celebrating of the nuptials with great mirth; and some think on these occasions they had usually ten virgins; for the Jews never held a synagogue, circumcised, kept the pass-over, or contracted marriage, but ten persons at least were present. Boaz, when he married Ruth, had ten witnesses, Ru. iv. 2. Now in this parable, 1. The bridegroom is our Lord Jesus Christ; he is so represented in the forty-fifth Psalm, Solomon's Song, and often in the New Testament. It speaks his singular and superlative love to, and his faithful and inviolable covenant with, his spouse the church. Believers are now betrothed to Christ, Hos. ii. 19; but the solemnizing of the marriage is reserved for the great day, when the bride, the Lamb's wife, will have made herself completely ready, Rev. xix. 7, 9. 2. The virgins are the professors of religion, members of the church, but here represented as her companions, Ps. xlv. 14, as elsewhere her children, Isa. liv. 1; her ornaments, Isa. xlix. 18. They that follow the Lamb are said to be virgins, Rev. xiv. 4; noting their beauty and purity; they are to be presented as chaste virgins to Christ, 2 Cor. xi. 2. The bridegroom is a king, so these virgins are maids of honour, virgins without number, Cant. vi. 8, yet here said to be ten. 3. The office of these virgins is to meet the bridegroom, which is as much their happiness as their duty. They come to wait upon the bridegroom when he appears, and in the meantime to wait for him. See here the nature of Christianity. As Christians, we profess ourselves to be, 1st. Attendants upon Christ, to do him honour as the glorious Bridegroom, to be to him for a name and a praise, especially then "when he shall come to be glorified in his saints." We must follow him as honorary servants to their masters, Jno. xii. 26; hold up the name, and hold forth the praise of the exalted Jesus: this is our business. 2nd. Expectants of Christ, and of his second coming. As Christians, we profess, not only to believe and look for, but to love and long for the appearing of Christ, and to act in our whole conversation with a regard to it. The second coming of Christ is the centre in which all the lines of our religion meet, and to which the whole of the Divine life hath a constant reference and tendency. 4. Their chief concern is to have lights in their hands when they attend the bridegroom, thus to do him honour and do him service. Note, Christians are children of light. The Gospel is light, and they who receive it must not only be enlightened by it themselves, but must shine as lights; must hold it forth, Phil. ii. 15, 16. This in general.

Now, concerning these ten virgins, we may observe,

1. Their different character, with the proof and evidence of it.

First. Their character was, that "five were wise, and five foolish," ver. 2; and "wisdom excelleth folly, as far as light excelleth darkness," so saith Solomon, a competent judge, Ecc. ii. 13. Note, Those of the same profession and denomination among men, may yet be of characters vastly different in the sight of God. Sincere Christians are the wise virgins, and hypocrites the foolish ones, as in another parable they are represented by wise and foolish builders. Note, Those are wise or foolish, indeed, that are so in the affairs of their souls.

door-keepers, but in vain." With regard to the number ten in the parable, it has been noted that one of the rabbis mentions ten lamps or torches as the usual number in Jewish marriage processions. For "are gone out," in verse 8, Trench, Wordsworth, Alford, and others propose, as a better rendering, "are going out." The clause in verse 13, "wherein the Son of man cometh," is of doubtful authority, and is excluded by good modern editors and critics.

True religion is true wisdom; sin is folly, but especially the sin of hypocrisy; for those are the greatest fools that are wise in their own conceit, and those the worst of sinners that feign themselves just men. Some observe, from the equal number of the wise and foolish, what a charitable decorum (it is Archbishop Tillotson's expression) Christ observes, as if he would hope that the number of true believers were nearly equal to that of hypocrites, or at least, teach us to hope the best concerning those that profess religion, and to think of them with a bias to the charitable side. Though in judging of ourselves, we ought to remember that the gate is strait, and few find it; yet, in judging of others, we ought to remember that the Captain of our salvation brings many sons to glory.

Secondly. The evidence of this character was in the very thing which they were to attend to; by that they are judged of.

1. It was the folly of the foolish virgins that they "took their lamps, and took no oil with them," ver. 3. They had just oil enough to make their lamps burn for the present, to make a show with, as if they intended to meet the bridegroom; but no cruse or bottle of oil with them, for a recruit, if the bridegroom tarried. Thus hypocrites: 1st. They have no principle within. They have a lamp of profession in their hands, but have not in their hearts that stock of sound knowledge, rooted dispositions, and settled resolutions, which are necessary to carry them through the services and trials of the present state. They act under the influence of external inducements, but are void of spiritual life; like a tradesman that sets up without a stock, or the seed on the stony ground that wanted root. 2nd. They have no prospect of, nor make provision for, what is to come. They took lamps for a present show, but not oil for after use. This incogitancy is the ruin of many professors; all their care is to recommend themselves to their neighbours, whom they now converse with; not to approve themselves to Christ, whom they must hereafter appear before: as if any thing will serve, provided it will but serve for the present. Tell them of things not seen as yet, and you are like Lot to his sons in law, as one that mocketh. They do not provide for hereafter, as the ant doth, nor lay up for the time to come, 2 Cor. iv. 18.

2. It was the wisdom of the wise virgins that "they took oil in their vessels with their lamps," ver. 4. They had a good principle within, which would maintain and keep up their profession. 1st. Their heart is the vessel, which it is our wisdom to get furnished; for out of a good treasure there good things must be brought: but if that root be rottenness, the blossom will be dust. 2nd. Grace is the oil which we must have in this vessel; in the tabernacle there was constant provision made of oil for the light, Ex. xxxv. 14. Our light must shine before men in good works; but this cannot be, or not long, unless there be a fixed, active principle in the heart, of faith in Christ, and love to God and our brethren; from which we must act in every thing we do in religion, with an eye to what is before us. They that took oil in their vessels, did it upon supposition that perhaps the bridegroom might tarry. Note, In looking forwards, it is good to prepare for the worst; to lay in for a long siege. But remember that this oil, which keeps the lamps burning, is derived to the candlestick from Jesus Christ, the great and good olive, by the golden pipes of the ordinances, as it is represented in that vision, Zec. iv. 2, 3, 12; which is explained, Jno. i. 16, "Of his fulness have all we received, and grace for grace."

1. Their common fault: during the bridegroom's delay, "they all slumbered and slept," ver. 25. Observe here,

First. "The bridegroom tarried," that is, he did not come all out so soon as they expected. What we look for as certain, we are apt to think is very near; many in the apostles' times imagined that "the day of the Lord was at hand," but it is not so; Christ as to us seems to tarry, and yet really doth not, Hab. ii. 3. There is good reason for the bridegroom's tarrying; there are many intermediate counsels and purposes to be accomplished; the elect must all be called in; God's patience must be manifested, and the saints' patience tried; the harvest of the earth must be ripened, and so must the harvest of heaven too. But though Christ tarry past our time, he will not tarry past the due time.

Secondly. While he tarried, those that waited for him grew careless, and forgot what they were attending; "they all slumbered and slept," as if they had given over looking for him; for when the Son of man comes, he will not find faith, Lu. xviii. 8. Those that inferred the suddenness of it from its certainty, when that answered not their expectation, were apt, from the delay, to infer its uncertainty. The wise virgins slumbered, and the foolish slept; so some distinguish it; however, they were both faulty. The wise virgins kept their lamps burning, but did not keep themselves awake. Note, Too many good Christians, when they have been long in profession, grow remiss in their preparations for Christ's second coming; they intermit their care, abate their zeal, their graces are not lively, nor their works found perfect before God; and though all love be not lost, yet the first love is left. If it was hard to the disciples to watch with Christ one hour, much more to watch with him an age. "I sleep," saith the spouse, "but my heart waketh." Observe, First they slumbered, and then they slept. Note, One degree of carelessness and remissness makes way for another. Those that allow themselves in slumbering, will scarce keep themselves from sleeping; therefore dread the beginning of spiritual decays: Veniēti occurrēte morbo,—"attend to the first symptoms of disease." The ancients generally understood the virgins' slumbering and sleeping of their dying; they all died, wise and foolish, Ps. xlix. 10, before judgment-day. So Ferus: Antequam veniat sponsus, omnibus obdormiscendum est, h. e. moriendum,—"before the bridegroom come, all must sleep, that is, die; and so Calvin:—I think it is rather to be taken as we have opened it.

11. The surprising summons given them to attend the bridegroom, ver. 6: "At midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh." Note,

First. Though Christ tarry long, he will come at last; though he seem slow, he is sure. In his first coming he was thought long by those that "waited for the consolation of Israel," yet in "the fulness of time" he came; so his second coming, though long deferred, is not forgotten; his enemies shall find to their cost, that forbearance is no acquittance; and his friends shall find to their comfort, that "the vision is for an appointed time, and at the end it shall speak, and not lie." The year of the redeemed is fixed, and it will come.

Secondly. Christ's coming will be at our midnight, when we least look for him, and are most disposed to take our rest. His coming for the relief and comfort of his people, often is when the good intended seems to be at the greatest distance; and his coming to reckon with his enemies, is when they put the evil day furthest from them. It was at midnight that the firstborn of Egypt were destroyed, and Israel delivered, Ex. xii. 22. Death often comes when it is least expected; the soul required "this night," Lu. xii. 20. Christ will come when he pleaseth, to shew his sovereignty; and will not let us know when, to teach us our duty.

Thirdly. When Christ comes, we must go forth to meet him. As Christians, we are bound to attend all the motions of the Lord Jesus, and meet him in all his outgoings. When he comes to us at death, we must go forth out of the body, out of the world, to meet him with affections and workings of soul, suitable to the discoveries we then expect him to make of himself. "Go ye forth to meet him," is a call to those who are habitually prepared to be actually ready.

xxv. 14. Although the words "the kingdom of heaven" do not occur in the original of this verse, they are properly added in the translation. The words "travelling into a far country" are better rendered by Alford "leaving his home," because they do not indicate where he was going to.

xxv. 15. The word "talents" here must be understood in a general sense of a large sum of money, the exact amount being undetermined, as it is not stated whether talents of silver or of gold Fourthly. The notice of Christ's approach, and the call to meet him will be awakening: "there was a cry made." His first coming was not with any observation at all, nor did they say, "Lo, here is Christ, or, Lo, he is there;" "he was in the world, and the world knew him not;" but his second coming will be with the observation of all the world; "every eye shall see him." There will be a cry from heaven, for he shall descend with a shout, "Arise, ye dead, and come to judgment;" and a cry from the earth too, a cry to rocks and mountains, Rev. vi. 16.

IV. The address they all made to answer this summons, ver. 7: they all "arose and trimmed their lamps," snuffed them, and supplied them with oil, and went about with all expedition to put themselves in a posture to receive the bridegroom. Now,

First. This in the wise virgins speaks an actual preparation for the bridegroom's coming. Note, Those that are best prepared for death, yet upon the immediate arrests of it have work to do to get themselves actually ready, that they may be found in peace, 2 Pet. iii. 14; found doing, ch. xxiv. 46; and not found naked, 2 Cor. v. 3: it will be a day of search and inquiry, and it concerns us to think how we shall then be found. When we see the day approaching, we must address ourselves to our dying work with all seriousness, renewing our repentance for sin, our consent to the covenant, our farewells to the world, and our souls must be carried out towards God in suitable breathings.

Secondly. In the foolish virgins it notes a vain confidence and conceit of the goodness of their state, and their readiness for another world. Note, Even counterfeit graces will serve a man to make a show of when he comes to die, as well as they have done all his life long; the hypocrite's hopes blaze when they are just expiring, like a lightening before death.

V. The distress which the foolish virgins were in for want of oil, ver. 8, 9. This speaks, 1. The apprehensions which some hypocrites have of the misery of their state, even on this side death, when God opens their eyes to see their folly, and themselves perishing with a lie in their right hand. Or, however, 2. The real misery of their state on the other side death, and in the judgment; how far their fair, but false profession of religion, will be from availing them anything in the great day; see what comes of it:

First. Their lamps are gone out. The lamps of hypocrites often go out in this life; when they who have begun in the spirit, end in the flesh, and the hypocrisy breaks out in an open apostasy, 2 Pet. ii. 20. The profession withers, and the credit of it is lost; the hopes fail, and the comfort of them is gone; "how often is the candle of the wicked" thus "put out!" Job xxi. 17. Yet many an hypocrite keeps up both the credit and the comfort of his profession, such as it is, to the last; but what is it when God takes away his soul? Job xxvii. 8. If his candle be not put out before him, it is put out with him, Job xviii. 5, 6; he shall lie down in sorrow, Isa. i. 11. The gains of an hypocritical profession will not follow a man to judgment, ch. vii. 22, 23. The lamps are gone out, when the hypocrite's hope proves like the spider's web, Job viii. 14; and like the giving up of the ghost, Job xi. 20; like Absalom's mule that left him in the oak.

Secondly. They wanted oil to supply them when they were going out. Note, Those that take up short of true grace, will certainly find the want of it one time or other. An external profession, well humoured, may carry a man far, but it will not carry him through; may light him along this world, but the damps of the valley of the shadow of death will put it out.

Thirdly. They would gladly be beholden to the wise virgins for a supply out of their vessels: "Give us of your oil." Note, The day is coming when carnal hypocrites would gladly be found in the condition of true Christians. Those who now hate the strictness of religion, will at death and judgment wish for the solid comforts of it; those who care not to live the life, yet would "die the death of the righteous." The day is coming when those who now look with contempt upon humble, contrite saints, would gladly get an interest in them, and would value those as their best friends and benefactors, whom now they set with the dogs of their flock. "Give us of your oil," that is, 'speak a good word for us,' so some; but there is no occasion for vouchers in the great day; the Judge knows what is every man's true character. But is it not well that they are brought to say, "Give us of your oil?" It is so; but, 1. This request was extorted by sensible necessity. Note, Those will see their need of grace hereafter, when it should save them, that will not see their need of grace now, when it should sanctify and rule them. 2. It comes too late. God would have given them oil, had they asked in time; but there is no buying when the market is over, no bidding when the inch of candle is dropt.

Fourthly. They were denied a share in their companions' oil. It is a sad presage of a repulse with God when they were thus repulsed by good people. The wise answered, not so; that peremptory denial is not in the original, but supplied by the translators. These wise virgins would rather give a reason without a positive refusal, than (as many do) give a positive refusal without a reason. They were well inclined to help their neighbours in distress; but we must not, we cannot, we dare not do it, "lest there be not enough for us and you;" charity begins at home; but "go and buy for yourselves." Note, 1. Those that would be saved must have grace of their own. Though we have benefit by the communion of saints, and the faith and prayers of others may now redound to our advantage, yet our own sanctification is indispensably necessary to our own salvation. "The just shall live by his faith." Every man shall give account of himself, and therefore let every man prove his own work; for he cannot get another to muster for him in that day. 2. Those that have most grace have none to spare; all we have is little enough for ourselves to appear before God in. The best have need to borrow from Christ, but they have none to lend to any of their neighbours. The church of Rome, that dreams of works of supererogation, and the imputation of the righteousness of saints, forgets that it was the wisdom of the wise virgins to understand that they had but oil enough for themselves, and none for others. But observe, these wise virgins did not upbraid the foolish with their neglect, nor boast of their own forecast, nor torment them with suggestions tending to despair, but give them the best advice the case will bear, "Go ye rather to them that sell." Note, Those that deal foolishly in the affairs of their souls, are to be pitied, and not insulted over; "for who maketh thee to differ?" When ministers attend such as have been mindless of God and their souls all their days, but are under death-bed convictions, and because true repentance is never too late, direct them to repent, and turn to God, and close with Christ; yet, because late repentance is seldom true, they do but as these wise virgins did by the foolish, even make the best of bad. They can but tell them what is to be done, if it be not too late; but whether the door may not be shut before it is done, is an unspeakable hazard. It is good advice now, if it be taken in time, "Go to them that sell, and buy for yourselves." Note, Those that would have grace, must have recourse to, and attend upon the means of grace; see Isa. lv. 1.

VI. The coming of the bridegroom, and the issue of all this different character of the wise and foolish virgins. See what came of it.

First. "While they went to buy, the bridegroom came." Note, Those that put off their great work to the last, it is a thousand to one they have not time to do it then. Getting grace is a work of time, and cannot be done in a hurry. While the poor awakened soul addresseth itself upon a sick-bed to repentance and prayer, in a mighty confusion, it scarce knows which end to begin at, or what to do first, and presently death comes, judgment comes; and the work is undone, and the poor sinner undone for ever. This comes of having oil to buy, when we should burn it, and grace to get, when we should use it. "The bridegroom came." Note, Our Lord Jesus will come to his people at the great day as a bridegroom, will come in pomp, and rich attire, attended with his friends: now the bridegroom is taken away from us, we fast, ch. ix. 15, but then will be an everlasting feast: then the bridegroom will fetch home his bride, to be where he is, Isa. lxvii. 24, and will rejoice over his bride, Isa. lxii. 5.

Secondly. "They that were ready went in with him to the marriage." Note, 1. To be eternally glorified, is to go in with Christ to the marriage, to be in his immediate presence, and in the most intimate fellowship and communion with him in a state of eternal rest, joy, and plenty. 2. Those, and those only shall go to heaven hereafter that are made ready for heaven here, that are wrought to the selfsame thing, 2 Cor. v. 5. 3. The suddenness of death, and of Christ's coming to us then, will be no obstruction to our happiness, if we have been habitually prepared.

Thirdly. "The door was shut," as is usual, when all the company is come that are to be admitted. The door was shut, 1. To secure those that were within; that being now made pillars in the house of our God, they may go no more out, Rev. iii. 12. Adam was put into paradise, but the door was left open, and so he went out again; but when glorified saints are put into the heavenly paradise, they are shut in. 2. To seclude those that were out. The state of saints and sinners will then be unalterably fixed, and those that are shut out then, will be shut out for ever. Now the gate is strait, yet it is open; but then it will be shut and bolted, and a great gulf fixed. This was like the shutting of the door of the ark when Noah was in; as he was thereby preserved, so all the rest were finally abandoned.

Fourthly. The foolish virgins came when it was too late, ver. 11: "Afterward came also the other virgins." Note, 1. There are many that will seek admission into heaven when it is too late; as profane Esau, who afterwards would have inherited the blessing. God and religion will be glorified by those late solicitations, though sinners will not be saved by them; it is for the honour of Lord, that is, of fervent and importunate prayer, that those who slight it now will flee to it shortly, and it will not be called whining and canting then. 2. The vain confidence of hypocrites will carry them very far in their expectations of happiness; they go to heaven-gate, and demand entrance, and yet are shut out; lifted up to heaven in a fond conceit of the goodness of their state, and yet thrust down to hell.

Fifthly. They were rejected, as Esau was, ver. 12: "I know you not." Note, We are all concerned to "seek the Lord while he may be found;" for there is a time coming when he will not be found. Time was when, "Lord, Lord, open to us," would have sped well, by virtue of that promise, "Knock, and it shall be opened to you," but now it comes too late. The sentence is solemnly bound on with, "Verily, I say unto you," which amounts to no less than "swearing, in his wrath, that they should never enter into his rest." It speaks him resolved, and them silenced by it.

VII. Here is a practical inference drawn from this parable, ver. 13: "Watch, therefore;" we had it before, ch. xxiv. 42, and here it is repeated as the most needful caution. Note, 1. Our great duty is to watch, to attend to the business of our souls with the utmost diligence and circumspection; be awake, and be wakeful. 2. It is a good reason for our watching, that the time of our Lord's coming is very uncertain; "we know neither the day nor the hour." Therefore every day, and every hour we must be ready, and not off our watch any day in the year, or any hour in the day; "be thou in the fear of the Lord" every day, and "all the day long."

14 For the kingdom of heaven is as a man travelling into a far country, who called his own servants, and delivered unto them his goods. 15 And unto one he gave five talents, to another two, and to another one; to every man according to his several ability; and straightway took his journey. 16 Then he that had received the five talents went and traded with the same, and made them other five talents. 17 And likewise he that had received two, he also gained other two. 18 But he that had received one went and digged in the earth, and hid his lord's money. 19 After a long time the lord of those servants cometh, and reckoneth with them. 20 And so he that had received five talents came and brought other five talents, saying, Lord, thou deliveredst unto me five talents: behold, I have gained beside them five talents more. 21 His lord said unto him, Well done, thou good and faithful servant: thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy lord. 22 He also that had received two talents came and said, Lord, thou deliveredst unto me two talents: behold, I have gained two other talents beside them. 23 His lord said unto him, Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things:

are meant. A talent of gold was worth much more than one of silver.

xxv. 18. The secreting of money with a view to its security was not uncommon in ancient times, and is still resorted to in the East. The extent to which treasures have been hidden and forgotten accounts for the frequent mention by travellers of the subject. Dr. Thomson speaks of the discovery of thousands of gold pieces at Sidon, where they were dug up in a garden. The same writer says there are hundreds of persons engaged in searching for hidden wealth all over the country. He shows that even in modern times wealth is secreted, more especially in times of danger. Of course the sin of the man in the parable consisted in hiding money when there was no need for doing so.

xxv. 24. "A hard man" is one who is harsh and severe. What the servant meant is indicated by what follows, wherein he accuses his master of gathering advantages where he had done nothing to enter thou into the joy of thy lord. 24 Then he which had received the one talent came and said, Lord, I knew thee that thou art an hard man, reaping where thou hast not sown, and gathering where thou hast not strawed: 25 And I was afraid, and went and hid thy talent in the earth: lo, there thou hast that is thine. 26 His lord answered and said unto him, Thou wicked and slothful servant, thou knewest that I reap where I sowed not, and gather where I have not strawed: 27 Thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the exchangers, and then at my coming I should have received mine own with usury. 28 Take therefore the talent from him, and give it unto him which hath ten talents. 29 For unto every one that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance: but from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath. 30 And cast ye the unprofitable servant into outer darkness: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.

We have here the parable of the talents committed to three servants, and this speaks us in a state of work and business, as the former in a state of expectancy. That shewed the necessity of habitual preparation, this of actual diligence in our present work and service: in that we were stirred up to do well for our own souls; in this to lay out ourselves for the glory of God, and the good of others. In this parable, 1. The master is Christ, who is the absolute owner and proprietor of all persons and things, and in a special manner of his church; into his hands all things are delivered. 2. The servants are Christians, his own servants, so they are called, born in his house, bought with his money, devoted to his praise, and employed in his work. It is likely ministers are especially intended here, who are more immediately attending on him, and sent by him. St. Paul often calls himself a servant of Jesus Christ; see 2 Tim. ii. 24. We have three things in general in this parable:

I. The trust committed to these servants: their master "delivered to them his goods;" having appointed them to work, (for Christ keeps no servants to be idle,) he left them something to work upon. Note, 1. Christ's servants have and receive their all from him; for they are of themselves worth nothing, nor any thing they can call their own but sin. 2. Our receiving from Christ is in order to our working for him. Our privileges are intended to find us with business. "The manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal." 3. Whatever we receive to be made use of for Christ, still the property is vested in him; we are but tenants upon his land, stewards of his manifold grace, 1 Pet. iv. 10. Now observe here,

First, On what occasion this trust was committed to these servants: the master was "travelling into a far country;" this is explained, Eph. iv. 8, "When he ascended on high, he gave gifts unto men." Note, 1. When Christ went to heaven, he was "as a man travelling into a far country;" that is, he went with a purpose to be away a great while. 2. When he went, he took care to furnish his church with all things necessary for it, during his personal absence. For, and in consideration of his departure, he committed to his church truths, laws, promises, and powers: these were the παράκαταβίση, the great depositum, as it is called, 1 Tim. vi. 20; 2 Tim. i. 14; the "good thing that is committed" to us; and he sent his Spirit, to enable his servants to teach and profess those truths, to press and observe those laws, to improve and apply those promises, and to exercise and employ those powers, ordinary or extraordinary. Thus Christ at his ascension left his goods to his church.

Secondly, In what proportion this trust was committed: 1. He gave talents. A talent of silver is computed to be, in our money, £353 11s. 10d.; so the learned Bishop Cumberland. Note, Christ's gifts are rich and valuable, the purchases of his blood inestimable, and none of them mean. 2. He gave to some more, to others less; "to one five talents, to another two, to another one; to every one according to his several ability." When Divine providence has made a difference in men's ability, as to mind, body, estate, relation, interest, Divine grace dispenseth spiritual gifts accordingly, but still the ability itself is from him. Observe, 1st. Every one had some, one talent at least; and that is not a despicable stock for a poor servant to begin with. A soul of our own is the one talent we are every one of us intrusted with, and it will find us with work. Hoc nempe ab homine exigitur, ut prosit hominibus; si fieri potest multis; si minus, paucis; si minus, proximis; si minus, sibi: nam cum se utilem ceteris efficit, commune agit negotium. Et si quis bene de se meretur, hoc ipso aliis prodest quod aliis profuturum parat. It is the duty of a man to render himself beneficial to those around him, to a great number, if possible; but if this is denied him, to a few; to his intimate connexions; or, at least, to himself. He that is useful to others, may be reckoned a common good. And whoever entitles himself to his own approbation, is serviceable to others, as forming himself to those habits which will result in their favour.—Seneca de Otio Sapient. 2nd. All had not alike, for they had not all like abilities and opportunities; God is a free agent, "dividing to every man severally as he will;" some are cut out for service in one kind, others in another, as the members of the natural body. When the householder had thus settled his affairs, he "straightway took his journey." Our Lord Jesus, when he had given commandments to his apostles, as one in haste to be gone, he went to heaven.

II. The different management and improvement of this trust, which we have an account of, ver. 16–18.

First, Two of the servants did well.

1. They were diligent and faithful, they "went and traded;" they put the money they were intrusted with to the use for which it was intended; laid it out in goods, and made returns of it; as soon as ever their master was gone, they immediately applied themselves to their business. Those that have so much work to do, as every Christian has, have need to set about it quickly, and lose no time. They "went and traded." Note, 1. true Christian is a spiritual tradesman. Trades are called mysteries, "and without controversy great is the mystery of godliness." It is a manufacture trade; there is something to be done by us upon our own hearts, and for the good of others. It is a merchant trade: things of less value to us are parted with for things of greater value; wisdom's merchandise, Pr. iii. 15; ch. xiii. 45. A tradesman is one that, having made his trade his choice, and taken pains to learn it, makes it his business to follow it, lays out all he hath for the advancement of it, makes all other affairs truckle to it, and lives upon the gain of it. Thus doth a true Christian in the work of religion; we have no stocks of our own to trade with, but trade, as factors, with our Master's stock. The endowments of the mind, reason, wit, learning, must be used in subserviency to religion; the enjoyments of the world, estate, credit, interest, power, preferment, must be improved for the honour of Christ. The ordinances of the Gospel, and our opportunities of attending them, Bibles, ministers, sabbaths, sacraments, must be improved for the end for which they were instituted, and communion with God kept up by them, and the gifts and graces of the Spirit must be exercised; and this is trading with our talents.

2. They were successful; they doubled their stock, and in a little time made cent. per cent. of it: he that had five talents soon made them other five. Trading with our talents is not always successful with others, but however it shall be so to ourselves, Isa. xlix. 4. Note, The hand of the diligent makes rich in graces, and comforts, and treasures of good works. There is a great deal to be got by industry in religion. Observe, The returns were in proportion to the receivings. 1st. From those to whom God hath given five talents, he expects the improvement of five; and to reap plentifully, where he sows plentifully: the greater gifts any have, the more pains they ought to take, as those must that have a large stock to manage. 2nd. From those to whom he has given but two talents, he expects only the improvement of two, which may encourage those who are placed in a lower and narrower sphere of usefulness, if they lay out themselves to do good according to the best of their capacity and opportunity, they shall be accepted, though they do not so much good as others.

Secondly, The third did ill, ver. 18: "He that had received one talent, went and hid his lord's money." Though the parable represents but one in three unfaithful, yet, in a history that answers this parable, we find the disproportion quite the other way: when ten lepers were cleansed, nine of the ten hid the talent, and only one returned to give thanks, Lu. xvii. 17, 18. The unfaithful servant was he that had but one talent; doubtless there are many that have five talents, and bury them all; great abilities, great advantages, and yet do no good with them; but Christ would hint to us, 1. That if he that had but one talent be reckoned with thus for burying that one, much more will they be accounted offenders that have more, that have many, and bury them. If he that was but of small capacity, was cast into utter darkness, because he did not improve what he had, as he might have done, "of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy," that tramples under foot the greatest advantages? 2. That many times those who have least to do for God, do least of what they have to do. Some make it an excuse for their laziness, that they have not the opportunities of serving God that others have; and because they have not wherewithal to do what they say they would, they will not do what we are sure they can, and so sit down and do nothing: it is really an aggravation of their sloth, that when they have but one talent to take care about, they neglect that one. He "dugged in the earth," and hid the talent, for fear it should be stolen; he did not mispend or misemploy it, did not embezzle it, or squander it away, but he hid it. Money is like muck, (so my Lord Bacon used to say,) good for nothing in the heap, but it must be spread; yet it is an evil we have often seen under the sun, treasure heaped together, Jas. v. 3; Eccl. vi. 1, 2, which doth good to nobody; and so it is in spiritual gifts; many have them, and make no use of them for the end for which they were given them. Those that have estates, and do not lay out in works of piety and charity; that have power and interest, and do not with it promote religion in the places where they live; ministers, that have capacities and opportunities of doing good, but do not stir up the gift that is in them, are those slothful servants that seek their own things more than Christ's. He "hid his lord's money;" Had it been his own, he might have done as he pleased; but whatever abilities and advantages we have, they are not our own, we are but stewards of them, and must give account to our Lord, whose goods they are. It was an aggravation of his slothfulness, that his fellow-servants were busy and successful in trading, and their zeal should have provoked his. Are others active, and shall we be idle?

III. The account of this improvement, ver. 19. 1. The account is deferred; it is not till after a long time that they are reckoned with; not that the master neglects his affairs, or that God is slack concerning his promise, 2 Pet. iii. 9. No, he is ready to judge, 1 Pet. iv. 5; but every thing must be done in its time and order. 2. Yet the day of account comes at last; "The lord of those servants reckoneth with them." Note, The stewards of the manifold grace of God must shortly give account of their stewardship. We must all be reckoned with, what good we have got to our own souls, and what good we have done to others, by the advantages we have enjoyed; see Rom. xiv. 10, 11. Now here is,

First, The good account of the faithful servants; and there observe, The servants, giving up the account, ver. 20, 22: "Lord, thou deliverdest to me five talents;" and to me "two;" behold, "I have gained five talents," "two talents more."

1. Christ's faithful servants acknowledge with thankfulness his vouchsafements to them: "Lord, thou deliverdest to me" such and such things. Note, 1st. It is good to keep a particular account of our receivings from God, to remember what we have received, that we may know what is expected from us, and may render according to the benefit. 2nd. We must never look upon our improvements but with a general mention of God's favour to us, and the honour he has put upon us, in intrusting us with his goods, and that grace which is the spring and fountain of all the good that is in us, or is done by us; for the truth is, the more we do for God, the more we are indebted to him for making use of us, and enabling us for his service.

2. They produce, as an evidence of their faithfulness, what they have gained. Note, God's good stewards have something to shew for their diligence: "Shew me thy faith by thy works." He that is a good man, let him shew it, Jas. iii. 13. If we be careful in our spiritual trade, it will soon be seen by us, and our works will follow us, Rev. xiv. 13: not that the saints will in the great day make mention of their own good deeds; no, Christ will do that for them, ver. 35; but it intimates, that they who faithfully improve their talents, shall have "boldness in the day of Christ," 1 Jno. ii. 28; iv. 17. And it is observable, that he that had but two talents, gave up his account as cheerfully as he that had five: for our comfort in the day of account will be according to our faithfulness, not according to our usefulness; our sincerity, not our success; according to the uprightness of our hearts, not according to the degree of our opportunities.

Secondly, The master's acceptance and approbation of their account, ver. 21, 23. 1. He commended them: "Well done, good and faithful servant." Note, The diligence and integrity of those who approve themselves the good and faithful secure them. The injustice of the charge is self-evident, because the man was a servant, and the master had given him a commission to execute, and he had failed in his duty.

xxv. 26. The language here is not really an admission that the servant was right, although it may assume such to have been the case. Some have treated it as a question, but it seems better to view it as a supposition, and merely hypothetical.

xxv. 27. What are called "exchangers" are in the Greek called by a name derived from a word signifying a table. They are said by Jewish authorities to have sold money, and to have owed their name to the fact that they had before them a table upon which they bought and sold. It is evident, however, that the "exchanger" of the text more nearly answered to the Latin argentarius or mensarius. The argentarius was a private banker, who received deposits and allowed interest upon them. He acted as a money-changer for foreigners, and attended public sales as a broker or commissioner, to bid for his servants of Jesus Christ, will certainly "be found to praise and honour and glory at his appearing," 1 Pet. i. 7. Those that own and honour God now, he will own and honour them shortly. 1st. Their persons will be accepted: "Thou good and faithful servant." He that knows the integrity of his servants now, will witness to it in the great day; and they that are found faithful shall be called so. Perhaps they were censured by men, as righteous overmuch; but Christ will give them their just characters, of "good and faithful." 2nd. Their performances will be accepted: "Well done." Christ will call those, and those only, good servants, that have done well; for it is by patient continuance in well doing, that we seek for this glory and honour; and if we seek, we shall find; if we do that which is good, and do it well, we shall have praise of the same. Some masters are so morose, that they will not commend their servants, though they do their work never so well; it is thought enough not to chide; but Christ will commend his servants that do well; whether their praise be of men or no, it is of him; and if we have the good word of our Master, the matter is not great what our fellow-servants say of us; if he saith, well done, we are happy, and it should then be a small thing to us to be judged of men's judgment; as on the contrary, not he that commendeth himself, or whom his neighbours commend, is approved, but whom the Lord commends.

2. He rewardeth them. The faithful servants of Christ shall not be put off with bare commendation; no, all their work and labour of love shall be rewarded. Now this reward is here expressed two ways:

1st. In one expression agreeable to the parable: "Thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things." It is usual in the courts of princes, and families of great men, to advance those to higher offices that have been faithful in lower. Note, Christ is a master that will prefer his servants who acquit themselves well. Christ has honour in store for those that honour him: a crown, 2 Tim. iv. 8; a throne, Rev. iii. 21; a kingdom, ch. xxv. 34. Here they are beggars, in heaven they shall be rulers; the upright shall have dominion; Christ's servants are all princes. Observe the disproportion between the work and the reward; they are but few things in which the saints are serviceable to the glory of God, but many things wherein they shall be glorified with God. What charge we receive from God, what work we do for God in this world, is but little, very little, compared with the joy set before us; put together all our services, all our sufferings, all our improvements, all the good we do to others, all we get to ourselves, and they are but a few things, next nothing, not worthy to be compared, not fit to be named the same day with the glory to be revealed.

2nd. In another expression, which slips out of the parable into the thing signified by it: "Enter thou into the joy of thy lord." Note, 1. The state of the blessed is a state of joy, not only because all tears shall then be wiped away, but all the springs of comfort shall be opened to them, and the fountains of joy broken up; where there is the vision and fruition of God, a perfection of holiness, and the society of the blessed, there cannot but be a fulness of joy. 2. This joy is the joy of our Lord; the joy which he himself has purchased and provided for them; the joy of the redeemed, bought with the sorrow of the Redeemer; it is the joy which he himself is in the possession of, and which he had his eye upon when he endured the cross, and despised the shame, Heb. xii. 2; it is the joy which he himself is the fountain and centre of; it is the joy of our Lord, for it is joy in the Lord, who is our exceeding joy. Abraham was not willing that the steward of his house, though faithful, should be his heir, Gen. xv. 23; but Christ admits his faithful stewards into his own joy, to be joint heirs with him. 3. Glorified saints shall enter into this joy, that is, shall have a full and complete possession of it; as the heir, when he comes to age, enters upon his estate; as they that were ready went in to the marriage feast. Here the joy of our Lord enters into the saints, in the earnest of the Spirit; shortly they shall enter into it, shall be in it to eternity, as in their element.

Secondly. The bad account of the slothful servant. Observe, 1. His apology for himself, ver. 24, 25. Though he had received but one talent, for that one he is called to account. The smallness of our receiving will not excuse us from a reckoning. None shall be called to an account for more than they have received; but for what we have, we must all account.

Observe, 1st. What he confides in; he comes to the account with a deal of assurance, relying on the plea he had to put in, that he was able to say, "Lo, there thou hast that is thine;" "if I have not made it more, as the others have done, yet this I can say, I have not made it less;" and this he thinks may serve to bring him off, if not with praise, yet with safety. Note, Many a one goes very securely to judgment, presuming upon the validity of a plea that will be overruled as vain and frivolous. Slothful professors, that are afraid of doing too much for God, yet hope to come off as well as those that take so much pains in religion. Thus "the sluggard is wiser in his own conceit than seven men that can render a reason," Pr. xxvi. 16. This servant thought his account would pass well enough, because he could say, "There thou hast that is thine." "Lord, I was no spendthrift of my estate, no prodigal of my time, no profane of my sabbaths, no opposer of good ministers and good preaching; Lord, I never ridiculed my Bible, nor set my wits on work to banter religion, nor abused my power to persecute any good man; I never drowned my parts, nor wasted God's good creatures in drunkenness and gluttony, nor ever, to my knowledge, did injury to any body." Many that are called Christians build their hopes for heaven upon their being able to make such an account; and yet all this amounts to no more but "There thou hast that is thine;" as if no more were required, or could be expected.

2nd. What he confesseth. He owns the burying of his talent: "I hid thy talent in the earth." He speaks as if that were no great fault; nay, as if he deserved praise for his prudence, in putting it in a safe place, and running no hazards with it. Note, It is common for people to make a very light matter of that which will be their condemnation in the great day. Or, if he was conscious to himself that it was his fault, it intimates how easily slothful servants will be convicted in the judgment; there will need no great search for proof, for their own tongues shall fall upon them.

3rd. What he makes his excuse: "I knew that thou wast an hard man, and I was afraid." Good thoughts of God would beget love, and that love would make us diligent and faithful; but hard thoughts of God beget fear, and that fear makes us slothful and unfaithful. His excuse speaks,

First. The sentiments of an enemy: "I knew thee that thou art an hard man." This was like that wicked saying of the house of Israel, "The way of the Lord is not equal," Eze. xlviii. 25. Thus his defence is his offence; "the foolishness of man perverteth his way," and then, as if that would mend the matter, "his heart fretteth against the Lord." This is covering the transgression, as Adam, who implicitly laid the fault on God himself, "the woman which thou gavest me." Note, Carnal hearts are apt to conceive false and wicked opinions concerning God, and with them to harden themselves in their evil ways. Observe how confidently he speaks, "I knew thee to be so." How could he know him to be so? "What iniquity have we or our fathers found in him?" Jer. ii. 5. Wherein has he wearied us with his work, or deceived us in his wages? Mic. vi. 3. Hath he "been a wilderness to us, or a land of darkness?" Thus long God has governed the world, and may ask, with more reason than Samuel himself could, "Whom have I defrauded? or whom have I oppressed?" Doth not all the world know the contrary, that he is so far from being a hard master, that the earth is full of his goodness? So far from reaping where he sowed not, that he sows a great deal where he reaps nothing; for he causeth the sun to shine, and his rain to fall upon the evil and unthankful; and fills their hearts with food and gladness, who say to the Almighty, "Depart from us." This suggestion speaks the common reproach wicked people cast upon God; as if all the blame of their sin and ruin lay at his door, for denying them his grace; whereas it is certain, never any that faithfully improved the common grace they had, perished for want of special grace; nor can any shew what could in reason have been done more for an unfruitful vineyard than God has done in it. God doth not demand brick, and deny straw; no, whatever is required in the covenant, is promised in the covenant; so that if we perish, it is alone of ourselves.

Secondly. The spirit of a slave: "I was afraid." This ill affection towards God arose from his false notions of him; and nothing is more unworthy of God, nor more hinders our duty to him, than slavish fear: this has bondage and torment, and is directly opposite to that entire love which the great commandment requires. Note, Hard thoughts of God drive us from, and cramp us in his service. Those who think it impossible to please him, and in vain to serve him, will do nothing to purpose in religion.

2. His lord's answer to this apology. His plea will stand him in no stead; it is overruled, nay, it is made to turn against him, and he is struck speechless with it, for here is his conviction, and his condemnation.

1st. His conviction, ver. 26, 27. Two things he is convicted of:

First. Slothfulness: "Thou wicked and slothful servant." Note, Slothful servants are wicked servants, and will be reckoned with as such by their master; for "he that is slothful in his work," and neglects the good that God has commanded, "is brother to him that is a great waster," by doing the evil that God has forbidden, Pr. xviii. 9. He that is careless in God's work is near akin to him that is busy in the devil's work. Satis est mali nihil facisse boni,—"to do no good, is to incur very serious blame." Omissions are sins, and must come into judgment; slothfulness makes way for wickedness; all become filthy, for there is none that doeth good, Ps. xiv. 3. When the house is empty, the unclean spirit takes possession. Those that are idle in the affairs of their souls, are not only idle, but something worse, 1 Tim. v. 13. When men sleep, the enemy sows tares.

Secondly. Self-contradiction, ver. 26, 27: "Thou knewest that I reap where I sowed not; thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the exchangers." Note, The hard thoughts which sinners have of God, though false and unjust, will be so far from justifying their wickedness and slothfulness, that they will rather aggravate and add to their guilt. Three ways this may be taken.

1st. Suppose I had been so hard a master, shouldst not thou therefore have been the more diligent and careful to please me? if not for love, yet for fear? and for that reason, thou oughtest to have minded thy work. If our God be a consuming fire, in consideration of that, let us study how to serve him. 2nd. Or thus: If thou didst think me to be a hard master, and therefore durst not trade with the money thyself, for fear of losing by it, and being made to stand to the loss, yet thou mightest have put it into the hands of the exchangers, or goldsmiths, might have brought it into the bank; and then at my coming, if I could not have had the greater improvement by trade and merchandise, (as of the other talents,) yet I might have had the lesser improvement of bare interest, and "should have received my own with usury," which it seems was a common practice at that time, and not disallowed by our Saviour. Note, If we could not, or durst not, do what we would, yet that excuse will not serve, when it will be made to appear that we did not do what we could and durst. If we could not find in our hearts to venture upon more difficult and hazardous services, yet will that justify us in balking those that were more safe and easy? Something is better than nothing; if we fail of shewing our courage in bold enterprises, yet we must not fail to testify our good will in honest endeavours; and our Master will not despise the day of small things. Or thus, 3rd. Suppose I did reap where I sowed not, yet that is nothing to thee, for I had sowed upon thee, and the talent was my money which thou wast intrusted with, not only to keep, but to improve. Note, In the day of account wicked and slothful servants will be quite left without excuse; frivolous pleas will be overruled, and every mouth will be stopped; and those who now stand so much upon their own justification, will not have one word to say for themselves.

2nd. His condemnation. The slothful servant is sentenced:

First. To be deprived of his talent, ver. 28, 29: "Take therefore the talent from him." The talents were first disposed of by the master, as an absolute owner, but this was now disposed of by him as a judge; he takes it from the unfaithful servant to punish him, and gives it to him that was eminently faithful to reward him; and the meaning of this part of the parable we have in the reason of the sentence, ver. 29: "To every one that hath shall be given." This may be applied,

1st. To the blessings of this life, worldly wealth and possessions. These we are intrusted with, to be used for the glory of God, and the good of those about us: now, he that hath these things, and useth them for these ends, he shall have abundance, perhaps abundance of the things themselves, however abundance of comfort in them, and of better things; but from him that hath not, that is, that hath these things, as if he had them not, had not the power to eat of them, or to do good with them, (Avaro deest, tam quod habet, quam quod non habet), the miser may be considered as destitute of what he has, as well as of what he has not; they shall be taken away. Solomon explains this, Pr. xi. 24: "There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, and it tendeth to poverty." Giving to the poor, is trading with what we have, and the returns will be rich; it will multiply the meal in the barrel, and the oil in the cruse; but those that are sordid, and niggardly, and uncharitable, will find that those riches which are so got, "perish by evil travail," Ecc. v. 13, 14. Sometimes Providence strangely transfers estates from those that do no good with them, to those that do; they are gathered for him that will pity the poor, Pr. xxviii. 8; see Pr. xiii. 22; Job xxvii. 16, 17; Ecc. ii. 26.

2nd. We may apply it to the means of grace. They who are diligent in improving the opportunities they have, God will enlarge them, will set before them an open door, Rev. iii. 8; but they who know not the day of their visitation, shall have the things that belong to their peace hid from their eyes. For proof of this, go see what God did to Shiloh, Jer. vii. 12.

3rd. We may apply it to the common gifts of the Spirit. He that hath these and doth good with them, shall have abundance; these gifts improve by exercise and brighten by being used: the more we do, the more we may do in religion; but those who stir not up the gift that is in them, who do not exert themselves according to their capacity, their gifts rust and decay, and go out like a neglected fire. From him that has not a living principle of grace in his soul, shall be taken away the common gifts which he hath; as the lamps of the foolish virgins went out for want of oil, ver. 8; thus the arm of the idol-shepherd, which he had sluggishly folded up in his bosom, comes to be dried up; and his right eye, which he had carelessly or wilfully shut, becomes utterly darkened, as it is threatened, Zec. xi. 17.

employers. The mensarius was a public officer appointed by the State upon certain occasions, and in times of general distress, to act as a public banker. Both classes had their tables or counters displayed in public in the colonnades of the Forum. The exchanger alluded to in the text was probably one who combined in himself the threefold character of a money-changer, a receiver of deposits on interest, and a money-lender. On the subject of usury the remarks made in "Cassell's Bible Dictionary" deserve to be quoted:—"This was forbidden to the Jews (Lev. xxv. 36, 37); but the prohibition only extended to their dealings with each other (D-ut. xxiii. 19, 20). The violation of the law was viewed with abhorrence by holy Israelites (Psa. xv. 5; Prov. xxviii. 8; Jer. xv. 10). It seems, however, that after the captivity the Mosaic rule was very much neglected. Interchange with foreign nations, and the decline of zeal for the law, and other circumstances, led to the more extensive adoption of usury by the Jews, and hence, in modern times, they are Secondly. He is sentenced to be cast into utter darkness, ver. 30. Here, 1st. His character is that of an unprofitable servant. Note. Slothful servants will be reckoned with as unprofitable servants, who do nothing to the purpose of their coming into the world, nothing to answer the end of their birth or baptism, who are no way serviceable to the glory of God, the good of others, or the salvation of their own souls. A slothful servant is a withered member in the body, a barren tree in the vineyard, an idle drone in the hive; is good for nothing. In one sense we are all unprofitable servants, Lu. xvii. 10; we cannot profit God, Job xxii. 2; but to others, and to ourselves, it is required that we be profitable; if we be not, Christ will not own us as his servants; it is not enough not to do hurt, but we must do good, must bring forth fruit; and though thereby God is not profited, yet he is glorified, Jno. xv. 8.

2nd. His doom is to be cast into utter darkness. Here, as in what was said to the faithful servants, our Saviour slides insensibly out of the parable into the thing intended by it, and it serves as a key to the whole; for "utter darkness, where there is weeping and gnashing of teeth," is in Christ's discourses the common periphrasis of the miseries of the damned in hell. Their state is, 1. Very dismal: it is outer darkness. Darkness is uncomfortable and frightful; it was one of the plagues of Egypt: in hell there are chains of darkness, 2 Pet. ii. 4; in the dark, no man can work; a fit punishment for a slothful servant. It is utter darkness, out from the light of heaven, out from the joy of their Lord, into which the faithful servants were admitted, out from the feast: compare, ch. viii. 12; xxii. 13. 2. Very doleful: there is weeping, which speaks great sorrow, and gnashing of teeth, which speaks great vexation and indignation. This will be the portion of the slothful servant.

31 When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory: 32 And before him shall be gathered all nations: and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats: 33 And he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left. 34 Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world: 35 For I was an hungred, and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink: I was a stranger, and ye took me in: 36 Naked, and ye clothed me: I was sick, and ye visited me: I was in prison, and ye came unto me. 37 Then shall the righteous answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee an hungred, and fed thee? or thirsty, and gave thee drink? 38 When saw we thee a stranger, and took thee in? or naked, and clothed thee? 39 Or when saw we thee sick, or in prison, and came unto thee? 40 And the King shall answer and say unto them, Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me. 41 Then shall he say also unto them on the left hand, Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels: 42 For I was an hungred, and ye gave me no meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me no drink: 43 I was a stranger, and ye took me not in: naked, and ye clothed me not: sick, and in prison, and ye visited me not. 44 Then shall they also answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee an hungred, or athirst, or a stranger, or naked, or sick, or in prison, and did not minister unto thee? 45 Then shall he answer them, saying, Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me. 46 And these shall go away into everlasting punishment: but the righteous into life eternal.

We have here a description of the process of the last judgment in the great day: some passages there are in it that are parabolical, as the separating between the sheep and the goats, and the dialogues between the judge and the persons judged; but there is no thread of similitude carried through the discourse; and therefore it is rather to be called a draught or delineation of the final judgment, than a parable; it is as it were the reddition of the former parables. And here we have,

I. The placing of the judge upon the judgment seat, ver. 30: "When the Son of man shall come." Observe here,

First. That there is a judgment to come, in which every man shall be determined to a state of everlasting happiness or misery in the world of recompence and retribution, according to what he did in this world of trial and probation, which is to be judged of by the rule of the everlasting Gospel.

Secondly. The administration of the judgment of the great day is committed to "the Son of man," for by him God will judge the world, Acts xvii. 31; and to him all judgment is committed; and therefore the judgment of that day, which is the centre of all. Here, as elsewhere, when the last judgment is spoken of, Christ is called the Son of man, because he is to judge the sons of men; and being himself of the same nature, he is the more unexceptionable; and because his wonderful condescension to take upon him our nature, and to become the Son of man, will be recompensed by his exaltation in that day, and an honour put upon the human nature.

Thirdly. Christ's appearing to judge the world, will be splendid and glorious. Agrippa and Bernice come to the judgment seat with great pomp, Acts xlv. 23; but that was (as the original word is) great fancy; Christ will come to the judgment seat in real glory: the Sun of righteousness shall then shine in his meridian lustre; and the Prince of the kings of the earth shall shew the riches of his glorious kingdom, and the honours of his excellent majesty; and all the world shall see what the saints only do now believe, that he is the brightness of his Father's glory; he shall come, not only in the glory of his Father, but in his own glory, as Mediator: his first coming was under a black cloud of obscurity; his second will be in a bright cloud of glory. The assurance Christ gave his disciples of his future glory, might help to take off the offence of the cross, and his approaching disgrace and suffering.

Fourthly. When Christ comes in his glory to judge the world, he will bring all his holy angels with him. This glorious person will have a glorious retinue, his holy myriads, who will be not only his attendants, but ministers of his justice; they shall come with him both for state and service: they must come to call the court, 1 Thes. iv. 16; to gather the elect, ch. xxiv. 31; to bundle the tares, ch. xiii. 40; to be witnesses of the saints' glory, Lu. xii. 8; and of sinners' misery, Rev. xix. 20.

Fifthly. He will then "sit upon the throne of his glory." He is now set down with the Father upon his throne, and it is a throne of grace, to which we may come boldly; it is a throne of government, the throne of his father David; he is a priest upon that throne; but then he will sit upon the throne of glory, the throne of judgment: see Dan. vii. 9, 10. Solomon's throne, though there was not its like in any kingdom, was but a dunghill to it. Christ, in the days of his flesh, was arraigned as a prisoner at the bar; but at his second coming, he will sit as a judge upon the bench.

II. The appearing of all the children of men before him, ver. 32: "Before him shall be gathered all nations." Note. The judgment of the great day will be a general judgment: all must be summoned before Christ's tribunal; all of every age of the world, from the beginning to the end of time; all of every place on earth, even from the remotest corners of the world, most obscure and distant from each other; all nations, all those nations of men that are made of one blood, to dwell on all the face of the earth.

III. The distinction that will then be made between the precious and the vile: "He shall separate them one from another," as the tares and wheat are separated at the harvest; the good fish and bad at the shore; the corn and chaff in the floor. Wicked and godly here dwell together in the same kingdoms, cities, churches, and families, and are not certainly distinguishable one from another; such are the infirmities of saints, such the hypocrisies of sinners, and one event to both; but in that day they will be separated, and parted for ever: "Then shall ye return and discern between the righteous and the wicked," Mal. iii. 18. They cannot separate themselves one from another in this world, 1 Cor. v. 10; nor can any one else separate them, ch. xiii. 29. But the Lord knows them that are his, and he can separate them. This separation will be so exact, that the most inconsiderable saints shall not be lost in the crowd of sinners, nor the most plausible sinner hid in the crowd of saints, Psa. i. 5; but every one shall go to his own place.

This is compared to a shepherd's dividing between the sheep and the goats; it is taken from Eze. xxxiv. 17: "Behold I judge between cattle and cattle." Note, 1. Jesus Christ is the great shepherd; he now feeds his flock like a shepherd, and will shortly distinguish between those that are his, and those that are not; as Laban divided his sheep from Jacob's, and set three days' journey between them, Gen. xxx. 35, 36. 2. The godly are like sheep, innocent, mild, patient, useful: the wicked are like goats, a baser kind of animal, unsavoury and unruly. These sheep and goats are here feeding all day in the same pasture, but will be coted at night in different folds.

Being thus divided, he will "set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on his left," ver. 33. Christ puts honour upon the godly, as we shew respect to those we set on our right hand; but the wicked shall rise to everlasting shame, Dan. xii. 2. It is not said, he shall put the rich on his right hand, and the poor on his left; the learned and noble on his right hand, and the unlearned and despised on his left; but the godly on his right hand, and the wicked on his left; all other divisions and subdivisions will then be abolished, but the greater distinction of men into saints and sinners, sanctified and unsanctified, will remain for ever; and men's eternal state will be determined by it. The wicked took up with left hand blessings, riches and honour; and so shall their doom be.

the greatest usurers in the world." Though the text is regarded as an admission of the principle of usury by our Lord, it is of doubtful authority as an argument either way, because our Lord was wont to introduce into parables allusions to characters and customs of which he could not approve, and which were brought in with a view to unity, and the lessons it was his design to teach. The object here is to enforce the duty of turning all our faculties to profit, because we are merely trustees and servants, and because we shall some day have to render an account of our stewardship. There is no such distinction in reality as that which Dr. A. Clarke supposes, when he says, "With its produce—not usury; for that is unlawful interest, more than the money can properly produce." At the same time, "interest" is a better word here than "usury."

xxv. 31. On the word "holy" it must be noted that it is omitted by some of the best authorities, ancient and modern. Thus, A. Clarke says it is "omitted by many excellent manuscripts, versions,

IV. The process of the judgment concerning each of these.

First. Concerning the godly on the right hand. Their cause must be first despatched, that they may be assessors with Christ in the judgment of the wicked, whose misery will be aggravated by their seeing Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob admitted into the kingdom of heaven, Lu. xiii. 28. Observe here,

1. The glory conferred upon them: the sentence by which they shall be not only acquitted, but preferred and rewarded, ver. 34: "The King shall say unto them," He that was the shepherd, which speaks the care and tenderness wherewith he will make this disposition, is here the king, which speaks the authority wherewith he will then pronounce the sentence: where the word of this king is, there is power. Here are two things in this sentence:

1st. The acknowledging of the saints to be the blessed of the Lord: "Come ye blessed of my Father." First. He pronounceth them blessed, and his saying they are blessed makes them so; the law curseth them for their many discontinuances, but Christ having redeemed them from the curse of the law, and purchased a blessing for them, commands a blessing on them. Secondly. Blessed of his Father, reproached and cursed by the world, but blessed of God: "as the Spirit glorifies the Son," Jno. xvi. 14, so the Son glorifies the Father, by referring the salvation of the saints to him as the first cause; all our blessings in heavenly things flow to us from God, as "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," Eph. i. 3. Thirdly. He calls them to come: this come is in effect—Welcome, ten thousand welcomes to the blessed of my Father: come to me, come to be for ever with me; you that followed me, bearing my cross, now come along with me, wearing the crown. The blessed of my Father are the beloved of my soul, that have been too long at a distance from me; come now, come into my bosom, come into my arms, come into my dearest embraces. O with what joy will this fill the hearts of the saints in that day! We now come boldly to the throne of grace, but we shall then come boldly to the throne of glory; and this word holds out the golden sceptre, with an assurance that our request shall be granted to more than the half of the kingdom. Now the Spirit saith, come, in the Word; and the bride saith, come, in prayer; and the result hereof is a sweet communion, but the perfection of bliss will be when the King shall say, "come."

2nd. The admission of the saints into the blessedness and kingdom of the Father: "Inherit the kingdom prepared for you."

First. The happiness they shall be possessed of is very rich; we are told what it is by him who had reason to know it, having purchased it for them, and possessed it himself. 1st. It is a kingdom, which is reckoned the most valuable possession of earth, and includes the greatest wealth and honour. Those that inherit kingdoms, wear all the glories of the crown, enjoy all the pleasures of the court, and command the peculiar treasures of the provinces; yet this is but a faint resemblance of the felicity of the saints in heaven. They that here are beggars, prisoners, accounted as the offscouring of all things, shall then inherit a kingdom, Ps. cxlii. 7; Rev. ii. 26, 27. 2nd. It is a kingdom prepared; the happiness must needs be great, for it is the product of the Divine counsels. Note, There is great preparation made for the entertainment of the saints in the kingdom of glory. The Father designed it for them in his thoughts of love, and provided it for them in the greatness of his wisdom and power. The Son purchased it for them, and is entered as the forerunner to prepare a place, Jno. xiv. 2; and the blessed Spirit, in preparing them for the kingdom, in effect is preparing it for them. 3rd. It is prepared for them. This speaks, 1. The suitability of this happiness: it is in all points adapted to the nature of a soul, and to the new nature of a sanctified soul. 2. Their property and interest in it: it is prepared on purpose for them, not only for such as you, but for you, you by name, you personally and particularly, who were chosen to salvation through sanctification. 4th. It is prepared "from the foundation of the world." This happiness was designed for the saints, and they for it, before time began, from all eternity, Eph. i. 4. The end which is last in execution, is first in intention; infinite wisdom had an eye to the eternal glorification of the saints from the first founding of the creation: "All things are for your sakes," 2 Cor. iv. 15; or it notes the preparation of the place of this happiness, which is to be the seat and habitation of the blessed, in the very beginning of the work of creation, Gen. i. 1. There, in the heaven of heavens, the morning stars were singing together when the foundations of the earth were fastened, Job xxxviii. 4, 6, 7.

Secondly. The tenure by which they shall hold and possess it, it is very good, they shall come and inherit it: what we come to by inheritance, is not got by any procurement of our own, but purely, as the lawyers express it, by the act of God. It is God that makes heirs, heirs of heaven. We come to an inheritance by virtue of our sonship, our adoption; "if children, then heirs;" a title by inheritance is the sweetest and surest title; it alludes to possessions in the land of Canaan, which passed by inheritance, and could not be alienated longer than till the year of jubilee. Thus is the heavenly inheritance indefeasible, and unalienable. Saints in this world, are as heirs under age, tutored and governed till the time appointed of the father, Gal. iv. 1; and then they shall be put in full possession of that which now through grace they have a title to: Come, and inherit it.

2. The ground of this, ver. 35, 36: "For I was an hungred, and ye gave me meat." We cannot hence infer that any good works of ours merit the happiness of heaven, by any intrinsic worth or excellency in them; our goodness extendeth not unto God; but it is plain that Jesus Christ will judge the world by the same rule by which he governs it; and therefore will reward those that have been obedient to that law, and mention will be made of their obedience, not as their title, but as their evidence of an interest in Christ, and his purchase. This happiness will be adjudged to obedient believers, not upon a quantum meriti,—an estimate of merit, which supposeth a proportion between the work and the reward, but upon the promise of God purchased by Jesus Christ, and the benefit of it secured under certain provisos and limitations, and it is the purchase and promise that give the title; the obedience is only the qualification of the person designed. An estate made by deed or will upon condition, when the condition is performed according to the true intent of the donor or testator, becomes absolute; and then, though the title be built purely upon the deed or will, yet the performing of the condition must be given in evidence; and so it comes in here, for Christ is "the author of eternal salvation to those only that obey him," and who patiently continue in well doing.

Now the good works here mentioned, are such as we commonly call works of charity to the poor; not but that many will be found on the right hand, who never were in a capacity to feed the hungry, or clothe the naked, but were themselves fed and clothed by the charity of others; but one instance of sincere obedience is put for all the rest, and it teacheth us this in general, that faith working by love is all in all in Christianity: "Shew me thy faith by thy works;" and nothing will abound to a good account hereafter, but the fruits of righteousness in a good conversation now. The good works here described do imply three things, which must be found in all that are saved:

1st. Self-denial and contempt of the world, reckoning the things of the world no further good things than as we are enabled to do good with them; and those who have not wherewithal to go good, must shew the same disposition, by being contentedly and cheerfully poor. These are fit for heaven that are mortified to the earth. 2nd. Love to our brethren, which is the second great commandment: the fulfilling of the law, and an excellent preparative for the world of everlasting love. We must give proof of this love by our readiness to do good, and to communicate; good wishes are but mockeries without good works, Jas. i. 15, 16; 1 Jno. iii. 17. Those that have not to give, must shew the same disposition some other way. 3rd. A believing regard to Jesus Christ. That which is here rewarded, is their relieving the poor for Christ's sake, out of love to him, and with an eye to him. This puts an excellency upon the good work, when in it we serve the Lord Christ, which those may do that work for their own living, as well as those that help to keep others alive: see Eph. vi. 5-7. Those good works shall then be accepted which are done "in the name of the Lord Jesus," Col. iii. 17.

"I was hungry," that is, my disciples and followers were so, either by the persecutions of enemies for well-doing, or by the common dispensations of Providence; for in these things there is one event to the righteous and wicked: "And you gave them meat." Note, 1. Providence doth so variously order and dispose of the circumstances of his people in this world, so that while some are in a condition to give relief, others need it. It is no new thing for those that are feasted with the dainties of heaven, to be hungry and thirsty, and to want daily food; for those that are at home in God, to be strangers in a strange land; for those that have put on Christ, to want clothes to keep them warm; for those that have healthful souls, to have sickly bodies; and for those to be in prison that Christ has made free. 2. Works of charity and beneficence, according as our ability is, are necessary to salvation; and there will be more stress laid upon them in the judgment of the great day, than is commonly imagined. These must be the proofs of our love, and of our professed subjection to the Gospel of Christ, 2 Cor. ix. 13; but they that shew no mercy, shall have judgment without mercy. Now this reason is modestly excepted against by the righteous, but is explained by the Judge himself.

First. It is questioned by the righteous, ver. 37-39; not as if they were loath to inherit the kingdom, or were ashamed of their good deeds, or had not the testimony of their own consciences concerning them. But, 1st. The expressions are parabolical, designed to introduce and impress these great truths: that Christ has a mighty regard to works of charity; and is especially pleased with kindnesses done to his people for his sake. Or, 2nd. They speak the humble admiration which glorified saints will be filled with, to find such poor and worthless services as theirs are so highly celebrated and richly rewarded. "Lord, when saw we thee an hungred, and fed thee?" Note, Gracious souls are apt to think meanly of their own good deeds; especially as "unworthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed." Far from this is the temper of those who said, "Wherefore have we fasted, and thou seest not?" Isa. lviii. 3. Saints in heaven will wonder what brought them thither, and that God should so regard them and their services. It even put Nathanael to the blush, to hear Christ's encomium of him, "Whence knowest thou me?" Jno. i. 47, 48; see Eph. iii. 20. "When saw we thee an hungred?" we have seen the poor in distress many a time; but "when saw we thee?" Note, Christ is more among us than we think he is: "Surely the Lord is in this place," by his word, his ordinances, his ministers, his Spirit, yea, and his poor, and we know it not; "When thou wast under the fig tree, I saw thee," Jno. i. 48.

Secondly. It is explained by the Judge himself, ver. 40: "Inasmuch as you have done it to these my brethren," to the least, "to one of the least" of them, "ye have done it unto me." The good works of the saints, when they are produced in the great day, 1st. Shall all be remembered, and not the least, not one of the least, overlooked; no, not a cup of cold water. 2nd. They shall be interpreted most to their advantage, and the best construction that can be put upon them. As Christ makes the best of their infirmities, so he makes the most of their services.

We see what recompences Christ has for those that feed the hungry, and clothe the naked; but what will become of the godly poor, that had not wherewithal to do so? Must they be shut out? No: 1. Christ will own them, even the least of them, as his brethren; he will not be ashamed, nor think it any disparagement to him to call them brethren, Heb. ii. 11. In the height of his glory he will not disown his poor relations: Lazarus is there laid in his bosom, as a friend, as a brother. Thus he will confess them, Mat. x. 32. 2. He will take the kindnesses done to them, as done to himself, "ye have done it to me;" which shews a respect to the poor that were relieved, as well as to the rich that did relieve them. Note, Christ espouseth his people's cause, and interests himself in their interests; and reckons himself received, and loved, and owned in them. If Christ himself were among us in poverty, how readily would we relieve him! In prison, how frequently would we visit him! We are ready to envy the honour they had, who ministered to him of their substance, Lu. viii. 3. Wherever poor saints, and poor ministers are, there Christ is, ready to receive our kindnesses in them, and they shall be put to his account.

Secondly. Here is the process concerning the wicked; those on the left hand. And in that we have,

1. The sentence passed upon them, ver. 41. It was a disgrace to be set on the left hand; but that is not the worst of it; he shall say to them, "Depart from me, ye cursed." Every word has terror in it, like that of the trumpet at mount Sinai, waxing "louder and louder;" every accent more and more doleful, and exclusive of comfort.

1st. To be so near to Christ was some satisfaction, though under his frowns, but that will not be allowed; "Depart from me." In this world they were often called to come to Christ—to come for life and rest; but they turned a deaf ear to his calls: justly, therefore, are they bid to depart from Christ, that would not come to him. Depart from me, the fountain of all good; from me the Saviour; and therefore from all hope of salvation; I will never have any thing more to say to you, or do with you. Here they said to the Almighty, "Depart from us," then he "will choose their delusions," and say to them, "Depart from me." Note, It is the hell of hell to depart from Christ.

2nd. If they must depart, and depart from Christ, might not they be dismissed with a blessing? with one kind and compassionate word at least? No, "Depart, ye cursed." They that would not come to Christ to inherit a blessing, must depart from him under the burthen of a curse; that curse of the law on every one that breaks it, Gal. iii. 10: "As they loved cursing, so shall it come unto them." But observe, the righteous are called, "the blessed of my Father;" for their blessedness is owing purely to the grace of God, and his blessing; but the wicked are called only "ye cursed;" for their damnation is of themselves. Hath God sold them? No, they have sold themselves; have laid themselves under the curse, Isa. i. 1.

3rd. If they must depart, and depart with a curse, may they not go into some place of ease and rest? will it not be misery enough for them to bewail their loss? No; there is a punishment of sense, as well as loss; they must depart into fire, that is, into a torment as grievous as that of fire is to the body; and much more. This fire is the wrath of the eternal God, fastening upon the guilty souls and consciences of sinners that have made themselves fuel for it. Our God is a consuming fire, and sinners fall immediately into his hands, Heb. x. 31; Rom. ii. 8, 9.

4th. If into fire, may it not be some light or gentle fire? No; it is prepared and fathers. Mill and Bengel approve of the omission, and Griesbach has left it out of the text." Lachmann, Tischendorf, Tregelles, and Alford omit it. It is absent from the Vulgate version, the Sinaitic, Vatican, and Cambridge MSS., &c. Its antiquity is, however, shown by its presence in the Syriac Peshito and in the Alexandrian MS.

xxv. 32, 33. It is not intended, by this separation of the sheep and goats, that the two kinds of animals are not pastured together.

On the contrary, Dr. Tristram says of the districts of Palestine, where goats are very common, "The sheep and goats are here always seen under the same shepherd and in company, yet they never trespass on the domain of each other. The sheep, as they traverse the hill-side, graze closely the tender herbage and the grass which carpets the soil; the goats, generally filing in long lines a little above them, skip from rock to rock, and browse the tender twigs and the foliage of the thymes and dwarf shrubs." Although both fire: it is a torment ordained of old, Isa. xxx. 33. The damnation of sinners is often spoken of as an act of the Divine power: He is able to cast into hell. In the vessels of wrath he makes his power known: it is a "destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power." In it it shall be seen what a provoked God can do to make a provoking creature miserable.

5th. If into fire, prepared fire, O let it be but of short continuance; let them but pass through fire. No: the fire of God's wrath will be an everlasting fire; a fire that, fastening and preying upon immortal souls, can never go out for want of fuel; and being kindled and kept burning by the wrath of an immortal God, can never go out for want of being blown and stirred up; and the streams of mercy and grace being for ever excluded, there is nothing to extinguish it. If a drop of water be denied to cool the tongue, buckets of water will never be granted to quench this flame.

6th. If they must be doomed to such a state of endless misery, yet may they not have some good company there? No, none but "the devil and his angels;" their sworn enemies, that helped to bring them to this misery, and will triumph over them in it. They served the devil while they lived, and therefore are justly sentenced to be where he is; as those that served Christ are taken to be with him where he is. It is terrible to lie in a house haunted with devils, what will it be, then, to be companions with them for ever? Observe here, First. Christ intimates that there is one that is the prince of the devils; the ring-leader of the rebellion, and the rest are as his angels, his messengers, by whose agency he supports his kingdom. Christ and his angels will in that day triumph over the dragon and his kind, Rev. xii. 7. Secondly. The fire is said to be prepared, not primarily for the wicked, as the kingdom is prepared for the righteous; but it was originally intended for the devil and his angels. If sinners make themselves associates with Satan, by indulging their lusts, they may thank themselves if they become sharers in that misery which was prepared for him and his associates. Calvin notes upon this, that therefore the torment of the damned is said to be prepared for the devil and his angels, to cut off all hope of escaping it; the devil and his angels are already made prisoners in that pit, and can worms of the earth think to escape?

2. The reason of this sentence assigned. God's judgments are all just; and he will be justified in them. He is judge himself, and therefore the heavens shall declare his righteousness. Now,

1st. All that is charged upon them, on which the sentence is grounded, is omission; as before the servant was condemned, not for wasting his talent, but for burying it; so here, he doth not say, "I was hungry and thirsty, for you took my meat and drink from me; I was a stranger, for you banished me; naked, for you stripped me; in prison, for you laid me there;" but, "When I was in these distresses, you were so selfish, so taken up with your own ease and pleasure, made so much of your labour, and were so loath to part with your money, that you did not minister, as you might have done, to my relief and succour. You were like those epicures that were at ease in Zion; and were not grieved for the affliction of Joseph," Amos vi. 4-6. Note, Omissions are the ruin of thousands.

2nd. It is the omission of works of charity to the poor. They are not sentenced for omitting their sacrifices, and burnt-offerings; they abounded in these, Ps. l. 8; but for omitting the weightier matters of the law: judgment, mercy, and faith. The Ammonites and Moabites were excluded the sanctuary, because they met not Israel with bread and water, Deut. xxiii. 3, 4. Note, Uncharitableness to the poor is a damning sin. If we will not be brought to works of charity by the hope of reward, let us be influenced by fear of punishment; for they "shall have judgment without mercy, that have shewed no mercy." Observe, He doth not say, "I was sick, and ye did not cure me; in prison, and you did not release me;" perhaps that was more than they could do; but, "You visited me not; which you might have done." Note, Sinners will be condemned at the great day for the omission of that good which it was in the power of their hand to do. But if the doom of the uncharitable be so dreadful, how much more intolerable will the doom of the cruel be—the doom of persecutors? Now this reason of the sentence is,

First. Objected against by the prisoners, ver. 44: "Lord, when saw we thee an hungry, or athirst?" Condemned sinners, though they have no plea that will bear them out, yet will in vain offer at excuses. Now, 1st. The manner of their pleading speaks their present precipitation; they cut it short, as men in haste: "when saw we thee hungry, or thirsty, or naked?" They care not to repeat the charge, as conscious to themselves of their own guilt, and unable to bear the terrors of the judgment. Nor will they have time allowed them to insist upon such frivolous pleas; for it is all (as we used to say) but trifling with the court. 2nd. The matter of their plea speaks their former inconsideration of that which they might have known, but would not till now, that it was too late. They that had slighted and persecuted poor Christians, would not own that they had slighted and persecuted Christ: no, they never intended any affront to him, nor expected that so great a matter would have been made of it. They imagined it was only a company of poor, weak, silly, and contemptible people, who made more ado than needed about religion, that they put those slights upon; but they who do so, will be made to know, either in the day of their conversion, as Paul, or of their condemnation, as these here, that it was Jesus whom they persecuted. And, if they say, "Behold, we knew it not; doth not he that pondereth the heart consider it?" Pr. xxiv. 11, 12.

Secondly. Justified by the Judge; who will convince all the ungodly of the hard speeches spoken against him in those that are his, Jude 15. He goes by this rule, ver. 45: "Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me." Note, What is done against the faithful disciples and followers of Christ, even the least of them, he takes as done against himself: he is reproached and persecuted in them, for they are reproached and persecuted for his sake; and in all their afflictions he is afflicted. He that touches them, touches him in a part no less tender than the apple of his eye.

Thirdly. Here is the execution of both these sentences, ver. 46. Execution is the life of the law, and Christ will take care that that be done according to the sentence.

1. The wicked "shall go away into everlasting punishment." Sentence will then be executed speedily, and no reprieve granted; nor any time allowed to move in arrest of judgment. The execution of the wicked is first mentioned; for first the tares are gathered and burned. Note, 1st. The punishment of the wicked, in the future state, will be an everlasting punishment, for the state is an unalterable state. It can neither be thought that sinners should change their own natures, nor that God should give his grace to change them, when in this world the day of grace was mis-spent, the Spirit of grace resisted, and the means of grace abused and baffled. 2nd. The wicked shall be made to go away into that punishment; not that they will go voluntarily; no, they are driven from light into darkness; but it speaks an irresistible conviction of guilt, and a final despair of mercy.

2. The righteous shall go away "into life eternal," that is, they shall inherit the kingdom, ver. 34. Note, 1st. Heaven is life; it is all happiness. The life of the soul results from its union with God, by the mediation of Jesus Christ, as that of the body from its union with the soul, by the animal spirits. The heavenly life consists in the vision and fruition of God, in a perfect conformity to him, and an immediate uninterrupted communion with him. 2nd. It is eternal life. There is no death to put a period to the life itself, nor old age to put a period to the comfort of it, nor any sorrow to embitter it. Thus life and death, good and evil, the blessing and the curse, are set before us, that we may choose our way, and so shall our end be. Even the Heathen had some notion of these different states of good and bad in the other world. Cicero, in his Tusculan Questions, lib. 1. brings in Socrates thus speaking, Duae sunt viae, duplicesque cursus e corpore exeuntium; Nam qui se vitis humanis contaminantur, et libidinis se tradiderunt, is devium quoddam iter est, seculum a consilio deorum; qui autem se integros castosque servarunt, quibusque fuerit minimus cum corporibus contagio, sicut in corporibus humanis vitam imitati deorum, is ad illos a quibus sunt profecti facile patet reditus.—Two paths open before those who depart out of the body: Such as have contaminated themselves with human vices, and yielded to their lusts, occupy a path that conducts them far from the assembly and council of the gods; but the upright and chaste, such as have been least defiled by the flesh, and have imitated, while in the body, the gods, these find it easy to return to the sublime beings from whom they came.

CHAPTER XXVI.

The story of the death and sufferings of Christ, is more particularly and fully recorded by all the four evangelists, than any other part of his story; for what should we determine, and desire to know, but "Christ and him crucified?" and this chapter begins that famous story. The year of the redemption was now come; the seventy weeks determined were now accomplished, when transgression must be finished, reconciliation made, and an everlasting righteousness brought in, by the cutting off of the Messiah the prince, Dan. ix. 24, 26. That awful scene is here introduced, to be read with reverence and holy fear. In this chapter we have, 1. The preliminaries, or prefaces, to Christ's sufferings: 1. The previous notice given by him of it to his disciples, ver. 1, 2; 2. The rulers' conspiracy against him, ver. 3-5; 3. The anointing of his head at a supper in Bethany, ver. 6-13; 4. Judas's bargain with the priests to betray him, ver. 14-16; 5. Christ's eating the passover with his disciples, ver. 17-25; 6. His instituting the Lord's supper, and his discourse with his disciples after it, ver. 26-35. 11. His entrance upon them, and some of the particulars of them: 1. His agony in the garden, ver. 36-46; 2. The seizing of him by the officers, with Judas's help, ver. 47-56; 3. His arraignment before the chief priest, and his condemnation in his court, ver. 57-68; 4. Peter's denying him, ver. 69-75.

AND it came to pass, when Jesus had finished all these sayings, he said unto his disciples, 2 Ye know that after two days is the feast of the passover, and the Son of man is betrayed to be crucified. 3 Then assembled together the chief priests, and the scribes, and the elders of the people, unto the palace of the high priest, who was called Caiaphas, 4 And consulted that they might take Jesus by subtilty, and kill him. 5 But they said, Not on the feast day, lest there be an uproar among the people.

Here is, 1. The notice Christ gave his disciples of the near approach of his sufferings, ver. 1, 2. While his enemies were preparing trouble for him, he was preparing himself and his followers for it. He had often told them of his sufferings at a distance; now he speaks of them as at the door: "after two days." Note, After many former notices of trouble, we still have need of fresh ones. Observe,

First. The time when he gave this alarm; when he "had finished all these sayings." 1. Not till he had finished all he had to say. Note, Christ's witnesses die not till they have finished their testimony. When Christ had gone through his undertaking as a prophet, he entered upon the execution of his office as a priest. 2. After he had finished these sayings, which go immediately before; he had bid his disciples expect sad times, bounds, and afflictions, and then tells them, "the Son of man is betrayed;" to intimate that they should fare no worse than he should; and that his sufferings should take the sting out of theirs. Note, Thoughts of a suffering Christ are great supports to a suffering Christian, suffering with him, and for him.

Secondly. The thing itself he gave them notice of: "The Son of man is betrayed." The thing was not only so sure, but so near, that it was as good as done. Note, It is good to make sufferings that are yet to come as present to us. He is betrayed; for Judas was then contriving and designing to betray him.

11. The plot of the chief priests and scribes and elders of the people against the life of our Lord Jesus, ver. 3-5. Many consults had been held against the life of Christ, but this plot was laid deeper than any yet; for the grandees were all engaged in it. The chief priests, who presided in ecclesiastical affairs; the elders, that were judges in civil matters, and the scribes, that, as doctors of the law, were directors to both. These composed the sanhedrim, or great council that governed the nation; and these were confederate against Christ. Observe,

First. The place where they met: in "the palace of the high-priest;" who was the centre of their unity in this wicked project. Secondly. The plot itself; to "take Jesus by subtilty, and kill him;" nothing less than his blood—his life-blood—would serve their turn. So cruel and bloody have been the designs of Christ's and his church's enemies. Thirdly. The policy of the plotters: "Not on the feast-day;" Why not? Was it in regard to the holiness of the time, or because they would not be disturbed in the religious services of the day? No; but "lest there be an uproar among the people." They knew Christ had a great interest in the common people; of whom there was a great concourse on the feast-day; and they would be in danger of taking up arms against their rulers, if they should happen to lay violent hands on Christ, whom all hold for a prophet. They were not awed by the fear of God, but by the fear of the people: all their concern was for their own safety, not God's honour. They would have it done at the feast; for it was a tradition of the Jews, that malefactors should be put to death at one of the three feasts, especially rebels and impostors; that all Israel might see and fear; but "not on the feast-day."

sheep and goats are thus together, they naturally form a separation, and "when folded together at night they may always be seen gathered in distinct groups; and so, round the walls, they appear instinctively to classify themselves apart, as they wait for the troughs to be filled." Probably a complete separation of a man's sheep and goats was effected when they were counted, and on others of the numerous occasions when they had to be dealt with apart. The right hand is the post of honour, and has been such in most ages and nations. Here Benson supposes there is an allusion to the custom which the Jews followed in capital cases, to place those who were to be acquitted on the right hand of the Sanhedrim, and those who were to receive a sentence of condemnation on the left. Of course the words "sheep" and "goats" in verse 33 denote the innocent and the guilty.

xxvi. 1. Hereupon Alford observes, in his English New Testament, "The public office of our Lord as a teacher having been now fulfilled, 6 Now when Jesus was in Bethany, in the house of Simon the leper, 7 There came unto him a woman having an alabaster box of very precious ointment, and poured it on his head, as he sat at meat. 8 But when his disciples saw it, they had indignation, saying, To what purpose is this waste? 9 For this ointment might have been sold for much, and given to the poor. 10 When Jesus understood it, he said unto them, Why trouble ye the woman? for she hath wrought a good work upon me. 11 For ye have the poor always with you; but me ye have not always. 12 For in that she hath poured this ointment on my body, she did it for my burial. 13 Verily I say unto you, Whosoever this gospel shall be preached in the whole world, there shall also this, that this woman hath done, be told for a memorial of her.

In this passage of story, we have,

I. The singular kindness of a good woman to our Lord Jesus, In anointing his head; ver. 6, 7. It was in Bethany, a village hard by Jerusalem, and "in the house of Simon the leper." Probably he was one who had been miraculously cleansed from his leprosy by our Lord Jesus, and he would express his gratitude to Christ by entertaining him, nor did Christ disdain to converse with him, to come into him, and sup with him. Though he was cleansed, yet he was called Simon the leper. Those who are guilty of scandalous sins, though the sin be pardoned, yet the reproach will stick by them, and will hardly be wiped away. The woman that did this is supposed to have been Mary, the sister of Martha and Lazarus; and Dr. Lightfoot thinks it was the same that was called Mary Magdalen. She had a box of ointment, very precious, which she poured on the head of Christ, as he sat at meat. This among us would be an odd sort of compliment, but it was then accounted the highest piece of respect; for the smell was very grateful, and the ointment itself refreshing to the head. David had his head anointed, Ps. xxiii. 5; Lu. vii. 46. Now this may be looked upon,

First. As an act of faith in our Lord Jesus, the Christ, the Messiah, that is, the Anointed. To signify that she believed in him as God's Anointed, whom he had set King, she anointed him, and made him her King. They shall appoint themselves one Head, Hos. i. 11. This is kissing the Son.

Secondly. As an act of love and respect to him. Some think this was she that loved much at first, and washed Christ's feet with her tears, Lu. vii. 47, and she had not left her first love, but was now as affectionate in the devotions of a grown Christian, as she was in those of a young beginner. Note, Where there is true love in the heart to Jesus Christ, nothing will be thought too good, no, nor good enough, to bestow upon him.

II. The offence which the disciples took at this. "They had indignation," ver. 8, 9; were vexed to see this ointment thus spent, which they thought might have been better bestowed.

First. See how they expressed their offence at it; they said, "To what purpose is this waste?" Now this speaks,

1. Want of tenderness towards this good woman, in interpreting her over kindness (suppose it was so) to be wastefulness. Charity teacheth us to put the best construction upon every thing that it will bear, especially upon the words and actions of those that are zealously affected in a good thing, though we may think them not altogether so discreet in it as they might be. It is true there may be over doing in well doing; but thence we must learn to be cautious ourselves, lest we run into extremes, but not to be censorious of others; because that which we may impute to the want of prudence, God may accept as an instance of abundant love. We must not say, these do too much in religion that do more than we do, but rather aim to do as much as they.

2. Want of respect to their Master: the best we can make of it is, that they knew their Master was perfectly dead to all the delights of sense; he that was so much grieved for the affliction of Joseph, cared not for being anointed with the chief ointments, Amos vi. 6; and therefore they thought such pleasures ill bestowed upon one who took so little pleasure in them. But, supposing that, it did not become them to call it waste, when they perceived that he admitted and accepted it as a token of his friend's love. Note, We must take heed of thinking any thing waste which is bestowed upon the Lord Jesus, either by others, or by ourselves. We must not think that time waste that is spent in the service of Christ, or that money waste which is laid out in any work of piety; for though it seem to be cast upon the waters, to be thrown down the river, yet we shall find it again to advantage after many days, Ecd. xi. 1.

Secondly. See how they excused their offence at it, and what pretence they made for it. "This ointment might have been sold for much, and given to the poor." Note, It is no new thing for bad affections to shelter themselves under specious covers; for people to shift off works of piety, under colour of works of charity.

III. The reproof Christ gave to his disciples for the offence at this good woman, ver. 10, 11: "Why trouble ye the woman?" Note, It is a great trouble to good people to have their good works censured and misconstrued, and it is a thing that Jesus Christ takes very ill. He here took part with a good, honest, zealous, well-meaning woman, against all his disciples, though they seem to have so much reason on their side; so heartily doth he espouse the cause of the offended little ones, Mat. xviii. 10. Observe his reason, "You have the poor always with you." Note,

First. There are some opportunities of doing and getting good which are constant, and which we must give constant attendance to the improvement of, Bibles we have always with us, sabbaths always with us, and so the poor we have always with us. Note, Those who have a heart to do good, never need to complain for want of opportunity. The poor never ceased, even out of the land of Israel, Deu. xv. 11. Some or other we cannot but see in this world that call for our charitable assistance, who are as God's receivers; some poor members of Christ, to whom he will have kindness shewn, as to himself.

Secondly. There are other opportunities of doing and getting good, which come but seldom, which are short and uncertain, and require a more peculiar diligence in the improvement of them, and which ought to be preferred before the other; "Me ye have not always;" therefore use me while ye have me. Note, 1. Christ's constant bodily presence was not to be expected here in this world, it was expedient he should go away; his real presence in the Eucharist is a fond and groundless conceit, and contradicts what he here said, "Me ye have not always." 2. Sometimes special works of piety and devotion should take place of common works of charity. The poor must not rob Christ; we must do good to all, but especially to the household of faith.

IV. Christ's approbation and commendation of the kindness of this good woman. The more his servants and their services are cavilled at by men, the more he manifests his acceptance of them. He calls it a good work, ver. 10, and saith more in praise of it than could have been imagined; particularly,

First, That the meaning of it was mystical, ver. 12: "She did it for my burial." 1. Some think she intended it so, and that the women better understood Christ's frequent predictions of his death and sufferings than the apostles did; for which they were recompensed with the honour of being the first witnesses of his resurrection. 2. However, Christ interpreted it so; and he is always willing to make the best, to make the most, of his people's well-meant words and actions. This was as it were the embalming of his body, because the doing of that after his death would be prevented by his resurrection, it was therefore done before; for it was fit it should be done some time, to shew that he was still the Messiah, even when he seemed to be triumphed over by death. The disciples thought the ointment wasted which was poured upon his head. But, saith he, if so much ointment were poured upon a dead body, according to the custom of your country, you would not grudge it, or think it waste. Now this is in effect so; the body she anoints is as good as dead, and her kindness is very reasonable for that purpose; therefore rather than call it waste, put it upon that score.

Secondly, That the memorial of it should be honourable, ver. 13: "This shall be told for a memorial." This act of faith and love was so remarkable, that the preachers of Christ crucified, and the inspired writers of the history of his passion, could not choose but take notice of this passage, proclaim the notice of it, and perpetuate the memorial of it. And being once enrolled in these records, it was "graven, as with an iron pen, and lead in the rock for ever;" and could not possibly be forgotten. None of all the trumpets of fame sound so loud and so long as the everlasting Gospel. Note, 1. The story of the death of Christ, though a tragical one, is Gospel, glad tidings, because he died for us. 2. This Gospel was to be preached in the whole world, not in Judea only, but in every nation, to every creature. Let the disciples take notice of this for their encouragement, that their sound should go to the ends of the earth. 3. Though the honour of Christ is principally designed in the Gospel, yet the honour of his saints and servants is not altogether overlooked. The memorial of this woman was to be preserved, not by dedicating a church to her, or keeping an annual feast in honour of her, or preserving a piece of her broken box for a sacred relic; but by mentioning her faith and piety, in the preaching of the Gospel, for example to others, Heb. vi. 12. And hereby honour redounds to Christ himself, who in this world, as well as in that to come, will be glorified in his saints, and admired in all them that believe.

14 Then one of the twelve, called Judas Iscariot, went unto the chief priests, 15 And said unto them, What will ye give me, and I will deliver him unto you? And they covenanted with him for thirty pieces of silver. 16 And from that time he sought opportunity to betray him.

Immediately after an instance of the greatest kindness done to Christ, follows an instance of the greatest unkindness; such mixture is there of good and bad among the followers of Christ: he hath some faithful friends, and some false and feigned ones. What could be more base than this agreement which Judas here made with the chief priests to betray Christ to them?

First. The traitor was Judas Iscariot; he is said to be "one of the twelve," as an aggravation of his villany. When "the number of the disciples was multiplied," Acts vi. 1, no marvel if there were some among them that were a shame and trouble to them; but when there were but twelve, and one of them was a devil, surely we must never expect any society perfectly pure on this side heaven. The twelve were Christ's chosen friends, that had the privilege of his special favour; they were his constant followers, that had the benefit of his most intimate converse, that upon all accounts had reason to love him, and be true to him; and yet one of them betrayed him. Note, No bonds of duty or gratitude will hold those that have a devil, Mar. v. 3, 4.

Secondly. Here is the proffer which he made to the chief priests: he went to them, and said, "What will ye give?" ver. 15. They did not send for him, nor make the proposal to him; they could not have thought that one of Christ's own disciples should be false to him. Note, There are those even among Christ's followers that are worse than any one can imagine them to be, and want nothing but opportunity to shew it. Observe,

1. What Judas promised, "I will deliver him unto you," that is, "I will let you know where he is, and undertake to bring you to him, at such a convenient time and place, that you may seize him without noise or danger of an uproar." In their conspiracy against Christ, this was it they were at a loss about, ver. 4, 5. They durst not meddle with him in public, and knew not where to find him in private; here the matter stuck, and the difficulty was insuperable till Judas came and offered them his service. Note, Those that give up themselves to be led by the devil, find him readier than they imagine to help them at a dead lift, as Judas did the chief priests. Though the rulers, by their power and interest, when they have him in their hands, could kill him, yet none but a disciple could betray him. Note, The greater profession men make of religion, and the more they are employed in the study and service of it, the greater opportunity they have of doing mischief, if their hearts be not right with God: if Judas had not been an apostle, he could not have been a traitor; if men had not known the way of righteousness, they could not have abused it.

"I will deliver him unto you;" he did not offer himself, nor did they tamper with him to be a witness against Christ, though they wanted evidence, ver. 59. And if there had been any thing to be alleged against him, which had but the colour of proof that he was an impostor, Judas was the likeliest person to have attested it; but this is an evidence of the innocency of our Lord Jesus, that his own disciple, who knew so well his doctrine, and manner of his life, and was false to him, yet could not charge him with any thing criminal, though it would have served to justify his treachery.

2. What he asked in consideration of this undertaking; "What will ye give me?" This was the only thing that made Judas betray his Master, he hoped his priestly office begins to be entered upon. He had not completed all his discourses, for he delivered after this those contained in John xiv.—xvii., but not in public; only to the inner circle of his disciples. From this point commences the narrative of his passion.

xxvi. 2. It might be doubted whether the disciples knew that our Lord was to be betrayed, or rather delivered up to be crucified, but it is best to regard both clauses of the verse as dependent on the words "ye know that." Certainly the disciples had been told that their Master would be crucified; and the only question is whether they had received any distinct intimation that it would take place at the time of the paschal feast.

xxvi. 3. The words "and the scribes" are omitted by the best ancient and modern authorities. This Caiaphas also bore the name of Joseph, as we learn from Josephus. Valerius Gratus, whose nominee Caiaphas was, had, during his procuratorship of Judea, deposed and appointed several high-priests, of whom this one was to get money by it; his master had not given him any provocation, though he knew from the first that he had a devil, yet for aught appears, he shewed the same kindness to him that he did to the rest, and put no mark of disgrace upon him that might disoblige him; he had placed him in a post that pleased him, had made him purse-bearer, and though he had embezzled the common stock, for he is called a thief, Jno. xii. 6, yet we do not find he was in any danger to be called to account for it; nor doth it appear he had any suspicion that the Gospel was a cheat; no, it was not the hatred of his Master, nor any quarrel with him, but purely the love of the money, that and nothing else, made Judas a traitor.

"What will ye give me?" Why, what did he want? Neither bread to eat, nor raiment to put on, neither necessities nor conveniences; was not he welcome wherever his Master was? Did he not fare as he fared? Had he not been but just now nobly entertained at a supper in Bethany, in the house of Simon the leper, and a little before at another, where no less a person than Martha herself waited at table? And yet this covetous wretch could not be content, but comes basely cringing to the priests, with "What will ye give me?" Note, It is not the lack of money, but the love of money, that is the root of all evil, and particularly of apostasy from Christ, witness Demas, 2 Tim. iv. 10. Satan tempted our Saviour with this bait, "All this will I give thee," Mat. iv. 9. But Judas offered himself to be tempted with it; he asks, "what will ye give me?" as if his Master were a commodity that stuck on his hands.

Thirdly. Here is the bargain which the chief priests made with him; "they covenanted with him for thirty pieces of silver;" thirty shekels, which in our money is about 3*l.* 8*s.*, so some, 3*l.* 15*s.*, so others. It should seem Judas referred himself to them, and was willing to take what they were willing to give; he catches at the first offer, lest the next should be worse. Judas had not been wont to trade high, and therefore a little money went a great way with him. By the law, Ex. xxi. 32, thirty pieces of silver was the price of a slave; a goodly price at which Christ was valued, Zec. xi. 13. No wonder Zion's sons, though comparable to fine gold, are esteemed as earthen pitchers, when Zion's King himself was thus undervalued. "They covenanted with him," ἔσθησαν, ἀπένδουν—they paid it down; so some; gave him his wages in hand, to secure him and to encourage him.

Fourthly. Here is the industry of Judas, in pursuance of his bargain, ver. 16; "he sought opportunity to betray him;" his head was still working to find out how he might do it effectually. Note, 1. It is a very wicked thing to seek opportunity to sin, and to devise mischief, for it argues the heart fully set in them to do evil, and a malice prepossession. 2. Those that are in, think they must on, though the matter be never so bad. After he had made that wicked bargain, he had time to repent, and to revoke it, but now by his covenant, the devil has one hank more upon him than he had, and tells him he must be true to his word, though never so false to his Master; as Herod must behead John for his oath's sake.

17 Now the first day of the feast of unleavened bread the disciples came to Jesus, saying unto him, Where wilt thou that we prepare for thee to eat the passover? 18 And he said, Go into the city to such a man, and say unto him, The Master saith, My time is at hand; I will keep the passover at thy house with my disciples. 19 And the disciples did as Jesus had appointed them; and they made ready the passover. 20 Now when the even was come, he sat down with the twelve. 21 And as they did eat, he said, Verily I say unto you, that one of you shall betray me. 22 And they were exceeding sorrowful, and began every one of them to say unto him, Lord, is it I? 23 And he answered and said, He that dippeth his hand with me in the dish, the same shall betray me. 24 The Son of man goeth as it is written of him: but woe unto that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed! it had been good for that man if he had not been born. 25 Then Judas, which betrayed him, answered and said, Master, is it I? He said unto him, Thou hast said.

We have here an account of Christ's keeping the passover; being made under the law he submitted to all the ordinances of it, and to this among the rest. It was kept in remembrance of Israel's deliverance out of Egypt, the birth-day of that people. It was a tradition of the Jews, that in the days of the Messiah, they should be redeemed on the very day of their coming out of Egypt, and it was exactly fulfilled, for Christ died the day after the passover, in which day they began their march.

First. The time when Christ ate the passover was the usual time appointed by God, and observed by the Jews, ver. 17; "The first day of the feast of unleavened bread," which that year happened on the fifth day of the week, which is our Thursday. Some have advanced a suggestion, that our Lord Jesus celebrated the passover at this time of day sooner than other people did; but the learned Dr. Whitby has largely disproved it.

Secondly. The place where was particularly appointed by himself to the disciples, upon their inquiry, ver. 17; they asked, "Where wilt thou that we prepare the passover?" Perhaps Judas was one of those that asked this question, where he would eat the passover, that he might know the better how to lay his train; but the rest of the disciples asked it as usual, that they might do their duty.

1. They took it for granted, that their Master would eat the passover, though he was at this time persecuted by the chief priests, and his life sought; they knew that he would not be put by his duty, either by frightenings without, or fears within. Those do not follow Christ's example, who make it an excuse for their not attending on the Lord's supper, our gospel-passover, that they have many troubles, and many enemies, are full of care and fear; and if so they have the more need of that ordinance to help to silence their fears, and comfort them under their troubles, to help them in forgiving their enemies, and casting all their cares on God. 2. They knew very well there must be preparation made for it, and it was their business as his servants to make preparations there must be solemn preparation. 3. They knew he had no house of his own wherein to eat the passover; in this as in other things for our sakes he became poor: among all Zion's palaces there was none for Zion's King, but his kingdom was not of this world. See Jno. i. 11. 4. They would not pitch upon a place without direction from him, and from him they had direction; he sent them to "such a man," ver. 18; who probably was a friend and follower of his, and to his house he invited himself and his disciples.

1st. Tell him, "My time is at hand;" he means the time of his death, elsewhere called "his hour," Jno. viii. 20; xiii. 1. The time, the hour fixed in the counsel of God, and which his heart was upon, and which he had so often spoken of. He knew when it was at hand, and was busy accordingly; we know not our time, Eccl. ix. 12, and therefore must never be off our watch; our time is always ready, Jno. vii. 6, and therefore we must be always ready. Observe, Because his time was at hand, he would keep the passover. Note, The consideration of the near approach of death should quicken us to a diligent improvement of all our opportunities for our souls. Is our time at hand, and an eternity just before us? let us then keep the feast with the unleavened bread of sincerity. Observe, When our Lord Jesus invited himself to this good man's house, he sent him this intelligence, that his time was at hand. Note, Christ's secret is with them that entertain him in their hearts. Compare Jno. xiv. 21, with Rev. iii. 20. 2nd. Tell him, "I will keep the passover at thy house;" this was an instance of his authority, as the master, which it is likely this man acknowledged; he did not beg but command the use of his house for this purpose. Thus when Christ by his Spirit comes into the heart, he demands admission, as one whose own the heart is, and cannot be denied, and gains admission, as one who has all power in the heart, and cannot be resisted; if he saith, "I will keep a feast in such a soul," he will do it, for he works, and none can hinder; his people shall be willing, for he makes them so. "I will keep the passover with my disciples." Note, Wherever Christ is welcome, he expects that his disciples should be welcome too: when we take God for our God, we take his people for our people.

Thirdly. The preparation was made by the disciples, ver. 19; "They did as Jesus had appointed." Note, Those who would have Christ's presence with them in the gospel-passover, must strictly observe his instructions, and do as he directs; "they made ready the passover;" they got the lamb killed in the court of the temple, got it roasted, the bitter herbs provided, bread and wine, the cloth laid, and every thing set in readiness for such a sacred, solemn feast.

Fourthly. They ate the passover according to the law, ver. 20. "He sat down," in the usual table gesture, not lying on one side, for it was not easy to eat, nor possible to drink in that posture, but sitting upright, though perhaps sitting low. It is the same word that is used for his posture at other meals, Mat. ix. 10; Lu. vii. 37; Mat. xxvi. 7. It was only the first passover in Egypt, as most think, that was eaten with "their loins girded, shoes on their feet, and staff in their hand," though all that might be in a sitting posture. His sitting down notes the composedness of his mind, when he addressed himself to this solemnity. He "sat down with the twelve," Judas not excepted. By the law they were to take a lamb for a household, Ex. xii. 3, 4; which were to be not less than ten, or more than twenty; Christ's disciples were his household. Note, They whom God has charged with families, must have their houses with them in serving the Lord.

Fifthly. We have here Christ's discourse with his disciples at the passover supper. The usual subject of discourse at that ordinance was the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, Ex. xii. 26, 27; but the great Passover is now ready to be offered, and the discourse of that swallows up all talk of the other, Jer. xvi. 14, 15. Here is,

1. The general notice Christ gives his disciples of the treachery that should be among them, ver. 21: "One of you shall betray me." Observe, 1st, Christ knew it; we know not what troubles will befall us, nor whence they will arise: but Christ knew all this, which, as it proves his omniscience, so magnifies his love, that he knew all things that should befall him, and yet did not draw back. He foresaw the treachery and baseness of a disciple of his own, and yet went on; took care of those that were given him, though he knew there was a Judas among them; would pay the price of our redemption, though he foresaw some would deny the Lord that bought them; and shed his blood, though he knew it would be trodden under foot, as an unholy thing. 2nd. When there was occasion, he let those about him know it. He had often told them that the Son of man should be betrayed, now he tells them that one of them should do it; that when they saw it they might not only be the less surprised, but have their faith in him confirmed, Jno. xiii. 19; xiv. 29.

xxvi. 5. For "not on the feast day" we may render "not during the feast," with Alford, or "not at the feast," with the American translators. The feast extended over seven days. On the feast day the Jews could not seize or put to death any one; and it was an act of prudence not to attempt such a thing during the whole of the festival. Their only safe course was to seize him before the feast, and deliver him to the Roman power. It has been noted, however, that when Jesus was in Bethany, occasion was given for an offer to be made, and he was seized, after all, during the feast.

xxvi. 6. It is unknown who Simon the leper was, but he was some one who had apparently been a leper and had been healed.

xxvi. 7. This alabaster box was rather a flask, or phial with a narrow neck, and containing perfumed oil, as the word "poured" suggests. Of ancient alabaster vessels used for this purpose, several

2. The disciples' resentment of this, ver. 22. How did they take it?

1st. "They were exceeding sorrowful." First. It troubled them much to hear that their Master should be betrayed. When Peter was first told of it he said, "Be it far from thee;" and therefore it must needs be a great trouble to him, and the rest of them, to hear that it was very near to him. Secondly. It troubled them more to hear that one of them should do it. It would be a reproach to the fraternity for an apostle to prove a traitor, and this grieved them: gracious souls grieve for the sins of others, especially of those that have made a more than ordinary profession of religion, 2 Cor. xi. 29. Thirdly. It troubled them most of all that they were left at uncertainty which of them it was, and each of them was afraid for himself, lest, as Hazael speaks, 2 Kin. viii. 13, he was the dog that should do this great thing. Those that know the strength and subtlety of the tempter, and their own weakness and folly, cannot but be in pain for themselves, when they hear that "the love of many will wax cold."

2nd. They "began every one of them to say, Lord, is it I?" First. They were not apt to suspect Judas, though he was a thief; yet it seems he had carried it so plausibly, that those who were intimate with him were not jealous of him: none of them so much as looked upon him, much less said, "Lord, is it Judas?" Note, It is possible for an hypocrite to go through the world, not only undiscovered, but unsuspected; like bad money, so ingeniously counterfeited, that nobody questions it. Secondly. They were apt to suspect themselves: "Lord, is it I?" Though they were not conscious to themselves of any inclination that way,—no such thought had ever entered into their mind,—yet they feared the worst, and asked Him who knows us better than we know ourselves, "Lord, is it I?" Note, It well becomes the disciples of Christ always to be jealous over themselves with a godly jealousy, especially in trying times. We know not how strongly we may be tempted, nor how far God may leave us to ourselves; and therefore have reason not to be high-minded, but fear. It is observable that our Lord Jesus, just before he instituted the Lord's supper, put his disciples upon this trial and suspicion of themselves, to teach us to examine and judge ourselves, and "so to eat of that bread, and drink of that cup."

3. Further information given them concerning this matter, ver. 23, 24, where Christ tells them, 1st. That the traitor was a familiar friend: "He that dipeth his hand with me in the dish," that is, "One of you that are now with me at the table." He mentions this to make the treachery appear the more exceeding sinful. Note, External communion with Christ in holy ordinances is a great aggravation of our falseness to him. It is base ingratitude to dip with Christ in the dish, and yet betray him. 2nd. That this was according to the Scripture, which would take off the offence at it. Was Christ betrayed by a disciple? so it was written, Ps. xli. 9, "He that did eat bread with me, has lifted up the heel against me." The more we see of the fulfilling of the Scripture in our troubles, the better we may bear them. 3rd. That it would prove a very dear bargain to the traitor: "Woe to that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed." This he said, not only to awaken the conscience of Judas, and bring him to repent and revoke his bargain, but for warning to all others to take heed of sinning like Judas; though God can serve his own purposes by the sins of men, that doth not make the sinner's condition the less woeful. "It had been good for that man if he had not been born." Note, The ruin that attends those who betray Christ is so great, that it were more eligible, by far, not to be at all, than to be thus miserable.

4. The conviction of Judas, ver. 25. 1st. He asked, "Is it I?" to avoid coming under the suspicion of guilt by his silence. He knew very well it was he, and yet made thus strange of it. Note, Many whose consciences condemn them, yet are very industrious to justify themselves before men, and put a good face on it, with, "Lord, is it I?" He could not but know that Christ knew, and yet trusted so much to his courtesy, because he had hitherto concealed it, that he had the impudence to challenge him to tell; or perhaps he was so much under the power of infidelity, that he imagined Christ did not know it, as those who said, "The Lord shall not see," Ps. xciv. 7; and asked, "Can he judge through the dark clouds?" 2nd. Christ soon answered his question, "Thou hast said," that is, It is as thou hast said. This is not all out so plain as Nathan's, "Thou art the man;" but it was enough to convict him, and, if his heart had not been wretchedly hardened, to have broke the neck of his plot, when he saw it discovered to his Master, and discovered by him. Note, They who are contriving to betray Christ will some time or other betray themselves, and their own thoughts will fall upon them.

26 And as they were eating, Jesus took bread, and blessed it, and brake it, and gave it to the disciples, and said, Take, eat; this is my body. 27 And he took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of it; 28 For this is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins. 29 But I say unto you, I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom. 30 And when they had sung an hymn, they went out into the mount of Olives.

We have here the institution of the great gospel ordinance of the Lord's supper, which was received of the Lord. Observe,

1. The time when it was instituted: "as they were eating;" at the latter end of the passover supper, before the table was drawn, because, as a feast upon a sacrifice, it was to come in the room of that ordinance. Christ is to us the passover sacrifice, by which atonement is made; 1 Cor. v. 7, "Christ our passover is sacrificed for us." This ordinance is to us the passover supper, by which application is made, and a commemoration celebrated of a much greater deliverance than that of Israel out of Egypt. All the legal sacrifices of propitiation being summed up in the death of Christ, and so abolished, all the legal feasts of rejoicing were summed up in this sacrament, and so abolished.

II. The institution itself. A sacrament must be instituted; it is no part of moral worship, nor is it dictated by natural light, but has both its being and significance from the institution, from a Divine institution: it is His prerogative who established the covenant to appoint the seals of it. Hence the apostle, 1 Cor. xi. 23, &c., in that discourse of his concerning this ordinance, all along calls Jesus Christ the Lord, because, as Lord, as Lord of the covenant, Lord of the church, he appointed this ordinance; in which,

First. The body of Christ is signified and represented by bread. He had said formerly, Jno. vi. 35, "I am the bread of life," upon which metaphor this sacrament is built; as the life of the body is supported by bread, which is therefore put for all bodily nourishment, ch. iv. 4-6; so the life of the soul is supported and maintained by Christ's mediation.

1. He "took bread;" ῥὸν ἄρτον, 'the loaf,' some loaf that lay ready at hand, fit for the purpose; it is likely it was unleavened bread, but that circumstance not being taken notice of, we are not to bind ourselves to that, as some of the Greek churches do. His taking the bread was a solemn action, and, it is likely, was done in such a manner as to be observed by them that sat with him, that they might expect something more than ordinary to be done with it. Thus was the Lord Jesus set apart in the counsels of Divine love for the working out of redemption.

2. He "blessed it;" set it apart for this use by prayer and thanksgiving. We do not find any set form of words used by him upon this occasion, but what he said, no doubt, was accommodated to the business in hand—that New Testament which, by this ordinance, was to be sealed and ratified. This was like God's blessing the seventh day, Gen. ii. 3; by which it was separated to God's honour, and made to all that duly observe it a blessed day. Christ could command the blessing, and we, in his name, are emboldened to beg the blessing.

3. He "brake it;" which notes, 1st. The breaking of Christ's body for us, that it might be fitted for our use: he was bruised for our iniquities, as bread-corn was bruised, Isa. xlviii. 28; though a bone of him was not broken,—for all his breaking did not weaken him,—yet his flesh was broken with breach upon breach, and his wounds multiplied, Job xvi. 14; ix. 17, and that pained him. God complains that he is broken with the whorish heart of sinners, Eze. vi. 9; his law broken, our covenants with him broken: now justice requires breach for breach, Lev. xxiv. 20, and Christ was broken to satisfy that demand. 2nd. The breaking of Christ's body to us, as the father of the family breaks the bread to the children. The breaking of Christ to us is to facilitate the application; every thing is made ready to us, by the grants of God's word, and the operations of his grace.

4. He "gave it" to his disciples, as the master of the family, and the master of this feast; it is not said he gave it to the apostles, though they were so, and had been often called so before this; but to the disciples, because all the disciples of Christ have a right to this ordinance, and those shall have the benefit of it who are his disciples indeed; yet he gave it to them, as he did the multiplied loaves, by them to be handed to all other his followers.

5. He said, "Take, eat; this is my body." He here tells them, 1st. What they should do with it: "Take, eat;" accept of Christ as he is offered to you; receive the atonement, approve of it, consent to it, come up to the terms on which the benefit of it is proposed to you; submit to his grace and to his government. Believing on Christ is expressed by receiving him, Jno. i. 12; and feeding upon him, Jno. vi. 57, 58. Meat looked upon, or the dish never so well garnished, will not nourish us; it must be fed upon, so must the doctrine of Christ. 2nd. What they should have with it: "This is my body," not ὅσος,—"this bread," but τόσος—"this eating and drinking," that is, believing carries all the efficacy of Christ's death to our souls. "This is my body," that is, spiritually and sacramentally; 'this signifies and represents my body,' that is sacramental language, like that, Ex. xii. 11, "It is the Lord's passover." Upon a carnal and much-mistaken sense of these words, the church of Rome builds the monstrous doctrine of transubstantiation, which makes the bread to be changed into the substance of Christ's body, only the accidents of bread remaining; which affronts Christ, destroys the nature of a sacrament, and gives the lie to our senses. We partake of the sun, not by having the bulk and body of the sun put into our hands, but the beams of it darted down upon us; so we partake of Christ, by partaking of his grace, and the blessed fruits of the breaking of his body.

Secondly. The blood of Christ is signified and represented by the wine. To make it a complete feast, here is not only bread to strengthen, but wine to make glad the heart, ver. 27, 28. "He took the cup," the grace-cup, which was set ready to be drunk, after thanks returned, according to the custom of the Jews at the passover; this Christ took and made the sacramental cup, and so altered the property. It was intended for a cup of blessing, so the Jews call it; and therefore St. Paul studiously distinguished between the cup of blessing which we bless and that which they bless. He gave thanks to God, to teach us, not only in every ordinance, but in every part of the ordinance, to have our eyes up to God. This cup he gave to the disciples.

1. With a command, "Drink ye all of it." Thus he welcomes his guests to his table, obligeth them all to drink of his cup. Why should he so expressly command them all to drink, and to see that none let it pass them, and press that more expressly in this than in the other part of the ordinance? Surely it was because he foresaw how in after ages this ordinance would be dismembered, by the prohibition of the cup to the laity, with an express non obstante,—"notwithstanding," to the command.

2. With an explication; for "this is my blood of the New Testament." Therefore drink it with appetite, delight, because it is so rich a cordial. Hitherto the blood of Christ had been represented by the blood of beasts, real blood; but after it was actually shed, it was represented by the blood of grapes, metaphorical blood; so wine is called in an Old Testament prophecy of Christ, Gen. xlix. 10, 11.

Now observe what Christ saith of his blood represented in the sacrament:

1st. It is "my blood of the New Testament;" the Old Testament was confirmed by the blood of bulls and goats, Heb. ix. 16, 17; Ex. xxiv. 8; but the New Testament with the blood of Christ, which is here distinguished from that: it is "my blood of the New Testament." The covenant God is pleased to make with us, and all the benefits and privileges of it, are owing to the merits of Christ's death.

2nd. It is shed. It was not shed till next day, but it was now upon the point of being shed: it is as good as done. Before you come to repeat this ordinance yourselves, it will be shed; he was now ready to be offered, and his blood to be poured out, as the blood of the sacrifices which made atonement.

3rd. It "is shed for many;" Christ came to confirm a covenant with many, Dan. ix. 27, and the intent of his death agreed. The blood of the Old Testament was shed for a few; it confirmed a covenant, which, saith Moses, the Lord hath made with you, Ex. xxiv. 8. The atonement was made only "for the children of Israel," Lev. xvi. 34; but Jesus Christ is a propitiation "for the sins of the whole world," 1 Jno. ii. 2.

4th. It is shed "for the remission of sins," that is, to purchase remission of sins for us. The redemption we have through his blood is "the remission of sins," Eph. i. 7. The new covenant, which is procured and ratified by the blood of Christ, is a charter of pardon, an act of indemnity, in order to a reconciliation between God and man, for sin was the only thing that made the quarrel, "and without shedding of blood is no remission," Heb. ix. 22. The pardon of sin is that great blessing which is in the Lord's supper conferred upon all true believers; it is the foundation of all other blessings, and the spring of everlasting comfort, ch. ix. 2.

specimens are figured in "Cassell's Bible Dictionary," and many have been found, not only in Egypt and Assyria, but in Greek and Roman ruins. They were made at a place called Alabastron, on the Nile, and hence their name.

xxvi. 15. Thirty pieces of silver were thirty shekels. As the shekel may be reckoned at about half-a-crown, the sum was about £3 16s. English.

xxvi. 17. Unleavened bread was eaten during the paschal feast,

5. With a farewell to the fruit of the vine, ver. 29. Christ and his disciples had now feasted together with a deal of comfort, in both an Old Testament and a New Testament festival, Fibula utriusque Testamenti,—the connecting tie of both Testaments. How amiable were these tabernacles! How good to be here! Never such a heaven upon earth as was at this table, but it was not intended for a perpetuity. He now told them, Ino. xvi. 17, that yet "a little while and they should not see him, and again a little while and they should see him," which explains this here.

1st. He takes leave of such communion: "I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine," that is, "Now I am no more in the world," Ino. xvii. 11; "I have had enough of it, and am glad to think of leaving it, glad to think that this is the last meal. Farewell, this fruit of the vine, this passover cup, this sacramental wine." Dying saints take their leave of sacraments, and other the ordinances of communion, which they enjoy in this world with comfort, for the joy and glory they enter into supersedes them all; when the sun riseth, farewell the candles.

2nd. He assures them of a happy meeting again at last. It is a long, but not an everlasting farewell: "until that day when I drink it new with you." First. Some understand it of the interviews he had with them after his resurrection, which was the first step of his exaltation into the kingdom of his Father; and though, during those forty days, he did not converse with them so constantly as he had done, yet he did "eat and drink with them," Acts x. 41, which, as it confirmed their faith, so, doubtless, it greatly comforted their hearts, for they were rejoiced at it, Lu. xxiv. 41. Secondly. Others understand it of the joys and glories of the future state, which the saints shall partake of in everlasting communion with the Lord Jesus, represented here by the pleasures of a banquet of wine. That will be the kingdom of his Father, for unto him shall the kingdom be then delivered up; the wine of consolation (Jer. xvi. 7) will there be always new, never flat or sour, as wine with long keeping; never nauseous or unpleasant, as wine to those that have drunk much, but ever fresh. Christ will himself partake of those pleasures; it was the joy set before him, which he had in his eye, and all his faithful friends and followers shall partake with him.

3d. Here is the close of the solemnity with a hymn, ver. 30. They sung a hymn, or a psalm; whether the psalms which the Jews usually sung at the close of the passover supper, which they called the Great Hallel, viz. Ps. cxiii. and the five that follow it; or whether some new hymn, more closely adapted to the occasion, is uncertain; I rather think the former: had it been new, John would not have omitted to record it. Note, First. Singing of psalms is a gospel ordinance; Christ's removing the hymn from the close of the passover to the close of the Lord's supper, plainly speaks that he intended that ordinance should continue in his church; that as it had not its birth with the ceremonial law, so it should not die with it. Secondly. It is very proper, after the Lord's supper, as an expression of our joy in God through Jesus Christ, and a thankful acknowledgment of that great love wherewith God has loved us in him. Thirdly. It is not unseasonable, no, not in times of sorrow and suffering; the disciples were in sorrow, and Christ entering upon his sufferings, and yet they could sing a hymn together. Our spiritual joy should not be interrupted by outward afflictions.

When this was done, "they went out into the mount of Olives;" he would not stay in the house to be apprehended, lest he should bring the master of the house into trouble; nor would he stay in the city, lest it should occasion an uproar; but he retired into the adjacent country, "the mount of Olives," the same mount that David, in his distress, went up the ascent of, weeping, 2 Sam. xv. 30. They had the benefit of moonlight for this walk, for the passover was always at the full moon. Note, After we have received the Lord's supper, it is good for us to retire for prayer and meditation, and to be alone with God.

31 Then saith Jesus unto them, All ye shall be offended because of me this night: for it is written, I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep of the flock shall be scattered abroad. 32 But after I am risen again, I will go before you into Galilee. 33 Peter answered and said unto him, Though all men shall be offended because of thee, yet will I never be offended. 34 Jesus said unto him, Verily I say unto thee, That this night, before the cock crow, thou shalt deny me thrice. 35 Peter said unto him, Though I should die with thee, yet will I not deny thee. Likewise also said all the disciples.

We have here Christ's discourse with his disciples upon the way, as they were going to the mount of Olives. Observe,

1. A prediction of the trial which both he and his disciples were now to go through. He here foretells,

First. A dismal scattering storm arising, ver. 31. 1. That they should all be offended because of Christ that very night, that is, they should all be so ill frightened with his sufferings, that they would not have the courage to stick to him in them, but would all basely desert him; "because of me this night," ἐν ἡμέρᾳ ἐν ᾗ πωλεῖται τὰ πάντα,—because of me, even because of this night; so it might be read; that is, because of what happens to me this night? Note, 1st. Offences will come among the disciples of Christ in an hour of trial and temptation; it cannot be but they should, for they are weak, Satan is busy; God permits offences; even they whose hearts are upright may sometimes be overtaken with an offence. 2nd. There are some temptations and offences, the effects of which are general and universal among Christ's disciples: "All you shall be offended." Christ had lately discovered to them the treachery of Judas, but let not the rest be secure; though there will be but one traitor, they will be all deserters. This he saith to alarm them all, that they might all watch. 3rd. We have need to prepare for sudden trials, which may come to extremity in a very little time. Christ and his disciples had eaten their supper well together in peace and quietness, yet that very night proved such a night of offence. How soon may a storm arise! We know not what a day or a night may bring forth, nor what great event may be in the teeming womb of a little time, Pr. xxvii. 1. 4th. The cross of Christ is the great stumblingblock to many that pass for his disciples; both the cross he bore for us, 1 Cor. i. 23, and that which we are called out to bear for him ch. xii. 21.

2. That herein the scripture might be fulfilled, "I will smite the Shepherd." It is quoted from Zec. xiii. 7. 1st. Here is the smiting of the shepherd in the sufferings of Christ. God awakens the sword of his wrath against the Son of his love, and he is smitten. 2nd. The scattering of the sheep thereupon in the flight of the disciples. When Christ fell into the hands of his enemies, his disciples ran, one one way, and another another; it was each one's care to shift for himself, and happy he that could get furthest from the cross.

Secondly. He gives them the prospect of a comfortable gathering together again after this storm, ver. 32: "After I am risen again, I will go before you." Though you will forsake me, I will not forsake you; though you fall, I will take care you shall not fall finally; we shall have a meeting again in Galilee; I will go before you, as the shepherd before the sheep. Some make the last words of that prophecy, Zec. xiii. 7, a promise equivalent to this here; "and I will bring my hand again to the little ones." There is no bringing them back, but by bringing his hand to them. Note, The Captain of our salvation knows how to rally his troops, when, through their cowardice, they have been put into disorder.

11. The presumption of Peter, that he should keep his integrity whatever happened, ver. 33: "Though all men be offended, yet will I never be offended." Peter had a great stock of confidence, and was, upon all occasions, forward to speak, especially to speak for himself, and sometimes it did him a kindness, but at other times it betrayed him, as it did here. Where observe,

First. How he bound himself with a promise, that he would never be offended in Christ; not only not this night, but at no time. And if this promise had been made in an humble dependence upon the grace of Christ, it had been an excellent good word. Before the Lord's supper, Christ's discourse led his disciples to examine themselves with, "Lord, is it I?" for that is our preparatory duty, after the ordinance his discourse leads them to an engaging of themselves to close walking, for that is the subsequent duty.

Secondly. How he fancied himself better armed against temptation than any one else, and this was his weakness and folly; "though all men shall be offended, yet will not I." This was worse than Hazael's "What, is thy servant a dog?" for he supposed the thing so ill, that no man would do it; but Peter supposed it possible that some, nay, that all men might be offended, and yet he escape better than any. Note, It argues a great degree of self conceit and self confidence, to think ourselves either safe from the temptations, or free from the corruptions, that are common to men. We should rather say, If it be possible others may be offended, there is danger that I may be so. But it is common for those that think too well of themselves easily to admit suspicions of others: see Gal. vi. 1.

III. The particular warning Christ gave Peter of what he would do, ver. 34. He imagined that, in the hour of temptation, he should come off better than any of them, and Christ tells him he should come off worse. The warning is introduced with a solemn asseveration, "Verily, I say unto thee," take my word for it, who know thee better than thou knowest thyself. He tells him, First. That he should deny him. Peter promised he would not be so much as offended in him, not desert him; but Christ tells him he will go further, he will disown him. He said, Though all men, yet not I; and he did it sooner than any. Secondly. How quickly he should do it; this night, before to-morrow, nay, before cock crowing. Satan's temptations are compared to darts, Eph. vi. 16, which wound ere we are aware, suddenly doth he shoot. As we know not how near we may be to trouble, so we know not how near we may be to sin; if God leave us to ourselves, we are always in danger. Thirdly. How often he should do it; thrice. He thought he should never once do such a thing; but Christ tells him he would do it again and again: for when once our feet begin to slip, it is hard to recover our standing again. The beginnings of sin are as the letting forth of water.

IV. Peter's repeated assurances of his fidelity, ver. 35: "Though I should die with thee." He supposed the temptation strong, when he said, "though all men do it, yet will not I." But here he supposeth it stronger, when he puts it to the peril of life, "though I should die with thee." He knew what he should do—rather die with Christ than deny him: it was the condition of discipleship, Lu. xiv. 26. And he thought what he would do, never be false to his Master, whatever it cost him, yet it proved he was. It is easy to talk boldly and carelessly of death at a distance: I will rather die than do such a thing. But it is not so soon done as said when it comes to the setting to, and death shews itself in its own colours.

What Peter said, the rest subscribed to; "likewise also said all the disciples." Note, 1. There is a proneness in good men to be over confident of their own strength and stability. We are ready to think ourselves able to grapple with the strongest temptations, to go through the hardest and most hazardous services, and to bear the greatest afflictions for Christ, but it is because we do not know ourselves. 2. Those often fall soonest and foulest that are most confident of themselves. Those are least safe that are most secure. Satan is most active to seduce such; they are most off their guard, and God leaves them to themselves to humble them: see 1 Cor. x. 12.

36 Then cometh Jesus with them unto a place called Gethsemane, and saith unto the disciples, Sit ye here, while I go and pray yonder. 37 And he took with him Peter and the two sons of Zebedee, and began to be sorrowful and very heavy. 38 Then saith he unto them, My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death: tarry ye here, and watch with me. 39 And he went a little farther, and fell on his face, and prayed, saying, O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me: nevertheless not as I will, but as thou wilt. 40 And he cometh unto the disciples, and findeth them asleep, and saith unto Peter, What, could ye not watch with me one hour? 41 Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation: the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak. 42 He went away again the second time, and prayed, xxvi. 18. The man might have been a stranger to the Lord and his disciples, because it was usual for householders at this feast to receive strangers freely, in order that they might keep the Passover, which, but for such hospitality, they might not be able to do.

xxvi. 25. The word for "master" here is rabbi, a different word in the original from that in verse 18, and not needing translation.

xxvi. 26—28. On some expressions here there has been a vast amount of controversy, and it has been and is believed by many that they justify the Romish doctrine of the real presence, or transubstantiation. Truly, Jesus said, "This is my body;" but did the disciples, who saw bread in his hand, think it was his body in the sense in which that was his body which was present and visible as such? Did they think they ate his body when they ate the bread he gave to them? In verse 28 it is not simply "This is my blood," but "This is my blood of the (new) testament" or covenant. The word "new" is probably an interpolation, and is not received by saying, O my Father, if this cup may not pass away from me, except I drink it, thy will be done. 43 And he came and found them asleep again: for their eyes were heavy. 44 And he left them, and went away again, and prayed the third time, saying the same words. 45 Then cometh he to his disciples, and saith unto them, Sleep on now, and take your rest: behold, the hour is at hand, and the Son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners. 46 Rise, let us be going: behold, he is at hand that doth betray me.

Hitherto were the preparatives for Christ's sufferings, now we enter upon the bloody scene. In these verses we have the story of his agony in the garden. This was the beginning of sorrows to our Lord Jesus. Now the sword of the Lord began to awake against the Man that was his fellow; and how should it be quiet when the Lord had given it a charge? The clouds had been gathering a good while, and looked black. He had said some days before, "now is my soul troubled," Jno. xii. 27; but now the storm began in good earnest. He put himself into this agony before his enemies gave him any trouble, to shew that he was a free will offering, that his life was not forced from him, but he laid it down of himself, Jno. x. 18. Observe,

I. The place where he underwent this mighty agony: it was in "a place called Gethsemane." The name signifies, torculi olei,—"an olive mill," a press for olives, like a wine press, where they trod the olives, Mic. vi. 15. And this was the proper place for such a thing, at the foot of the mount of Olives. There our Lord Jesus began his passion; there "it pleased the Lord to bruise him," and crush him, that fresh oil might flow to all believers from him; that we might partake of the root and fatness of that good olive. There he trod the wine press of his Father's wrath, and trod it alone.

II. The company he had with him when he was in this agony.

First. He took all the eleven disciples with him to the garden, except Judas, who was at this time otherwise employed. Though it was late in the night, near bed-time, yet they stuck to him, and took this walk by moonlight with him, as Elisha, who, when he was told that his master should shortly be taken from his head, professed he would not leave him, though he led him about; so these follow the Lamb wheresoever he goes.

Secondly. He took only Peter, and James, and John with him into that corner of the garden where he suffered his agony. He left the rest at some distance, perhaps at the garden door, with this charge, "sit ye here, while I go and pray yonder;" like that of Abraham to his young men, Gen. xxii. 5, "abide ye here, and I will go yonder and worship." 1. Christ went to pray alone, though he had lately prayed with his disciples, Jno. xvii. 1. Note, Our prayers with our families must not excuse us from our secret devotions. 2. He ordered them to sit here. Note, We must take heed of giving any disturbance or interruption to those who retire for secret communion with God. He took these three with him, because they had been the witnesses of his glory in his transfiguration, ch. xvii. 1, 2, and that would prepare them to be the witnesses of his agony. Note, Those are best prepared to suffer with Christ, that have by faith beheld his glory, and have conversed with the glorified saints upon the holy mount. "If we suffer with Christ, we shall reign with him;" and if we hope to reign with him, why should we not expect to suffer with him?

III. The agony itself that he was in. "He began to be sorrowful, and very heavy." It is called an agony, Lu. xxii. 44; a conflict. It was not any bodily pain or torment he was in, nothing occurred to hurt him; but whatever it was, it was from within; he troubled himself, Jno. xi. 33. The words here used are very emphatical: he began ἀνταρξάσθαι καὶ ἀδυνατεῖν, "to be sorrowful, and in a consternation." The latter word signifies such a sorrow as makes a man neither fit for company nor desirous of it. He had like a weight of lead upon his spirits. Physicians use a word near akin to it, to signify the disorder a man is in in a fit of ague, or beginning of a fever. Now was fulfilled, Ps. xxii. 14, "I am poured out like water, my heart is like wax, it is melted;" and all those passages in the Psalms where David complains of the sorrow of his soul, Ps. xvii. 4, 6; xxii. 7; lv. 4, 5; lxi. 1-3; lxxxviii. 3; cxvi. 3; and Jonah's complaint, ch. ii. 4, 5. But what was the cause of all this? What was it that put him into this agony? "Why art thou cast down," blessed Jesus, and why disquieted? Certainly it was nothing of despair or distrust of his Father, much less any conflict or struggle with him. As his Father loved him because he laid down his life for the sheep, so he was entirely subject to his Father's will in it. But,

First. He engaged in an encounter with the powers of darkness; so he intimates, Lu. xxii. 52, "This is your hour, and the power of darkness;" and he spoke of it just before, Jno. xiv. 30, 31, "The prince of this world comes." I see him rallying his forces, and preparing for a general assault; "but he has nothing in me;" no garrisons in his interest, none that secretly hold correspondence with him, and therefore his attempts, though fierce, will be fruitless; but "as the Father gave me commandment, so I do;" however it be, I must have a struggle with him, the field must be fairly fought; and therefore, "arise, let us go hence," let us hasten to the field of battle and meet the enemy. Now is the close engagement in single combat between Michael and the dragon, hand to hand; "now is the judgment of this world;" the great cause is now to be determined, the decisive battle fought, in which the prince of this world will certainly be beaten and cast out, Jno. xii. 31. Christ, when he works salvation, is described like a champion taking the field, Isa. lix. 16-18. Now the serpent makes his fiercest onset on the seed of the woman, and directs his sting, the sting of death, to his very heart; animamque in vulnere ponit,—"and the wound is mortal."

Secondly. He was now bearing the iniquities which the Father laid upon him, and by this sorrow and amazement he accommodated himself to his undertaking. The sufferings he was entering upon were for our sins; they were all made to meet upon him, and he knew it. And therefore, as we are obliged to be sorry for our particular sins, so he was grieved for the sins of us all. So Bishop Pearson, p. 191. Now, in the valley of Jehoshaphat, where Christ now was, God gathered all nations, and pleaded with them in his Son, Joel iii. 2, 12. He knew the malignity of the sins that were laid upon him,—how provoking to God, how ruining to man,—and these being all set in order before him, and charged upon him, he was sorrowful, and very heavy. Now it was that iniquities took hold on him, so that he was not able to look up, as was foretold concerning him, Ps. xl. 7, 12.

Thirdly. He had a full and clear prospect of all the sufferings that were before him: he foresaw the treachery of Judas, the unkindness of Peter, the malice of the Jews, and their base ingratitude. He knew that he should now in a few hours be scourged, spit upon, crowned with thorns, nailed to the cross; death in its most dreadful appearances—death, in pomp, attended with all its terrors, looked him in the face, and this made him sorrowful, especially because it was the wages of our sin which he had undertaken to satisfy for. It is true, the martyrs that have suffered for Christ, have entertained the greatest torments, and the most terrible deaths, without any such sorrow and consternation; have called their prisons their delectable orchards, and a bed of flames a bed of roses; but then, 1. Christ was now denied the supports and comforts which they had, that is, he denied them to himself, and his soul refused to be comforted, not in passion, but in justice to his undertaking. Their cheerfulness under the cross was owing to the Divine favour, which, for the present, was suspended from the Lord Jesus. 2. His sufferings were of another nature from theirs. St. Paul, when he is to be offered upon the sacrifice and service of the saints' faith, can joy and rejoice with them all; but to be offered a sacrifice to make atonement for sin, is quite a different case. On the saints' cross there is a blessing pronounced which enables them to rejoice under it, ch. v. 10, 12; but to Christ a cross there was a curse annexed, which made him sorrowful, and very heavy under it. And his sorrow under the cross was the foundation of their joy under it.

IV. His complaint of this agony. Finding himself under the arrests of his passion, he goes to his disciples, ver. 38, and,

First. He acquaints them with his condition: "My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death." It gives some little ease to a troubled spirit to have a friend ready to unbosom itself to, and give vent to its sorrows. Christ here tells them, 1. What was the seat of his sorrow: it was his soul that was now in an agony. This proves that Christ had a true human soul; for he suffered, not only in his body, but in his soul. We had sinned both against our own bodies and against our souls; both used in sin, and both wronged by it; and therefore Christ suffered in soul as well as in body. 2. What was the degree of his sorrow: he was exceeding sorrowful, περίλυτος, compassed about with sorrow on all hands. It was sorrow in the highest degree, even unto death; it was a killing sorrow, such sorrow as no mortal man could bear and live. He was ready to die for grief; they were sorrows of death. 3. The duration of it: it will continue even unto death. "My soul will be sorrowful as long as it is in this body; I see no other outlet but death." He now began to be sorrowful, and never ceased to be so till he said, "It is finished;" that grief is now finished which began in the garden. It was prophesied of Christ, that he should be a man of sorrows, Isa. liii. 3. He was so all along; we never read that he laughed; but all his sorrows hitherto were nothing to this.

Secondly. He bespeaks their company and attendance: "Tarry ye here, and watch with me." Sure he was destitute indeed of help, when he entreated theirs, who he knew would be but miserable comforters; but he would hereby teach us the benefit of the communion of saints. It is good to have, and therefore good to seek, the assistance of our brethren, when at any time we are in an agony; for two is better than one. What he said to them, he saith to all, watch, Mar. xlii. 37, not only watch for him in expectation of his future coming, but watch with him, in application to our present work.

V. What passed between him and his Father when he was in this agony. "Being in an agony, he prayed." Prayer is never out of season, but especially seasonable in an agony.

First. Observe, The place where he prayed: "He went a little further;" withdrew from them; that the scripture might be fulfilled, "I have trod the wine press alone." He retired for prayer; a troubled soul finds most ease when it is alone with God, who understands the broken language of sighs and groans. Calvin's devout remark upon this is worth transcribing: Utile est seorsim orare, tunc enim magis familiariter sese denudat fidei animus, et simplicius sua vota, genitus, curas, pavores, spes, et gaudia in Dei sinum eonerat,—"It is useful to pray apart; for then the faithful soul develops itself more familiarly, and with greater simplicity pours forth its petitions, groans, cares, fears, hopes, and joys, into the bosom of that God." Christ has hereby taught us, that secret prayer must be made secretly. Yet some think, that even the disciples, whom he left at the garden door, overheard him; for it is said, Heb. v. 7, they were strong cries.

Secondly. His posture in prayer: he "fell on his face." His lying prostrate notes, 1. The agony he was in, and the extremity of his sorrow. Job, in great grief, fell on the ground; and great anguish is expressed by rolling in the dust, Mic. i. 10. 2. His humility in prayer. This posture was an expression of his ἐνλάβεια, his reverential fear, spoken of, Heb. v. 7, with which he offered up these prayers; and it was in the days of his flesh, in his estate of humiliation, to which hereby he accommodated himself.

Thirdly. The prayer itself, wherein we may observe three things:

1. The title he gives to God: "O my Father." As thick as the cloud was, he could see God as a Father through it. Note, In all our addresses to God, we should eye him as a Father, as our Father; and it is in a special manner comfortable to do so when we are in an agony. It is a pleasing string to harp upon at such a time, "my Father;" whether should the child go when any thing grieves him but to his father?

2. The favour he begs: "If it be possible, let this cup pass from me." He calls his sufferings a cup,—not a river, not a sea, but a cup, which we shall soon see the bottom of. When we are under troubles, we should make the best, the least of them, and not aggravate them. A cup, because allotted him, as at feasts a cup was set to every mess. He begs this cup might pass from him, that is, that he might avoid the sufferings now at hand, or at least that they might be shortened. This speaks no more but that he was really and truly man, and as a man he could not but be averse to pain and suffering: this is the first and simple act of man's will, to start back from that which is sensibly grievous to us, and to desire the prevention and removal of it. The law of self-preservation is impressed upon the innocent nature of man, and rules there till overruled by some other law; therefore Christ admitted and expressed a reluctance to sufferings, to shew that he was taken from among men, Heb. v. 1, was touched with the feeling of our infirmities, Heb. iv. 15, and tempted as we are, yet without sin. Note, A prayer of faith, against an affliction, may very well consist with the patience of hope under an affliction. When David had said, "I was dumb, I opened not my mouth, because thou didst it;" yet his very next words are, "remove thy stroke away from me," Ps. xxxix. 9, 10. But observe the proviso, "if it be possible." If God may be glorified, man saved, and the ends of his undertaking answered without his drinking of this bitter cup, he desires to be excused; otherwise, not. What we cannot do with the securing our great end, we must reckon to be in effect impossible; Christ did so. Id possumus quod iure possumus,—"we can do that which we can do lawfully." We can do nothing, not only we may do nothing against the truth.

3. His entire submission to, and acquiescence in, the will of God, however: "Nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt." Not that the human will of Christ was adverse, or averse to the Divine will, only in its first act diverse from it; to which, in the second act of the will, which compares and chooseth, he freely submits himself. Note, 1st. Our Lord Jesus, though he had a quick sense of the extreme bitterness of the sufferings he was to undergo, yet was good modern authorities. The phrase itself is one with which they had all been substantially familiar, because it is practically found in Exod. xxiv. 8. Besides, in the next sentence (verse 29) Jesus sweeps away every vestige of a reason for thinking it was literally his blood, by calling it "this fruit of the vine," which can only mean wine. The phrase "which is shed" is probably the Aramaic idiom, and should be rendered "which is to be shed," or even "will be shed."

xxvi. 30. The hymn, as it is called, was in all probability one of the psalms which the Jews sung at the Passover.

xxvi. 31. "All ye shall be offended" means "all of you will stumble in your allegiance, and become backsliders and deserters." The Old Testament text quoted is found in Zech. xiii. 7, which should be studied with chap. xi. 7-14 of the same book.

xxvi. 34. Although we may translate here "before the cock crows," it is to be noted that the word "cock-crow" denoted a freely willing to submit to them for our redemption and salvation, and offered himself, and gave himself for us. 2nd. The reason of Christ's submission to his sufferings, was his Father's will; "as thou wilt, as thou wilt," ver. 39. He grounds his own willingness upon the Father's will, and resolves the matter wholly into that; therefore he did what he did, and did it with delight, because it was the will of God, Ps. xl. 7. This he had often referred to as that which put him upon, and carried him through, his whole undertaking; "this is the Father's will," Jno. vi. 39, 40; this he sought, Jno. v. 30; it was his meat and drink to do it, Jno. iv. 39. 3rd. In conformity to this example of Christ, we must drink of the bitter cup which God puts into our hands, be it never so bitter; though nature struggle, grace must submit. We then are spirited as Christ was, when our wills are in every thing melted into the will of God, though never so displeasing to flesh and blood; "the will of the Lord be done," Acts xxi. 14.

4. The repetition of the prayer. "He went away again the second time and prayed," ver. 42; and again, the third time, ver. 44, and all to the same purpose; only, as it is related here, he did not in the second and third prayer expressly ask that the cup might pass from him, as he had done in the first. Note, Though we may pray to God to prevent and remove an affliction, yet our chief errand, and that which we should most insist upon, must be, that he will give us grace to bear it well. It should be more our care to get our troubles sanctified, and our hearts satisfied under them, than to get them taken away. "He prayed, saying, Thy will be done." Note, Prayer is the offering up, not only of our desires, but of our resignations, to God. It amounts to an acceptable prayer, when at any time we are in distress, to refer ourselves to God, and to commit our way and work to him. "Thy will be done;" the third time he said "the same words;" τον αυτου λογον, "the same word," that is, the same matter or argument; he spoke to the same purpose; we have reason to think this was not all he said, for it should seem by ver. 40, that he continued an hour in his agony and prayer; but whatever more he said, it was to this effect, resenting his approaching sufferings, and yet resigning himself to God's will in them: in the expressions of which, we may be sure he was not straitened.

But what answer had he to this prayer? For certain it was not made in vain; He that heard him always, did not deny him now; it is true the cup did not pass from him, for he withdrew that petition, and did not insist upon it, (if he had, for aught I know, the cup had passed away;) but he had an answer to his prayer, for, 1st. He was strengthened with strength in his soul, in the day when he cried, Ps. cxxxviii. 3; and that was a real answer, Lu. xxii. 43. 2nd. He was delivered from that which he feared, which was, lest by impatience and distrust he should offend his Father, and so disable himself to go on with his undertaking, Heb. v. 7. In answer to his prayer, God provided that he should not fail, or be discouraged.

VI. What passed between him and his three disciples at this time; and there we may observe,

First. The fault they were guilty of: that when he was in his agony, sorrowful and heavy, sweating, and wrestling, and praying, they were so little concerned that they could not keep awake; he comes and finds them asleep, ver. 40. The strangeness of the thing should have roused their spirits to turn aside now and see this great sight, the bush burning, and yet not consumed; much more should their love to their Master, and their care concerning him, have obliged them to a more close and vigilant attendance on him; yet they were so dull that they could not keep their eyes open. What had become of us, if Christ had been now as sleepy as his disciples were? It is well for us that our salvation is in the hand of one who neither slumbers nor sleeps. Christ bespoke them to watch with him, as if he expected some succour from them, and yet they slept; surely it was the unkindest thing that could be. When David wept at this mount of Olives, all his followers wept with him, 2 Sam. xv. 30, but when the Son of David was here in tears, his followers were asleep; his enemies that watched for him were wakeful enough, Mar. xiv. 23; but his disciples, that should have watched with him, were asleep. Lord, what is man? What are the best of men, when God leaves them to themselves? Note, Carelessness and carnal security, especially when Christ is in his agony, is a great fault in any, but especially in those who profess to be nearest in relation to him. The church of Christ, which is his body, is often in an agony; fightings without, and fears within; and shall we be asleep then, like Gallos, that cared for none of these things; or those, Am. vi. 6, that lay at ease, and were not grieved for the affliction of Joseph?

Secondly. Christ's favour to them notwithstanding. Persons in sorrow are too apt to be cross and peevish with those about them, and to take it very heinously if they but seem to neglect them; but Christ in his agony is as meek as ever, and carries it as patiently towards his followers as towards his Father, and is not apt to take things ill. When Christ's disciples put this slight upon him,

1. He came to them, as if he expected to receive some comfort from them; and if they had put him in mind of what they had heard from him concerning his resurrection and glory, perhaps it might have been some help to him; but instead of that they added grief to his sorrow; and yet he came to them; more careful for them than they were for themselves; when he was most engaged, yet he came to look after them: for those that were given him were upon his heart, living and dying.

2. He gave them a gentle reproof, for as many as he loves he rebukes; he directed it to Peter, who used to speak for them; let him now hear for them. The reproof was very melting. "What, could ye not watch with me one hour? He speaks as one amazed to see them so stupid; every word is aggravating, if it were prosecuted. Consider, 1st. Who they were, "Could not ye watch?" "Ye, my disciples and followers; no wonder if others neglect me, if the earth sit still, and be at rest, Eccl. i. 11; but from you I expected better things." 2nd. Who he was, "watch with me;" if one of yourselves were ill, and in an agony, it would be very unkind not to watch with him; but it is unkindful not to watch with your Master, who has long watched over you for good; has led you, and fed you, and taught you; borne you, and borne with you: do you thus requite him? He awoke out of his sleep to help them when they were in distress, Mat. viii. 26; and could not they keep awake, at least to shew their goodwill to him, especially considering that he was now suffering for them, in an agony for them? Jam tua res agitur, "I am suffering in your cause." 3rd. How small a thing it was that he expected from them, only to watch with him; if he had bid them do some great thing; had bid them be in an agony with him, or die with him, they thought they could have done it, and yet they could not do it when he only desired them to watch with him, 2 Kin. v. 13. 4th. How short a time it was that he expected it, but one hour; they were not set upon the guard whole nights, as the prophet was, Isa. xxi. 8, only one hour. Sometimes he "continued all night in prayer to God," but did not then expect his disciples should watch with him; only now, when he had but one hour to spend in prayer.

3. He gave them good counsel: "Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation," ver. 41. 1st. There was an hour of temptation drawing on, and very near; the troubles of Christ were temptations to his followers to disbelieve and distrust him, to deny and desert him, and renounce all relation to him, certain hour. Dr. Kitto correctly says it has been objected that there were no cocks kept in Jerusalem, lest their habits of scratching among rubbish, &c., should expose the holy food to pollution. It has been shown that fowls were actually kept in Jerusalem; and Lightfoot quotes the Jerusalem Talmud for a story of a cock which was put to death by stoning, at the sentence of the council, for having killed a little child.

xxvi. 36. Gethsemane is a word meaning oil-press or oil-gardens,

2nd. There was danger of their entering into the temptation, as into a snare or trap; of their entering into a parley with it, or a good opinion of it, of their being influenced by it, and inclining to comply with it; which is the first step towards being overcome by it. 3rd. He therefore exhorts them to watch and pray: "Watch with me, and pray with me;" while they were sleeping they lost the benefit of joining in Christ's prayer. "Watch yourselves, and pray yourselves; watch and pray against this present temptation to drowsiness and security; pray that you may watch; beg of God by his grace to keep you awake now there is occasion." When we are drowsy in the worship of God, we should pray, as a good Christian once did, "The Lord deliver me from this sleepy devil!" Lord, quicken thou me in thy way. Or, "Watch and pray against the further temptation you will be assaulted with; watch and pray, lest this sin prove the inlet of many more." Note, When we find ourselves entering into temptation, we have need to watch and pray.

4. He kindly excused for them: "The spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak." We do not read of one word they had to say for themselves; sense of their own weakness stopped their mouth; but then he had a tender word to say on their behalf, for it is his office to be an advocate; in this he sets us an example of that love which "covers a multitude of sins." He considered their frame and did not chide them; for he remembered that they were but flesh, and the flesh is weak, though the spirit be willing, Ps. lxxviii. 38. Note, 1st. Christ's disciples, as long as they are here in this world, have bodies as well as souls, and a principle of remaining corruption, as well as of reigning grace; like Jacob and Esau in the same womb, Canaanites and Israelites in the same land, Gal. v. 17-24. 2nd. It is the unhappiness and burthen of Christ's disciples, that their bodies cannot keep pace with their souls in works of piety and devotion, but are many a time a cloud and clog to them: that when the spirit is free, and disposed to that which is good, the flesh is averse and indisposed. This St. Paul laments, Rom. vii. 22: "With my mind I serve the law of God, but with my flesh the law of sin." Our impotency in the service of God, is the great iniquity and infidelity of our nature, and it ariseth from these sad remainders of corruption, which are the constant grief and burthen of God's people. 3rd. Yet it is our comfort that our Master graciously considers this, and accepts the willingness of the spirit, and pities and pardons the weakness and infirmity of the flesh; for we are under grace and not under the law.

5. Though they continued dull and sleepy, he did not any further rebuke them for it; for though we daily offend, yet he will not always chide. 1st. When he came to them the second time, we do not find that he said anything to them, ver. 43; he findeth them asleep again. One would have thought he had said enough to them to keep them awake; but it is hard to recover from a spirit of slumber: carnal security, when once it prevails, is not easily shaken off. "Their eyes were heavy," which intimates that they strove against it as much as they could, but were overcome by it; like the spouse, "I sleep, but my heart wakes," Cant. v. 2; and therefore their Master looked upon them with compassion. 2nd. When he came to them the third time he left them to be alarmed with the approaching danger, ver. 45, 46: "Sleep on now, and take your rest." This is spoken ironically; "now sleep if you can, sleep if you dare; I would not disturb you, if Judas and his band of men would not." See here how Christ deals with those that suffer themselves to be overcome by security, and will not be awakened out of it. First. Sometimes he gives them up to the power of it; "sleep on now;" he that will sleep, let him sleep still. The curse of spiritual slumber is the just punishment of the sin of it, Rom. xi. 8; Hos. iv. 17. Secondly. Many times he sends some startling judgment to awaken those that would not be wrought upon by the Word; and those who will not be alarmed by reasons and arguments, had better be alarmed by swords and spears, than left to perish in their security. Let those that would not believe be made to feel.

As to the disciples here, 1st. Their Master gave them notice of the near approach of his enemies, who, it is likely, were now within sight or hearing, for they came with candles and torches, and it is likely made a great noise: "The Son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners;" and again, "He is at hand that doth betray me." Note, Christ's sufferings were no surprise to him, he knew what, and when he was to suffer. By this time the extremity of his agony was pretty well over, or at least diverted; while with an undaunted courage he addresseth himself to the next encounter, as a champion to the combat. 2nd. He called them to rise, and be going. Not rise and let us flee from the danger, but rise and let us go meet it; before he had prayed he feared his sufferings, but now has got over his fears, Eph. iv. 16. But, 3rd. He intimates to them their folly in sleeping away the time which they should have spent in preparation; and now it found them unready, and was a terror to them.

47 And while he yet spake, lo, Judas, one of the twelve, came, and with him a great multitude with swords and staves, from the chief priests and elders of the people. 48 Now he that betrayed him gave them a sign, saying, Whomsoever I shall kiss, that same is he: hold him fast. 49 And forthwith he came to Jesus, and said, Hail, master; and kissed him. 50 And Jesus said unto him, Friend, wherefore art thou come? Then came they, and laid hands on Jesus, and took him. 51 And, behold, one of them which were with Jesus stretched out his hand, and drew his sword, and struck a servant of the high priest's, and smote off his ear. 52 Then said Jesus unto him, Put up again thy sword into his place: for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword. 53 Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to my Father, and he shall presently give me more than twelve legions of angels? 54 But how then shall the scriptures be fulfilled, that thus it must be? 55 In that same hour said Jesus to the multitudes, Are no doubt because of the olive-trees which equally gave name to the hill at the foot of which it was. It lay to the east of Jerusalem, on the western slope of the Mount of Olives. The traditional site still bears several olive-trees of great antiquity. Dean Stanley calls these trees "the most venerable of their race on the face of the earth," though their real age is unknown. On this point Dr. Tristram, a most careful observer, says, "There is nothing in their venerable appearance to throw doubt on their antiquity, for they ye come out as against a thief with swords and staves for to take me? I sat daily with you teaching in the temple, and ye laid no hold on me. 56 But all this was done, that the scriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled. Then all the disciples forsook him, and fled.

We are here told how the blessed Jesus was seized, and taken into custody; this followed immediately upon his agony, "while he yet spake;" for from the beginning to the close of his passion, he had not the least intermission, or breathing time, but deep called unto deep. His trouble hitherto was raised within himself; but now the scene is changed, now the Philistines are upon thee, thou blessed Samson; "the breath of our nostrils, the anointed of the Lord is taken in their pits," Lam. iv. 20. Now concerning the apprehending of the Lord Jesus, observe,

I. Who the persons were that were employed in it. First. Here was "Judas, one of the twelve," in the head of this black guard. He "was guide to them that took Jesus," Acts i. 16; without his help they would not have found him in this retirement. Behold, and wonder; the first that appeared with his enemies is one of his own disciples, that an hour or two ago was eating bread with him!

Secondly. Here was "with him a great multitude," that the Scripture might be fulfilled, "Lord, how are they increased that trouble me!" Ps. iii. 1. This multitude was made up partly of a detachment out of the guards that were posted in the tower of Antonia by the Roman governor; these were Gentiles, sinners, as Christ calls them, ver. 45; partly of the servants and officers of the high priest, and they were Jews; they that were at variance with each other, agreed against Christ.

III. How they were armed for this enterprise. First. What weapons they were armed with: they came "with swords and staves." The Roman soldiers no doubt had swords; the servants of the priests, those of them that had not swords, brought staves, or clubs. Furor arma ministrat, "their rage supplied their arms." They were not regular troops, but a tumultuous rabble. But wherefore is this ado? If they had been ten times as many they could not have taken him, had he not yielded himself; and his hour being come for him to give up himself, all this force was needless. When a butcher goes into the field to take out a lamb for the slaughter, doth he use to raise the militia, and come armed? No, he needs not; yet is there all this force used to seize the Lamb of God.

Secondly. What warrant they were armed with: they came "from the chief priests and elders of the people;" this armed multitude was sent by them upon this errand. He was taken up by a warrant from the great sanhedrim, as a person obnoxious to them. Pilate, the Roman governor, gave them no warrant to search for him; he had no jealousy of him; but they were men who pretended to religion, and presided in the affairs of the church, that were active in this prosecution, and were the most spiteful enemies Christ had. It was a sign he was supported by a Divine power, for by all earthly powers he was not only deserted, but opposed; Pilate upbraided him with it, "Thine own nation, and the chief priests, delivered thee to me," Jno. xviii. 35.

III. The manner how it was done, and what passed at that time. First. How Judas betrayed him: he did his business effectually; and his resolution in this wickedness may shame us who fail in that which is good. Observe,

1. The instructions he gave to the soldiers, ver. 48: he "gave them a sign;" as commander of the party in this action he gives the word, or signal. He "gave them a sign," lest by mistake they should seize one of the disciples instead of him, who had so lately said in Judas's hearing, they would be willing to die for him; what abundance of caution was here not to miss him: "that same is he;" and when they had him in their hands, not to lose him, "hold him fast," for he had sometimes escaped from those who thought to secure him; as Lu. iv. 30. Though the Jews who frequented the temple could not but know him, yet the Roman soldiers perhaps had never seen him, and the sign was to direct them; and Judas, by his kiss, intended not only to distinguish him, but to detain him, while they came behind him and laid hands on him.

2. The dissembling compliment he gave his Master. He came close up to Jesus; sure now, if ever, his wicked heart will relent; sure, when he comes to look him in the face, he will either be awed by the majesty, or charmed by the beauty of it. Dare he come into his very sight and presence to betray him? Peter denied Christ, but when the Lord turned and looked upon him, he repented presently; but Judas comes up to his Master's face and betrays him. Me mihi (perfidie) prodixit? ne mihi prodixit? "Perfidious man! betrayest thou me to thyself?" He said, "Hail, Master, and kissed him." It should seem our Lord Jesus had been wont to admit his disciples to such a degree of familiarity with him, as to give them his cheek to kiss, after they had been any while absent, which Judas villainously used to facilitate his treason. A kiss is a token of allegiance and duty, profaned this sacred sign to serve his purpose. Note, There are many that betray Christ with a kiss, and hail, Master; who, under pretence of doing him honour, betray and undermine the interests of his kingdom. Mel in ore, fel in corde; "honey in the mouth, gall in the heart;" καταβόλουν οὐκ ἐντι φίλῳ, "to embrace is one thing, to kill is another."—Philo-Jud. Job's kiss and Judas's were much alike.

3. The entertainment his Master gave him, ver. 50. 1st. He calls him "friend." If he had called him villain and traitor, race, and thou fool, and child of the devil, he had not miscalled him; but he would teach us under the greatest provocation to forbear bitterness and evil speaking, and to shew all meekness. "Friend," for a friend he had been, and should have been, and seemed to be: thus he upbraids him, as Abraham, when he called the rich man in hell "son." He calls him friend, because he furthered his sufferings, and so befriended him, whereas he called Peter Satan, for attempting to hinder them.

2nd. He asks him, "Wherefore art thou come?" Is it peace, Judas? explain thyself; if thou come as an enemy, what means this kiss? If as a friend, what mean these swords and staves? Wherefore art thou come? What harm have I done thee? Wherein have I wearied thee? εἰς τί με κάλεσας, "Wherefore art thou present?" Why hadst thou not so much shame left thee as to keep out of sight, which thou mightest have done, and yet have given the officers notice where I was? This was an instance of great impudence, for him to be so forward and barefaced in this ill thing. But it is usual for apostates from religion to be the most bitter enemies to it; witness Julian. Thus Judas did his part.

Secondly. How the officers and soldiers secured him: "Then came they and laid hands on Jesus, and took him;" they made him their prisoner. "How were they not afraid to stretch forth their hands against the Lord's anointed?"

must reckon many centuries; but we may be pretty certain that during the siege of Titus no trees were left standing so close to the city. Still, they may date from a period not much subsequent." They are now enclosed in a garden belonging to the monks.

xxvi. 42. This prayer is thus more correctly read: "O my Father, if this may not pass except I drink it, thy will be done."

xxvi. 47. From the fact that the crowd was armed not only with swords but with sticks, it will be evident they were not all soldiers.

We may well imagine what rude and cruel hands they were which this barbarous multitude laid on Christ; and now it is probable they handled him the more roughly for their being so often disappointed, when they sought to lay hands on him. They could not have taken him, if he had not surrendered himself, and been "delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God," Acts ii. 23. He who said concerning his anointed servants, "Touch them not," and "do them no harm," Ps. cv. 14, 15, spared not his anointed Son, but "delivered him up for us all;" and again, "gave his strength into captivity, his glory into the enemies' hands," Ps. lxxviii. 61. See what was the complaint of Job, xvi. 11, "God hath delivered me to the ungodly," and apply that, and other passages in that book, to Job as a type of Christ.

Our Lord Jesus was made a prisoner, because he would in all things be treated as a malefactor, punished for our crime, and as a surety under arrest for our debt. The yoke of our transgressions was bound by the Father's hand upon the neck of the Lord Jesus, Lam. i. 14. He became a prisoner that he might set us at liberty; for he said, "If ye seek me, let these go their way," Jno. xviii. 8. And those are free indeed whom he makes so.

Thirdly. How Peter fought for Christ, and was checked for his pains. It is here only said to be "one of them which were with Jesus" in the garden, but, Jno. xviii. 10, we are told it was Peter who signalized himself upon this occasion. Observe,

1. Peter's rashness, ver. 51: he "drew his sword." They had but two swords among them all, Lu. xxii. 38, and one of them, it seems, fell to Peter's share; and now he thought it was time to draw it, and he laid about him as if he would have done some great matters, but all the execution he did was the cutting off an ear from a servant of the high priest's, designing, it is likely, to cleave him down the head, because he saw him more forward than the rest in laying hands on Christ; he missed his blow. But, if he would be striking, in my mind he should rather have aimed at Judas, and have marked him for a rogue. Peter had talked much, and more what he would do, for his Master; he would lay down his life for him. Yea, that he would, and now he will be as good as his word, and venture his life to rescue his Master; and thus far was commendable, that he had a great zeal for Christ, and his honour and safety; but it was not according to knowledge, nor guided by discretion; for, 1st. He did it without warrant; some of the disciples asked indeed, "Shall we smite with the sword?" Lu. xxii. 49; but Peter struck before they had an answer. We must see, not only our cause good, but our call clear, before we draw the sword; and be able to shew by what authority we do it, and who gave us that authority. 2nd. He indiscreetly exposed himself and his fellow disciples to the rage of the multitude; for what could they, with two swords, do against a band of men?

2. The rebuke which our Lord Jesus gave him, ver. 52: "Put up again thy sword into his place." He doth not command the officers and soldiers to put up the swords that were drawn against him; he left them to the judgment of God, who judges them that are without, but commands Peter to put up his sword; doth not chide him for what he had done, because done out of good-will, but stops the progress of his arms, and provides that it should not be drawn into a precedent. Christ's errand into the world was to make peace. Note, "The weapons of our warfare are not carnal," but spiritual; and Christ's ministers, though they are his soldiers, yet do not war after the flesh, 2 Cor. x. 3, 4. Not that the law of Christ overthrows either the law of nature or the laws of nations, as far as those warrant subjects to stand up in defence of their civil rights and liberties, and their religion, when it is incorporated with them, but it provides for the preservation of public peace and order, by forbidding private persons, qua tales,—"as such," to resist the powers that be; nay, we have a general precept that we "resist not evil," ch. v. 39; nor will Christ have his ministers propagate his religion by force and arms. Religio cogi non potest, et defendenda non occidendo sed moriendo,—"religion cannot be forced; and it should be defended, not by killing, but by dying."—Lactant. Inst. As Christ forbade his disciples the sword of justice, ch. xx. 25, 26, so here the sword of war. Christ bade Peter put up his sword, and never bade him draw it again; yet that which Peter is here blamed for is his doing it unseasonably; the hour was come for Christ to suffer and die; he knew, Peter knew it; the sword of the Lord was drawn against him, Zec. xiii. 7; and for Peter to draw his sword for him was like "Master, spare thyself."

Three reasons Christ gives to Peter for this rebuke:

1st. His drawing the sword would be dangerous to himself,—to his fellow-disciples: "They that take the sword shall perish with the sword;" they that use violence fall by violence; and men hasten and increase their own troubles by blustering, bloody methods of self-defence; they that take the sword before it is given them, that use it without warrant or call, expose themselves to the sword of war, or public justice. Had it not been for the special care and providence of the Lord Jesus, Peter and the rest of them had, for aught I know, been cut in pieces presently. Grotius gives another, and a probable sense of this blow, making those "that take the sword" to be, not Peter, but the officers and soldiers that came with swords to take Christ; they "shall perish with the sword;" "Peter, thou needest not draw thy sword to punish them, God will certainly, shortly, and severely reckon with them." They took the Roman sword to seize Christ with, and by the Roman sword, not long after, they and their place and nation were destroyed. Therefore we must not avenge ourselves, because God will repay, Rom. xii. 19; and therefore suffer with faith and patience, because persecutors will be paid in their own coin. See Rev. xiii. 10.

2nd. It was needless for him to draw his sword in defence of his Master, who, if he pleased, could summon into his service all the hosts of heaven, ver. 53: "Thouakest thou that I cannot now pray to my Father," and he shall send from heaven effectual succours? "Peter, if I would put by these sufferings, I could easily do it without thy hand or thy sword." Note, God has no need of us, of our services, much less of our sins, to bring about his purposes; and it argues our distrust and disbelief of the power of Christ when we go out of the way of our duty to serve his interests. God can do his work without us; if we look into the heavens and see how he is attended there, we may easily infer, that though we be righteous, he is not beholden to us, Job xxxv. 5-7. Though Christ "was crucified through weakness," it was a voluntary weakness; he submitted to death not because he could not, but because he would not, contend with it. This takes off the offence of the cross, and proves Christ crucified the power of God; even now, in the depth of his sufferings, he could call in the aid of legions of angels. Now, apud,—"yet," though the business is so far gone, I could yet with a word speaking turn the scale. Christ here lets us know,

First, What a great interest he had in his Father: "I can pray to my Father," and he will send me help from the sanctuary. I can, κατακαίρειν,—"demand of my Father these succours;" Christ prayed "as one having authority." Note, it is a great comfort to God's people, when they are surrounded with enemies on all hands, that they have a way open heavenwards; if they can do nothing else, they can pray to him that can do everything; and they who are much in prayer at other times, have most comfort in prayer when troublesome times come. Observe, Christ saith, not only that God could send him such a number of angels, but that if he insisted upon it he would do it: though he had undertaken the work of our redemption, yet if he had desired xxvi. 51. As is well known, it was Peter who betook himself to the sword to repel the attack, and Malchus was the name of the man whom he wounded. The word for sword very often signifies a knife, but it also has the sense of dagger and sword, as it may have here.

xxvi. 52. These words have been regarded as a prediction of the impending ruin of the Jews. They may also be taken as a general maxim, the sense of which is that all who use violence will be exposed to peril and harm. Watson thinks the words most naturally o be released, it should seem by this, the Father would not have held him to it; he might yet have gone out free from the service, but he loved it, and would not; so that it was only with the cords of his own love that he was bound to the altar.

Secondly. What a great interest he had in the heavenly hosts: "He shall presently give me more than twelve legions of angels," amounting to above seventy-two thousand. Observe here, 1st. There is "an innumerable company of angels," Heb. xii. 22. A detachment of more than twelve legions might be spared for our service, and yet no miss of them from about the throne. See Dan. vii. 10. They are marshalled in exact order, like the well-disciplined legions; not a confused multitude, but regular troops; all know their post, and observe the word of command. 2nd. This innumerable company of angels are all at the dispose of our heavenly Father, and do his pleasure, Ps. ciii. 20, 21. 3rd. These angelic hosts were ready to come in to the assistance of our Lord Jesus in his sufferings, if he had needed or desired it. See Heb. i. 6-14. They would have been to him as they were to Elisha, "Chariots of fire, and horses of fire," not only to secure him, but to consume those that set upon him. 4th. Our heavenly Father is to be eyed and acknowledged in all the services of the heavenly hosts; "He shall give them me," therefore angels are not to be prayed to, but the Lord of the angels, Ps. xci. 11. 5th. It is matter of comfort to all that wish well to the kingdom of Christ, that there is a world of angels always at the service of the Lord Jesus, that can do wonders. He that has the armies of heaven at his beck, can do what he pleases among the inhabitants of the earth; He shall presently give them me. See how ready his Father was to hear his prayer, and how ready the angels were to observe orders; they are willing servants, winged messengers, they fly swiftly. This is very encouraging to those that have the honour of Christ and the welfare of his church much at heart; think they that they have more care and concern for Christ and his church than God and the holy angels have?

3rd. It was no time to make any defence at all, or to offer to put by the stroke, for "how then shall the Scriptures be fulfilled, that thus it must be?" ver. 54. It was written that Christ should be "led as a lamb to the slaughter," Isa. liii. 7. Should he summon the angels to his assistance he would not be led to the slaughter at all; should he permit his disciples to fight, he would not be led as a lamb, quietly, and without resistance; therefore he and his disciples must yield to the accomplishment of the predictions. Note, In all difficult cases the Word of God must be conclusive against our own counsels; and nothing must be done, nothing attempted against the fulfilling of the Scripture; if the easing of our pains, the breaking of our bonds, the saving of our lives, will not consist with the fulfilling of the Scripture, we ought to say, Let God's word and will take place, let his law be magnified and made honourable, whatever becomes of us. Thus Christ checked Peter, when he set up for his champion and captain of his life-guard.

IV. We are next told how Christ argued the case with them that came to take him, ver. 55; though he did not resist them, yet he did reason with them. Note, It will consist with Christian silence under our sufferings, calmly to expostulate with our enemies and persecutors, as David with Saul, 1 Sam. xxiv. 14-26, 18: "Are ye come out,"

First, With rage and enmity, "as against a thief;" as if I were an enemy to the public safety, and deservedly suffered this. Thieves draw upon themselves the common odium, every one will lend a hand to stop a thief; and thus they fell upon Christ as the outscouring of all things. If he had been the plague of his country, he could not have been prosecuted with more heat and violence.

Secondly. With all this power and force, as against the worst of thieves, that dare the law, bid defiance to public justice, and add rebellion to their sin; you are come out as against a thief, with swords and staves, as if there were danger of resistance; whereas ye have killed the just one, and he doth not resist you, Isa. v. 6. If he had not been willing to suffer, it was folly to come with swords and staves, for they could not conquer him; had he been minded to resist, he would have esteemed their iron as straw, and their swords and staves would have been as briars before a consuming fire; but being willing to suffer, it was folly to come thus armed, for he would not contend with them.

He further expostulates with them, by minding them how he had behaved himself hitherto towards them, and they towards him: 1. Of his public appearance, "I sat daily with you in the temple teaching;" and, 2. Of their public connivance, "Ye laid no hold on me,"—how comes then this change? They were very unreasonable in treating him as they did: 1st. He had given them no occasion to look upon him as a thief, for he had taught in the temple; and such was the matter and such the manner of his teaching, that he was manifested in the consciences of all that heard him, not to be an ill man. Such gracious words as came from his mouth were not the words of a thief, or one that had a devil. 2nd. Nor had he given them occasion to look upon him as one that absconded or fled from justice, that they should come in the night to seize him; if they had any thing to say to him they might find him every day in the temple, ready to answer all challenges, all charges; and there they might do as they pleased with him, for the chief priests had the custody of the temple, and the command of the guards about it; but to come upon him thus clandestinely in the place of his retirement, was base and cowardly. Thus the greatest hero may be villainously assassinated in a corner, by one that in open field would tremble to look him in the face.

"But all this was done" (so it follows, ver. 56,) "that the Scriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled." It is hard to say whether these are the words of the sacred historian, as a comment upon this story, and a direction to the Christian reader to compare it with the Scriptures of the Old Testament, which pointed at it; or whether they are the words of Christ himself, as a reason why, though he could not but resent this base treatment, yet he submitted to it, that the Scriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled, to which he had just now referred himself, ver. 54. Note, The Scriptures are in the fulfilling every day; and all those Scriptures which spake of the Messiah had their full accomplishment in our Lord Jesus.

V. How he was, in the midst of this distress, shamefully deserted by his disciples: "They all forsook him and fled."

First, This was their sin, and it was a great sin, for them who had left all to follow him, now to leave him, for they knew not what. There was unkindness in it, considering the relation they stood in to him, the favours they had received from him, and the melancholy circumstances he was now in. There was unfaithfulness in it, for they had solemnly promised to stick to him, and never to forsake him. He had indented for their safe conduct, Jno. xviii. 18, yet they could not rely upon that, but shifted for themselves by an inglorious flight. What folly was this, for fear of death to flee from Him whom they themselves knew and had acknowledged to be the fountain of life! Jno. vi. 67, 68. "Lord, what is man?"

Secondly. It was a part of Christ's suffering; it added affliction to his bonds to be thus deserted, as it did to Job, ch. xix. 13, "He hath put my brethren far from me," and to David, Ps. xxxviii. 11, "Lovers and friends stand aloof from my sore." They should have stayed with him, to minister to him, to countenance him, and, if need were, to be witnesses for him at his trial; but they treacherously deserted him, as at St. Paul's first answer, no man stood with him. But there was a mystery in this: 1. Christ, as a sacrifice for sins, stood thus abandoned. The deer, that by the keeper's arrow is marked out to be hunted and run down, is immediately deserted by the whole herd. In this he was made a curse for us, being left as one separated to evil. 2. Christ, as the Saviour of souls, stood thus alone; as he needed not, so he had not the assistance of any other in working out our salvation: he bore all, and did all himself; he trod the wine press alone, and when, to admiration, there was none to uphold, then his own arm wrought salvation, Isa. lxiii. 3, 5. So the Lord alone did lead his Israel, and they stand still and only see this great salvation, Deu. xxxii. 12.

57 And they that had laid hold on Jesus led him away to Caiaphas the high priest, where the scribes and the elders were assembled. 58 But Peter followed him afar off unto the high priest's palace, and went in, and sat with the servants, to see the end. 59 Now the chief priests, and elders, and all the council, sought false witness against Jesus, to put him to death; 60 But found none: yea, though many false witnesses came, yet found they none. At the last came two false witnesses, 61 And said, This fellow said, I am able to destroy the temple of God, and to build it in three days. 62 And the high priest arose, and said unto him, Answerest thou nothing? what is it which these witness against thee? 63 But Jesus held his peace. And the high priest answered and said unto him, I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ, the Son of God. 64 Jesus saith unto him, Thou hast said: nevertheless I say unto you, Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven. 65 Then the high priest rent his clothes, saying, He hath spoken blasphemy; what further need have we of witnesses? behold, now ye have heard his blasphemy. 66 What think ye? They answered and said, He is guilty of death. 67 Then did they spit in his face, and buffeted him; and others smote him with the palms of their hands, 68 Saying, Prophecy unto us, thou Christ, Who is he that smote thee?

We have here the arraignment of our Lord Jesus in the ecclesiastical court, before the great sanhedrim. Observe,

First, The sitting of the court: "The scribes and the elders were assembled," though it was in the dead time of the night, when other people were fast asleep in their beds; yet to gratify their malice against Christ, they denied themselves that natural rest, and sat up all night, to be ready to fall upon the prey which Judas and his men, they hoped, would seize. See,

1. Who they were that were assembled: the scribes, the principal teachers, and the elders, the principal rulers, of the Jewish church. These were the most bitter enemies to Christ, our great teacher and ruler, on whom therefore they had a jealous eye, as one that eclipsed them; perhaps some of these scribes and elders were not so malicious at Christ, as some others of them were, yet in concurrence with the rest, they made themselves guilty. Now the scripture was fulfilled, Ps. xxii. 16, "The assembly of the wicked have enclosed me." Jeremiah complains of an assembly of treacherous men; and David, of his enemies' gathering themselves together against him, Ps. xxxv. 15.

2. Where they were assembled: in the palace of Caiaphas the high priest; there they were assembled two days before to lay the plot, ver. 3, and there they now convened again to prosecute it. The high priest was Ab-beth-din, 'the father of the house of judgment,' but is now the patron of wickedness; his house should have been the sanctuary of oppressed innocence, but is become the throne of iniquity; and no wonder, when even God's house of prayer was made a den of thieves.

Secondly. The setting of the Prisoner at the bar: "They that had laid hold on Jesus, led him away;" hurried him, no doubt, with violence; led him as a trophy of their victory, led him as a victim to the altar. He was brought into Jerusalem through that which was called the sheep gate, for that was the way into town from the mount of Olives, and it was so called because the sheep appointed for sacrifice were brought, that way to the temple; very fitly therefore is Christ led that way, who is "the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world." Christ was led first to the high priest, for by the law all sacrifices were to be first presented to the priest, and delivered into his hand, Lev. xvi. 5.

Thirdly, The cowardice and faint-heartedness of Peter, ver. 58: "But Peter followed afar off." This comes in here with an eye to the following story of his denying him. He forsook him, as the rest did, when he was seized; and what is here said of his following him is easily reconcilable with his forsaking him; such following was no better than forsaking him; for,

1. He followed him, but it was afar off. Some sparks of love and concern for his Master there were in his breast, and therefore he followed him; but fear and concern for his own safety prevailed, and therefore he followed afar off.

refer to Peter, who was reproved for using force, by the general principle laid down, that all who took the sword, meaning as he took it, should perish by it. The expression intimates that our Lord did not desire armed intervention on behalf of himself or his cause.

xxvi. 53. Two Roman legions constituted a consular army. A legion consisted of five or six thousand, though the number varied according to circumstances. The men were heavy-armed foot soldiers drawn from the Roman citizens, who were augmented by at least as many auxiliaries and a cavalry detachment three hundred strong. Hence the effective force of a legion in the field is usually reckoned at ten thousand men, at the least. The word legion, however, was conventionally used of any large but indefinite number.

xxvi. 58. The word "palace," both here and in verse 3, signifies a court or courtyard, which was probably open at the top. The servants were the officials employed by the high-priest, and not merely the ordinary domestics of his household establishment.

Note, It looks ill, and bodes worse, when those that are willing to be Christ's disciples, yet are not willing to be known to be so. Here began Peter's denying him; for to follow him afar off, in little and little, to go back from him. There is danger in drawing back, nay, in looking back.

2. He followed him, but he "went in and sat with the servants." He should have gone up to the court, and attended on his Master, and appeared for him; but he went in where there was a good fire, "and sat with the servants," not to silence their reproaches, but to screen himself. It was presumption in Peter thus to thrust himself into temptation; he that doth so throws himself out of God's protection. Christ had told Peter he could not follow him now, and had particularly warned him of his danger this night; and yet he would venture into the midst of this wicked crew. It helped David to walk in his integrity, that he hated the congregation of evil doers, and would not sit with the wicked.

3. He followed him, but it was only "to see the end," led more by his curiosity than by his conscience; he attended as an idle spectator rather than a disciple, a person concerned. He should have gone in to do Christ some service, or to get some wisdom and grace to himself, by observing Christ's behaviour under his sufferings; but he went in only to look about him. It is not unlikely that Peter went in expecting that Christ would have made his escape miraculously out of the hands of his persecutors; that having so lately struck them down who came to seize him, he would now have struck them dead who sat to judge him; and this he had a mind to see: if so, it was folly for him to think of seeing any other end than what Christ had foretold, that he should be put to death. Note, It is more our concern to prepare for the end, whatever it may be, than curiously to inquire what the end will be. The event is God's, but the duty is ours.

Fourthly. The trial of our Lord Jesus in this court.

1. They examined witnesses against him: though they were resolved, right or wrong, to condemn him, yet, to put the better colour upon it, they would produce evidence against him. The crimes properly punishable in their court were false doctrine and blasphemy; these they endeavoured to prove upon him. And observe here,

1st. Their search for proof; they "sought false witness against him." They had seized him, bound him, abused him, and, after all, are to seek for something to lay to his charge, and can show no cause for his commitment. They tried if any of them could allege, seemingly from their own knowledge, any thing against him; and suggested one calumny, and then another, which, if true, might touch his life. Thus evil men dig up mischief, Pr. xvi. 27. Here they trod in the steps of their predecessors, who devised devices against Jeremiah, Jer. xviii. 18; xx. 10. They made proclamation, that if any one could give information against the prisoner at the bar, they were ready to receive it; and presently many bore false witness against him, ver. 60; for "if a ruler hearken to lies, all his servants are wicked," and will carry false stories to him, Pr. xxix. 12. This is an evil often seen under the sun, Ecc. x. 5. If Naboth must be taken off, there are sons of Belial to swear against him.

2nd. Their success in this search. In several attempts they were baffled; they sought false testimonies among themselves, others came in to help them, and yet they found none; they could make nothing of it, could not tack the evidence together, or give it any colour of truth, or consistency with itself; no, not they, themselves being judges. The matters alleged were such palpable lies, as carried their own confutation along with them. This redounded much to the honour of Christ now, when they were loading him with disgrace. But at last they met with two witnesses, who it seems agreed in their evidence, and therefore were hearkened to, in hopes that now the point was gained. The words they swore against him were, that he should say, "I am able to destroy the temple of God, and to build it in three days," ver. 61. Now by this they designed to accuse him,

First. As an enemy to the temple, and one that sought for the destruction of it, which they could not bear to hear of; for they valued themselves by the temple of the Lord, Jer. vii. 4, and when they abandoned other idols, made a perfect idol of that. Stephen was accused for speaking "against this holy place," Acts vi. 13, 14.

Secondly. As one that dealt in witchcraft, or some such unlawful arts, by the help of which he could rear such a building in three days. They had often suggested that he was in league with Beelzebub; now as to this, 1st. The words were misquoted: he said, "Destroy ye this temple," Jno. ii. 19; plainly intimating that he spoke of a temple which his enemies would seek to destroy. They came and swear that he said, "I am able to destroy this temple," as if the design against it were his. He said, "In three days I will raise it up;" εγὼ οὖν αὐτὸν, ὡς ἔπος ἐστιν, ὡς ἔπος ἐστιν, ὡς ἔπος ἐστιν, a word properly used of a living temple, "I will raise it to life." They come and swear that he said, "I am able, οἰκοδομησάτω, 'to build it,' which is properly used of a house temple. 2nd. The words were misunderstood; "he spake of the temple of his body," Jno. ii. 21; and perhaps, when he said "this temple," pointed to, or laid his hand upon, his own body; but they swear that he said "the temple of God," meaning "this holy place." Note, There have been, and still are, such as wrest the sayings of Christ to their own destruction, 2 Pet. iii. 16.

Thirdly. Make the worst they could of it, it was no capital crime, even by their own law; if it had, no question but he had been prosecuted for it when he spoke the words, in a public discourse, some years ago; nay, the words were capable of a laudable construction, and such as spoke a kindness for the temple: if it were destroyed, he would exert himself to the utmost to rebuild it. But any thing that looked criminal would serve to give colour to their malicious prosecution. Now the Scriptures were fulfilled which said, "False witnesses are risen up against me," Ps. cxvii. 13; and see Ps. xxxv. 11; "Though I have redeemed them, they have spoken lies against me," Hos. vii. 13; we stand justly accused, the law accuseth us, Deut. xxvii. 26; Jno. v. 45; Satan and our own consciences accuse us, 1 Jno. iii. 20; the creatures cry against us: now to discharge us from all these just accusations, our Lord Jesus submitted to this, to be unjustly and falsely accused, that, in the virtue of his sufferings, we may be enabled to triumph over all challenges: "Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect?" Rom. viii. 33, 34. He was accused that we might not be condemned; and if at any time we suffer thus, have all manner of evil, not only said, but sworn, against us falsely, let us remember that we cannot expect to fare better than our Master.

3rd. Christ's silence under all these accusations, to the amazement of the court, ver. 62. The high priest, the judge of the court, arose in some heat, and said, "Answerest thou nothing?" "Come, you the prisoner at the bar, you hear what is sworn against you, what have you now to say for yourself? What defence can you make? or what pleas have you to offer in answer to this charge?" "But Jesus held his peace," ver. 63; not as one sullen, or as one self-condemned, or as one astonished and in confusion; not because he wanted something to say, or knew not how to say it; but that the Scripture might be fulfilled, Isa. liii. 7; as the sheep is dumb before the shearer and before the butcher, "so he opened not his mouth;" and that he might be the Son of David, who, when his enemies spake mischievous things against him, was "as a deaf man that heard not," Ps. xxxviii. 12-14. He was silent because his hour was come; he would not deny the charge, because he was willing to submit to the sentence, otherwise he could as easily have put them to silence and shame now as he had done many a time before. If God had entered into judgment with us, we had been speechless, ch. xxii. 12, not able to answer for one of a thousand, Job ix. 3. Therefore, when Christ was made sin for us, he was silent, and left it to his blood to speak, Heb. xii. 24. He stood mute at this bar, that we might have something to say at God's bar. Well, this way will not do; alta apprehendendum est,—recourse must be had to some other expedient.

2. They examined our Lord Jesus himself, upon an oath like that ex officio; and since they could not accuse him, they will try, contrary to the law of equity, to make him accuse himself.

1st. Here is the interrogatory put to him by the high priest. Observe, First. The question itself: "Whether thou be the Christ, the Son of God?" that is, "whether thou pretend to be so, for they will by no means admit it into consideration, whether he really be so or no; though the Messiah was to be the consolation of Israel, and glorious things were spoken concerning him in the Old Testament, yet so strangely besotted were they with a jealousy of any thing that threatened their exorbitant power and grandeur, that they would never enter into the examination of the matter, whether Jesus were the Messiah or not; never once put the case, suppose he should be so; only would have him confess that he called himself so, that they might on that indictment him as a deceiver. What will not pride and malice carry men to?"

Secondly. The solemnity of the proposal of it: "I adjure thee, by the living God, that thou tell us;" not that he had any regard to the living God, but took his name in vain; only thus he hoped to gain his point with our Lord Jesus. "If thou hast any value for the blessed name of God, and reverence for his Majesty, tell us this." If he should refuse to answer when he was thus adjured they would charge him with contempt of the blessed name of God. Thus the persecutors of good men often take advantage against them by their consciences, as Daniel's enemies did against him in the matter of his God.

2nd. Christ's answer to this interrogatory, ver. 64, in which, First. He owns himself to be "the Christ, the Son of God;" "Thou hast said," that is, "It is as thou hast said," for in Mark it is, "I am." Hitherto he seldom professed himself expressly to be the Christ, the Son of God; the tenor of his doctrine spoke it, and his miracles proved it; but now he would not omit to make a confession of it, 1st. Because that would have looked like a disowning of that truth which he came into the world to bear witness to. 2nd. It would have looked like declining his sufferings, when he knew the acknowledgment of this would give his enemies all the advantage they desired against him. He thus confessed himself, for example and encouragement to his followers, when they are called to it, to confess him before men, whatever hazards they run by it. And according to this pattern the martyrs readily confessed themselves Christians, though they knew they must die for it, as the martyrs at Thebais, Euseb. Hist. l. viii. c. 9. That Christ answered out of a regard to the adoration which Caiaphas had profanely used by the living God, I cannot think, any more than that he had any regard to the like adjuration in the devil's mouth, Mark v. 7.

Secondly. He refers himself for the proof of this to his second coming, and indeed to his whole estate of exaltation. It is probable they looked upon him with a scornful, disdainful smile, when he said, "I am;" a likely fellow, thought they, to be the Messiah, who is expected to come in so much pomp and power; and to that this "nevertheless" refers. "Though now you see me in this low and abject state, and think it a ridiculous thing for me to call myself the Messiah, nevertheless the day is coming when I shall appear otherwise."

Hereafter, ἀπ' ἄρτι, a modo,—shortly; for his exaltation began in a few days; now shortly his kingdom began to be set up; and "hereafter ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power," to judge the world, of which his coming shortly to judge and destroy the Jewish nation would be a type and earnest. Note, The terrors of the judgment day will be a sensible conviction to the most obstinate infidelity, not in order to conversion, that will be then too late, but in order to an eternal confusion. Observe, 1st. Whom they should see, "the Son of man." Having owned himself the Son of God, even now in his estate of humiliation, he speaks of himself as the Son of man, even in his estate of exaltation; for he had these two distinct natures in one person. The incarnation of Christ has made him Son of God and Son of man, for he is Immanuel, "God with us." 2nd. In what posture they should see him, 1. "Sitting on the right hand of power," according to the prophecy of the Messiah, Ps. cx. 1: "Sit thou at my right hand;" which notes both the dignity and the dominion he is exalted to. Though now he stood at the bar, they should shortly see him sit on the throne. 2. "Coming in the clouds of heaven." This refers to another prophecy concerning the Son of man, Dan. vii. 13, 14, which is applied to Christ, Lu. i. 33. When he came to destroy Jerusalem, so terrible was the judgment, and so sensible the indications of the wrath of the Lamb in it, that it might be called a visible appearance of Christ, but doubtless it has reference to the general judgment; to this day he appeals, and summons them to an appearance then and there, to answer for what they were now doing. He had spoken of this day to his disciples a while ago, for their comfort, and had bid them lift up their heads for joy in the prospect of it, Lu. xxi. 27, 28; now he speaks of it to his enemies for their terror; for nothing is more comfortable to the righteous, nor more terrible to the wicked, than Christ's judging the world at the last day.

Fifthly. His conviction upon this trial. "The high priest rent his clothes," according to the custom of the Jews, when they heard or saw any thing done or said which they looked upon to be a reproach to God, as Isa. xxxvi. 22; xxxvii. 1; Acts xiv. 14. Caiaphas would be thought extremely tender of the glory of God, "Come, see his zeal for the Lord of hosts," but while he pretended an abhorrence of blasphemy, he was himself the greatest blasphemer; he now forgot the law which forbade the high priest in any case to rend his clothes, unless we will suppose this an excepted case. Observe,

1. The crime he was found guilty of—blasphemy: "He hath spoken blasphemy," that is, he hath spoken reproachfully of the living God; that is the notion we have of blasphemy; because we by sin had reproached the Lord, therefore Christ, when he was made sin for us, was condemned as a blasphemer, for the truth he told them.

2. The evidence upon which they found him guilty: "Ye have heard the blasphemy," what need we trouble ourselves to examine witnesses any further? He owned the fact, that he did profess himself the Son of God, and then they made blasphemy of it, and convicted him upon his confession. The high priest triumphs in the success of the snare he had laid; "Now I think I have done his business for him: 'Aha, so would we have it.'" Thus was he judged out of his own mouth at their bar, because we were liable to be so judged at God's bar. No need of witnesses against us, our own consciences are against us instead of a thousand witnesses.

Sixthly. His sentence passed upon this conviction, ver. 66. Here is, 1. Caiaphas' appeal to the bench: "What think ye?" See his base hypocrisy and partiality, when he had already prejudged the cause, and pronounced him a blasphemer, then, as if he were willing to be advised, he asks the judgment of his brethren; but hide malice never so cunningly under the robe of justice, xxvi. 59. Although the evangelist here speaks of the chief priests in the plural, it will be noted that both before and after he speaks of Caiaphas as the high-priest. It is clear, therefore, that although, as noted previously, there were priests who were called chief priests by way of distinction, there was one who was usually high-priest in a peculiar sense. Under the Roman Government, when every office was venal, or a vehicle for favouritism, the high-priests were frequently changed, and hence "there were often living at the same time several who had filled the office. Of this a curious example occurs in the case of Annas, father of Caiaphas, mentioned in Luke iii. 2. It is further to be noted that the words "and elders" are omitted from this verse by some ancient manuscripts, as the Vatican, Sinaitic, Cambridge, &c.

xxvi. 60. There are various readings in this verse. The Sinaitic and Vatican copies read, "But found none, though many false witnesses came. At the last came two." It would appear that although some way or other it will break out. If he would have dealt fairly, he should have collected the votes of the bench seriatim,—'in order,' and begun with the junior, and have delivered his own opinion last; but he knew by the authority of his place he could sway the rest, and therefore declares his judgment, and presumes they are all of his mind: he takes the crime as to Christ, pro confesso,—'as a crime confessed,' and the judgment as to the court, pro concessa,—'as a judgment agreed to.'

2. Their concurrence with him. They said, "He is guilty of death." Perhaps they did not all concur; it is certain Joseph of Arimathea, if he was present, dissented, Lu. xxii. 51; so did Nicodemus, and, it is likely, others with them; however, the majority carried it that way: but perhaps this being an extraordinary council, or cabal, rather, none had notice to be present but such as they knew would concur, and so it might be voted nemine contradicente,—'unanimously.' The judgment was, "He is guilty of death," by the law he deserves to die. Though they had not power now to put any man to death, yet by such a judgment as this they made a man an outlaw among his people, (qui caput gerit lupinum,—'he carries a wolf's head;') so our old law describes an outlaw, and so expose him to the fury either of a popular tumult, as Stephen was, or to be clamoured against before the governor, as Christ was. Thus was the Lord of life condemned to die, that through him there may be no condemnation to us.

Seventhly. The abuses and indignities done to him after sentence passed, ver. 67, 68. "Then," when he was found guilty, "they spat in his face." Because they had not power to put him to death, and could not be sure they should prevail with the governor to be their executioner, they would do him all the mischief they could now they had him in their hands. Condemned prisoners are taken under the special protection of the law, which they are to make satisfaction to, and by all civilized nations have been treated with tenderness; sufficient is this punishment. But when they had passed sentence on our Lord Jesus, he was treated as if hell had broke loose upon him, as if he were not only worthy of death, but that were too good for him, and he were unworthy of the compassion shewn to the worst malefactors. Thus he was made a curse for us. But who were they that were thus barbarous? It should seem the very same that had passed sentence upon him. "They said, He is guilty of death;" and "then did they spit in his face." The priests began, and then no wonder if the servants, who would do any thing to make sport to themselves, and curry favour with their wicked masters, carried on the humour. See how they abused him.

1. They "spat in his face:" thus the Scripture was fulfilled, Isa. i. 6. "He did not his face from shame and spitting." Job complained of this indignity done to him, and herein was a type of Christ, Job iii. 10, "they spare not to spit in my face." It is an expression of the greatest contempt and indignation possible; looking upon him as more despicable than the very ground they spit upon. When Miriam was under the leprosy, it was looked upon as a disgrace to her, like that of her father spitting in her face, Num. xii. 14. He that refused to raise up seed to his brother was to undergo this dishonour, Deu. xxv. 9; yet Christ, when he was repairing the decays of the great family of mankind, submitted to it. That face which was "fairer than the children of men," which was white and ruddy, and which angels reverence, was thus filthily abused by the basest and vilest of the children of men. Thus was confusion poured upon his face, that ours might not be filled with everlasting shame and contempt. They who now profane his blessed name, abuse his word, and hate his image in his sanctified ones, what do they better than "spit in his face?" and would do that if it were in their reach.

2. They "buffeted him, and smote him with the palms of their hands;" this added pain to the shame, for both came in with sin. Now the Scripture was fulfilled, Isa. i. 6: "I gave my cheek to them that plucked off my hair;" and Lam. xxx. 30, "He giveth his cheek to him that smiteth him: he is filled with reproach," and yet "keepeth silence," ver. 28; and Mic. v. 1, "They shall smite the Judge of Israel with a rod upon the cheek;" and here the margin reads it, they "smote him with rods;" for so ῥάβδον signifies, and this he submitted to.

3. They challenged him to tell who struck him, having first blindfolded him: "Prophecy unto us, thou Christ, who is he that smote thee?" 1st. They made sport with him, as the Philistines did with Samson. It is grievous to those that are in misery for people to make merry about them, but much more to make merry with them and their misery. Here was an instance of the greatest pravity and degeneracy of the human nature that could be, to shew that there was need of a religion that should recover men to humanity. 2nd. They made sport with his prophetic office. They had heard him called a prophet, and that he was famed for wonderful discoveries; this they upbraided him with, and pretend to make trial of; as if the Divine omniscience must lacquey it to a piece of children's play. They put a like affront upon Christ who profanely jest with the Scripture, and make themselves merry with holy things, like Belshazzar's revels in the temple bowls.

69 Now Peter sat without in the palace: and a damsel came unto him, saying, Thou also wast with Jesus of Galilee. 70 But he denied before them all, saying, I know not what thou sayest. 71 And when he was gone out into the porch, another maid saw him, and said unto them that were there, This fellow was also with Jesus of Nazareth. 72 And again he denied with an oath, I do not know the man. 73 And after a while came unto him they that stood by, and said to Peter, Surely thou also art one of them; for thy speech bewrayeth thee. 74 Then began he to curse and to swear, saying, I know not the man. And immediately the cock crew. 75 And Peter remembered the word of Jesus, which said unto him, Before the cock crew, thou shalt deny me thrice. And he went out, and wept bitterly.

a number came and offered to bear witness, only two were found available.

xxvi. 61. The word "fellow" is not in the Greek, and it would be better to translate "this man," though the expression is intentionally derogatory.

xxvi. 69. The high-priest's language, "I adjure thee by the living God," is as much as to say, "I put thee on thine oath before the living God."

We have here the story of Peter's denying his Master, and it comes in as a part of Christ's sufferings. Our Lord Jesus was now in the high priest's hall, not to be tried, but baited rather, and then it would have been some comfort to him to see his friends near him. But we do not find any friend he had about the court, save Peter only, and better he had been at a distance. Observe how he fell, and how he got up again by repentance.

First. His sin, which is here impartially related, to the honour of the penmen of Scripture, who dealt faithfully. Observe,

1. The immediate occasion of Peter's sin. He "sat without in the palace," among the servants of the high priest. Note, Bad company is to many an occasion of sin; and those who needlessly thrust themselves into it, go upon the devil's ground, venture into his crowds, and may expect either to be tempted and ensnared, as Peter was, or to be ridiculed and abused, as his Master was, and scarce can come out of such company without guilt, or grief, or both. He that would keep God's commandments, and his own covenants, must say to evil doers, "Depart from me," Ps. cxix. 115. Peter spoke from his own experience, when he warned his new converts to save themselves from that untoward generation; for he had like to have ruined himself by going but once among them.

2. The temptation of it. He was challenged as a retainer to Jesus of Galilee; first one maid, and then another, and then the rest of the servants charged it upon him: "Thou also wast with Jesus of Galilee," ver. 69; and again, "This fellow was with Jesus of Nazareth," ver. 71; and again, ver. 73, "Thou also art one of them, for thy speech bewrayeth thee" to be a Galilean; whose dialect and pronunciation differed from that of the other Jews. Happy he whose speech bewrays him to be a disciple of Christ; by the holiness and seriousness of whose discourse it appears that he has been with Jesus. Observe how scornfully they speak of Christ—Jesus of Galilee, and of Nazareth; upbraiding him with the country he was of; and how disdainfully they speak of Peter, "This fellow;" as if they thought it a reproach to them to have such a man in their company, and he was well enough served for coming among them; yet they had nothing to accuse him of, but that he was with Jesus, which they thought was enough to render him both a scandalous and a suspected person.

3. The sin itself. When he was charged as one of Christ's disciples, he denied it, was ashamed and afraid to own himself so, and would have all about him to believe that he had no knowledge of him, nor any kindness or concern for him.

1st. Upon the first mention of it he said, "I know not what thou sayest." This was a shuffling answer he took on him: he did not understand the charge, that he knew not who she meant by Jesus of Galilee, or what she meant by being with him; so making strange of that which his heart was now as full of as it could. First. It is a fault thus to misrepresent our own apprehensions, thoughts, and affections, to serve a turn; to take on us, we do not understand, or did not think of, or remember, that which yet we do apprehend, and did think of, and remember; this is a species of lying which we are more prone to than any other, because in this a man is not easily disproved; for who knows the spirit of a man, save he himself? But God knows it, and we must be restrained from this wickedness by a fear of him, Pr. xxiv. 12. Secondly. It is yet a greater fault to be shy of Christ, to dissemble our knowledge of him, and to shift off a confession of him, when we are called to it; it is in effect to deny him.

2nd. Upon the next attack, he said flat and plain, "I know not the man," and backed it with an oath, ver. 72. This was in effect to say, "I will not own him, I am no Christian;" for Christianity is the knowledge of Christ. "Why, Peter! canst thou look upon yonder prisoner at the bar, and say, thou dost not know him? Didst thou not quit all to follow him? And hast thou not been the man of his counsel? Hast thou not known him better than any one else? Didst thou not confess him to be the Christ the Son of the Blessed? Hast thou forgot all the kind and tender looks thou hast had from him, and all the intimate fellowship thou hast had with him? Canst thou look him in the face, and say, thou dost not know him?"

3rd. Upon the third assault he began "to curse and swear, saying, I know not the man," ver. 74. This was worst of all, for the way of sin is downhill. He cursed and swore, First. To back what he said, and to gain credit to it, that they might not any more call it in question; he did not only say it, but swear it, and yet what he said was false. Note, We have reason to suspect the truth of that which is backed with rash oaths and imprecations. None but the devil's sayings need the devil's proofs. He that will not be restrained by the third commandment from mocking his God, will not be kept by the ninth from deceiving his brother. Secondly. He designed it to be an evidence for him that he was none of Christ's disciples, for this was none of their language. Cursing and swearing is enough to prove a man no disciple of Christ; for it is the language of his enemies thus to take his name in vain.

This is written for warning to us, that we sin not after the similitude of Peter's transgression; that we never, either directly or indirectly, deny Christ, the Lord that bought us, by rejecting his offers, resisting his Spirit, dissembling our knowledge of him, and being ashamed of him and his words, or afraid of suffering for him, and with his suffering people.

4. The aggravations of this sin, which it may be of use to take notice of, that we may observe the like transgressions in our own sins. Consider, 1st. Who he was: an apostle; one of the first three that had been, upon all occasions, the most forward to speak to the honour of Christ. The greater profession we make of religion, the greater is our sin, if in any thing we walk unworthily. 2nd. What fair warning his Master had given him of his danger; which, if he had regarded as he ought to have done, he would not have run himself into the temptation. 3rd. How solemnly he had promised to adhere to Christ in this night of trial; he had said again and again, "I will never deny thee; no, I will die with thee first;" yet he broke these bonds in sunder, and his word was yea and nay. 4th. How soon he fell into this sin after the Lord's supper; there to receive such an inestimable pledge of redeeming love, and yet the same night, before morning, to disown his Redeemer, was indeed turning aside quickly. 5th. How weak, comparatively, the temptation was; it was not the judge, or any of the officers of the court, that charged him with being a disciple of Jesus, but a silly maid or two, that probably designed him no hurt, nor would have done him any, if he had owned it. This was but running with the footmen, Jer. xii. 5. 6th. How often he repeated it; even after the cock had crowed once he continued in the temptation, and a second, and third time relapsed into the sin. Is this Peter? How art thou fallen!

Thus was his sin aggravated; but on the other hand there is this to extenuate it, that what he said, he said in his haste, Ps. cxvi. 11. He fell into the sin by surprise; not as Judas, with design; his heart was against it; he spoke very ill, but it was unadvisedly, and before he was aware.

Secondly. Peter's repentance for this sin, ver. 75. The former is written for our admonition, that we may not sin; but if at any time we be overtaken, this is written for our imitation, that we may make haste to repent. Now observe,

1st. What it was that brought Peter to repentance.

1st. "The cock crew," ver. 74; a common contingency but Christ having xxvi. 64. "Thou hast said" is at least equivalent to the simpler expression, "I am," and must be taken as an avowal of his Messiahship. The Greek formula rendered "hereafter" is more correctly translated "henceforth." From that time the Saviour's manifestation would be more complete. The language intimates, however, that there would be at some future time a more glorious display of his power and majesty. Our Lord here points to the judicial character in which he will appear at the last great tribunal.

mentioned the crowing of the cock, in the warning he gave him, that made it a means of bringing him to himself. The word of Christ can put a significance upon whatever sign he shall please to choose; and by virtue of that word he can make it very beneficial to the souls of his people. The crowing of a cock is to Peter instead of a John Baptist,—the voice of one calling to repentance. Conscience should be to us as the crowing of the cock; to put us in mind of what we had forgotten. When David's heart smote him, the cock crew. Where there is a living principle of grace in the soul, though for the present overpowered by temptation, a little hint will serve, only for a memorandum, when God sets in with it to recover it from a by-path. Here was the crowing of a cock made a happy occasion of the conversion of a soul. Christ comes sometimes in mercy, at cock-crowing.

2nd. He "remembered the words" of the Lord. This was it that brought him to himself, and melted him into tears of godly sorrow; a sense of his ingratitude to Christ, and the slight regard he had had to the gracious warning Christ had given him. Note, A serious reflection upon the words of the Lord Jesus, will be a powerful inducement to repentance, and will help to break the heart for sin. Nothing grieves a penitent more, than that he has sinned against the grace of the Lord Jesus, and the tokens of his love.

2. How his repentance was expressed: "He went out and wept bitterly."

1st. His sorrow was secret; "he went out;" out of the high priest's hall, vexed at himself that ever he came into it; now he found what a snare he was in, and got out of it as fast as he could. He went out into the porch before, ver. 71; and if he had gone quite off then, his second and third denial had been prevented; but then he came in again; now he went out, and came in no more. He went out to some place of solitude and retirement, where he might bemoan himself, like the doves of the valleys, Eze. vii. 16; Jer. ix. 1, 2. He went out that he might not be disturbed in his devotions on this sad occasion. We may then be most free in our communion with God, when we are most free from the converse and business of this world. In mourning for sin, we find the families apart, and their wives apart, Zec. xii. 11, 12.

2nd. His sorrow was serious: "he wept bitterly." Sorrow for sin must not be slight, but great and deep, like that for an only son. Those that have sinned sweetly, must weep bitterly, for sooner or later, sin will be bitterness. This deep sorrow is requisite, not to satisfy Divine justice; a sea of tears would not do that; but to evidence that there is a real change of mind, which is the essence of repentance; to make the pardon the more welcome, and sin for the future the more loathsome. Peter, that wept so bitterly for denying Christ, never denied him again, but confessed him often, and openly, and in the mouth of danger. So far from ever saying, "I know not the man;" that he made all the house of Israel know assuredly that this same Jesus was Lord and Christ. True repentance for any sin, will be best evidenced by our abounding in the contrary grace and duty; that is a sign of our weeping, not only bitterly, but sincerely. Some of the ancients say, "That as long as Peter lived, he never heard a crow but it set him a weeping." Those that have truly sorrowed for sin, will sorrow upon every remembrance of it; yet not so as to hinder, but rather to increase their joy in God, and in his mercy and grace.

CHAPTER XXVII.

1. Is a very affecting story which is recorded in this chapter, concerning the sufferings and death of our Lord Jesus. Considering the thing itself, there cannot be a more tragical story told us; common humanity would melt the heart to find an innocent and excellent person thus misused. But considering the design and fruit of Christ's sufferings, it is gospel, it is good news that Jesus Christ was thus "delivered for our offences;" and there is nothing we have more reason to glory in than the cross of Christ. In this chapter, observe, 1. How he was prosecuted: 1. The delivering him to Pilate, ver. 1, 2; 2. The despair of Judas, ver. 3—10; 3. The arraignment and trial of Christ before Pilate, ver. 11—14; 4. The clamours of the people against him, ver. 15—25; 5. Sentence passed, and the warrant signed for his execution, ver. 26. II. How he was executed: 1. He was barbarously used, ver. 27—30; 2. Led to the place of execution, ver. 31—33; 3. There he had all possible indignities done him, and reproaches cast upon him, ver. 34—44; 4. Heaven frowned upon him, ver. 45—49; 5. Many remarkable things attended his death, ver. 50—56; 6. He was buried, and a watch set on his grave, ver. 57—66.

WHEN the morning was come, all the chief priests and elders of the people took counsel against Jesus to put him to death: 2 And when they had bound him, they led him away, and delivered him to Pontius Pilate the governor. 3 Then Judas, which had betrayed him, when he saw that he was condemned, repented himself, and brought again the thirty pieces of silver to the chief priests and elders, 4 Saying, I have sinned in that I have betrayed the innocent blood. And they said, What is that to us? see thou to that. 5 And he cast down the pieces of silver in the temple, and departed, and went and hanged himself. 6 And the chief priests took the silver pieces, and said, It is not lawful for to put them into the treasury, because it is the price of blood. 7 And they took counsel, and bought with them the potter's field, to bury strangers in. 8 Wherefore that field was called, The field of blood, unto this day. 9 Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremy the prophet, saying, And they took the thirty pieces of silver, the price of him that was valued, whom they of the children of Israel did value; 10 And gave them for the potter's field, as the Lord appointed me.

We left Christ in the hands of the chief priests and elders, condemned to die, but they could only shew their teeth; about two years before this the Romans had taken from the Jews the power of capital punishment; they could put no man to death; and therefore, early in the morning, another council is held, to consider what is to be done. And here we are told what was done in that morning council, after they had been for two or three hours consulting with their pillows.

First, Christ is delivered up to Pilate, that he might execute the sentence they had passed upon him. Judea having been almost a hundred years before this conquered by Pompey, had ever since been tributary to Rome, and was lately made part of the province of Syria, and subject to the government of the president of Syria, under whom there were several procurators, who chiefly attended the business of the revenues; but sometimes, as Pilate particularly, had the whole power of the president lodged in them. This was a plain evidence that the sceptre was departed from Judah, and therefore now the Shiloh must come, according to Jacob's prophecy, Gen. xlix. 10. Pilate is characterized by the Roman writers of that time, to be a man of a rough and haughty spirit, wilful and implacable, and extremely covetous and oppressive; the Jews had a great enmity to his person, and were weary of his government, and yet they made use of him as the tool of their malice against Christ.

1. They bound Jesus. He was bound when he was first seized; but either they took off these bonds when he was before the council, or now they added to them. Having found him guilty, they tied his hands behind him, as they usually do with convicted criminals. He was already bound with the bonds of love to man, and of his own undertaking, else he had soon broke these bonds as Samson did his. We were fettered with the bond of iniquity, held in the cords of our sins, Pr. v. 22, but God had bound the yoke of our transgressions upon the neck of the Lord Jesus, Lam. i. 14, that we might be loosed by his bonds, as we are healed by his stripes.

2. They led him away in a sort of triumph; led him "as a lamb to the slaughter;" so was he "taken from prison, and from judgment," Isa. liii. 7, 8. It was near a mile from Caiaphas's house to Pilate's. All that way they led him through the streets of Jerusalem, when in the morning they began to fill, to make him a spectacle to the world.

3. They delivered him to Pontius Pilate; according to that which Christ had often said, that he should be delivered to the Gentiles. Both Jews and Gentiles were obnoxious to the judgment of God, and concluded under sin; and Christ was to be the Saviour both of Jews and Gentiles, and therefore Christ was brought into the judgment both of Jews and Gentiles, and both had a hand in his death. See how these corrupt church rulers abused the civil magistrate, making use of him to execute their unrighteous decrees, and inflict the grievance which they had prescribed, Isa. x. 1. Thus have the kings of the earth been wretchedly imposed upon by the papal powers, and condemned to the drudgery of extirpating with the sword of war, as well as that of justice, those whom they have marked for heretics, right or wrong, to the great prejudice of their own interests.

Secondly. The money which they had paid to Judas for betraying Christ, is by him delivered back to them, and Judas in despair hangs himself. The chief priests and elders supported themselves with this, in prosecuting Christ, that his own disciples betrayed him to them; but now, in the midst of the prosecution, that string failed them, and even he is made to them a witness of Christ's innocency, and a monument of God's justice; which served, 1. For glory to Christ in the midst of his sufferings, and a specimen of his victory over Satan, who had entered into Judas. 2. For warning to his persecutors, and to leave them the more inexcusable. If their heart had not been fully set in them to do this evil, what Judas said and did, one would think, should have stopped the prosecution.

1st. See here how Judas repented; not like Peter, who repented, believed, and was pardoned; no, he repented, despaired, and was ruined. Now observe here,

First. What induced him to repent. It was "when he saw that he was condemned." It is very likely Judas expected, that either Christ would have made his escape out of their hands, or would so have pleaded his own cause at their bar, as to have come off; and then Christ would have had the honour, the Jews the shame, and he the money, and no harm done. This he had no reason to expect; because he had so often heard his Master say, he must be crucified; yet it is probable he did expect it, and when the event did not answer his vain fancy, then he fell into this horror, when he saw the stream strong against Christ, and him yielding to it. Note, Those who measure actions by the consequences of them, rather than by the Divine law, will find themselves mistaken in their measures. The way of sin is down-hill; and if we cannot easily stop ourselves, much less can we stop others, whom we have set agoing in a sinful way. He "repented himself;" that is, he was filled with grief, anguish, and indignation at himself, in reflection upon what he had done. When he was tempted to betray his Master, the thirty pieces of silver looked very fine and glittering; like the wine when it is red, and gives its colour in the cup. But when the thing was done, and the money paid, the silver was become gross; it bit like a serpent, and stung like an adder. Now his conscience flew in his face: "What have I done? What a fool—what a wretch am I, to sell my Master, and all my comfort and happiness in him for such a trifle! All these abuses and indignities done him are chargeable upon me; it is along of me that he is bound and condemned, spit upon and buffeted; I little thought it would have come to this, when I made that wicked bargain: so foolish was I, and ignorant, and so like a beast." Now he curseth the bag he carried, the money he coveted, the priests he dealt with, and the day that he was born. The remembrance of his Master's goodness to him, which he had so basely requited; the bowels of mercy he had spurned at, and the fair warnings he had slighted, steeled his convictions, and made them the more piercing. Now he found his Master's words true: "It were better for that man he had never been born." Note, Sin will soon change its taste. Though it be rolled under the tongue as a sweet morsel, in the bowels it will be turned into the gall of asps, Job xx. 12—14, like John's book, Rev. x. 9.

xxvi. 66. The speakers who said, "He is guilty of death," or convicted of, or deserving death, are probably those mentioned in ver. 59.

xxvi. 75. Peter had left the palace-court, and had passed into the porch, through which entrance was gained to the entire building (verse 71).

xxvii. 1, 2. "When the morning was come" alludes, of course, to the coming of daylight, which would be somewhat before six a.m. The connection of "all" with the word chief priests is to be noted as another indication of the use of the word high-priests or chief priests (the same term in Greek), to denote generally priests of a higher rank and position. They had apparently proceeded as far as they could without laying their case before the Roman governor, and therefore they now bind their prisoner, and conduct him to Pilate, whose usual residence was at Cæsarea, but who was then at Jerusalem, in consequence of its being the Passover season. Pontius Pilatus, whose name here occurs for the first time in the Gospels, Secondly. What were the indications of his repentance.

1st. He made restitution. He "brought again the thirty pieces of silver to the chief priests," when they were all together publicly. Now the money burned in his conscience; and he was as sick of it as ever he had been fond of it. Note, That which is ill-gotten will never do good to those that get it, Jer. xiii. 10; Job xx. 15. If he had repented, and brought the money back before he had betrayed Christ, he might have done it with comfort; then he had agreed, while yet in the way; but now it was too late,—now he cannot do it without horror; wishing ten thousand times he had never meddled with it; see Jas. v. 3. "He brought it again." Note, What is unjustly gotten must not be kept; for that is a continuance in the sin by which it was got; and such an avowing of it as is not consistent with repentance. He brought it to those from whom he had it, to let them know that he repented his bargain. Note, Those who have served and hardened others in their sin, when God gives them repentance, should let them know it whose sins they have been partakers in, that it may be a means to bring them to repentance.

2nd. He made confession, ver. 4: "I have sinned in that I have betrayed the innocent blood." First. To the honour of Christ, he pronounceth his blood innocent. If he had been guilty of any ill practices, Judas, as his disciple, would certainly have known it; and, as his betrayer, would certainly have discovered it; but he freely, and without being urged to it, pronounces him innocent, to the face of those who had now pronounced him guilty. Secondly. To his own shame, he confesseth that he had sinned in betraying this blood. He doth not lay the blame on any one else; doth not say, "You have sinned in hiring me to do it;" but takes it all to himself,—"I have sinned in doing it." Thus far Judas went towards his repentance; yet it was not to salvation. He confessed; but not to God: did not go to him, and say, "I have sinned, Father, against heaven." He confessed the betraying of innocent blood, but did not confess that wicked love of money, which was the root of this evil. Yet there are those who betray Christ, and yet justify themselves in it; and so come short of Judas.

2nd. See here how the chief priests and elders entertained Judas's penitential confession; they said, "What is that to us? see thou to that." He made them his confessors, and that was the absolution they gave him; more like the priests of devils, than like the priests of the holy, living God.

First. See here how carelessly they speak of the betraying of Christ. Judas had told them that the blood of Christ was innocent blood; and they say, "What is that to us?" Was it nothing to them that they had thirsted after this blood, and hired Judas to betray it, and had now condemned it to be shed unjustly? Is this nothing to them? Doth it give no check to the violence of the prosecution; no warning to take heed what they do to this just man? Thus do fools make a mock at sin, as if no harm were done, no hazard run by the commission of the greatest wickedness. Thus light do many make of Christ crucified: what is it to them that he suffered such things?

Secondly. See here how carelessly they speak of the sin of Judas; he said, "I have sinned;" and they said, "What is that to us?" What are we concerned in thy sin, that thou tellest us of it? Note, It is folly for us to think that the sins of others are nothing to us; especially those sins that we are any way accessory, or partakers in. Is it nothing to us that God is dishonoured, souls wounded, Satan gratified, and his interests served? and that we have aided and abetted it? If the elders of Jezreel, to please Jezebel, murder Naboth, is that nothing to Ahab? Yes, he has killed, for he has taken possession, 1 Kin. xxi. 19. The guilt of sin is not so easily transferred as some people think it is. If there were guilt in the matter, they tell Judas he must look to it: he must bear it. 1st. Because he had betrayed him to them. His was indeed the greater sin, Jno. xix. 11; but it did not therefore follow, that theirs was no sin. It is a common instance of the deceitfulness of our hearts to extenuate our own sin by the aggravations of other people's sins. But "the judgment of God is according to truth," not according to comparison. 2nd. Because he knew and believed him to be innocent. "If he be innocent, 'see thou to it,' that is more than we know; we have adjudged him guilty, and therefore, may justly prosecute him as such." Wicked practices are buoyed up by wicked principles, and particularly by this, That sin is sin only to those that think it to be so; that it is no harm to persecute a good man, if we take him to be an ill man; but those who thus think to mock God, will but deceive and destroy themselves.

Thirdly. See how carelessly they speak of the conviction, terror, and remorse that Judas was under. They were glad to make use of him in the sin, and were then very fond of him; none more welcome to them than Judas, when he said, "What will ye give me, and I will betray him to you?" They did not say, "What is that to us?" But now his sin had put him into a fright, now they slighted him; had nothing to say to him, but turned him over to his own terrors: what! did he come to trouble them with his melancholy fancies; they had something else to do than to heed him; but why so shy? 1st. Perhaps they were in some fear lest the sparks of his conviction brought too near should kindle a fire in their own consciences; and lest his moans, listened to, should give an alarm to their own consciences. Note, Obstinate sinners stand upon their guard against convictions; and those that are resolutely impenitent, look with disdain upon the penitent. 2nd. However they were in no concern to succour Judas; when they had brought him into the snare, they not only left him, but laughed at him. Note, Sinners under convictions will find their old companions in sin but miserable comforters. It is usual for those that love the treason to hate the traitor.

Thirdly. Here is the utter despair that Judas was hereby driven into. If the chief priests had promised him to stay the prosecution, it would have been some comfort to him; but seeing no hopes of that, he grew desperate, ver. 5.

1. "He cast down the pieces of silver in the temple." The chief priests would not take the money, for fear of taking thereby the whole guilt to themselves, which they were willing Judas should bear the load of; Judas would not keep it; it was too hot for him to hold; he therefore threw it down in the temple, that whether they would or no, it might fall into the hands of the chief priests. See what a drug money was, when the guilt of sin was tacked to it, or was thought to be so.

2. He "went and hanged himself." 1st. He retired, ἀνεχώρησεν, he withdrew into some solitary place, like the possessed man that was drawn by the devil into the wilderness, Lu. viii. 29. Woe to him that is in despair, and is alone. Had Judas gone to Christ, or to some of the disciples, perhaps he might have had relief, as bad as the case was; but missing of it with the chief priests, he abandoned himself to despair. And the same devil, that with the help of the priests, drew him to the sin, with their help drove him to despair. 2nd. He became his own executioner; he "hanged himself." 'he was suffocated with grief.' So Dr. Hammond; but Dr. Whitby is clear that our translation is right. Judas had a sight and sense of sin, but no apprehension of the mercy of God in Christ; and so he pined away in his iniquity. His sin, we may suppose, was not in its own nature unpardonable; there were some of those saved that had been Christ's betrayers and murderers; but he concluded, as Cain, that his iniquity was greater than could be forgiven, and would rather throw himself on the devil's mercy than God's. And some have said, that Judas sinned more in despairing of the mercy of God, than in betraying his Master's blood. Now the terrors of the Almighty set themselves in array against him. All the curses written in God's book now "come into his bowels like water, and like oil into his bones," as was foretold concerning him, Ps. cix. 18, 19, and drove him to this desperate shift, for the escaping of a hell within him, to leap into that before him, which was but the perfection and perpetuity of this horror and despair. He throws himself into the fire, to avoid the flame; but miserable is the case when a man must to hell for ease.

Now in this story, First. We have an instance of the wretched end of those into whom Satan enters, and particularly those that are given up to the love of money. This is the destruction in which many are drowned by it, 1 Tim. vi. 9, 10. Remember what came of the swine into which, and of the traitor into whom, the devil entered, and give not place to the devil.

Secondly. We have an instance of the wrath of God revealed from heaven against the ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, Rom. i. 18. As in the story of Peter we behold the goodness of God, and the triumphs of Christ's grace in the conversion of some sinners; so in the story of Judas we behold the severity of God, and the triumphs of Christ's power and justice in the confusion of other sinners. When Judas, into whom Satan entered, was thus hung up, Christ made an open show of the principalities and powers he undertook the spoiling of, Col. ii. 15.

Thirdly. We have an instance of the direful effects of despair, it often ends in self-murder. Sorrow, even that for sin, if not according to God, worketh death, 2 Cor. vii. 10; the worst kind of death; for a wounded spirit, who can bear? Let us think as bad as we can of sin, provided we do not think it unpardonable; and despair of help in ourselves, but not of help in God. He that thinks to ease his conscience by destroying his life, doth in effect dare God Almighty to do his worst; and self-murder, though prescribed by some of the heathen moralists, is certainly a remedy worse than the disease, how bad soever the disease may be. Let us watch against the beginnings of melancholy; and pray, Lord, "Lead us not into temptation."

Fourthly. The disposal of the money which Judas brought back, ver. 6—10. It was laid out in the purchase of a field, called the Potter's Field; because some potter either had owned it, or occupied it, or lived near it, or because broken potters' vessels were thrown into it. And this field was to be a burying place for strangers, that is, proselytes to the Jewish religion, who were of other nations, and coming to Jerusalem to worship, happened to die there. 1st. It looks like an instance of their humanity, that they took care for the burying of strangers; and it intimates that they themselves allowed, as St. Paul saith, Acts xxiv. 15; "That there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just, and of the unjust;" for we therefore take care of the dead body, not only because it has been the habitation of a rational soul, but because it must be so again. But, 2nd. It was no instance of their humility, that they would bury strangers in a place by themselves, as if they were not worthy to be laid in their burying places; strangers must keep their distance, alive and dead, and that principle must go down to the grave, "Stand by thyself, come not near me, I am holier than thou," Isa. lxv. 5. The sons of Heth were better affected towards Abraham, though a stranger among them, when they offered him the choicest of their own sepulchres, Gen. xxii. 6. But the sons of the stranger, that have joined themselves to the Lord, though buried by themselves, shall rise with all that are dead in Christ.

This buying of the potter's field was not done that day that Christ died, they were then too busy to mind any thing else but hunting him down, yet it was done not long after; for Peter speaks of it soon after Christ's ascension; yet it is here recorded,

1. To shew the hypocrisy of the chief priests and elders: they were maliciously persecuting the blessed Jesus; and now, 1st. They scruple to put that money into the treasury, or corban of the temple, with which they had hired the traitor. Though perhaps they had taken it out of the treasury, pretending it was for the public good, and though they were great sticklers for the corban, and laboured to draw all the wealth of the nation into it, yet they would not put that money into it which was the price of blood. The hire of a traitor they thought parallel to the hire of a whore, and the price of a malefactor (such a one they made Christ to be) equivalent to the price of a dog, neither of which was to be brought into the house of the Lord, Deu. xxiii. 18. They would thus save their credit with the people, by possessing them with an opinion of their great reverence for the temple. Thus they that swallowed a camel, strained at a gnat. 2nd. They think to atone for what they had done by this public good act, of providing a burying place for strangers, though not at their own charge. Thus in times of ignorance, people were made to believe that building churches and endowing monasteries would make amends for immoralities.

2. To signify the favour intended by the blood of Christ to strangers and sinners of the Gentiles. Through the price of his blood, a resting place is provided for them after death; thus many of the ancients apply this passage. The grave is the potter's field, where the bodies are thrown as despised, broken vessels; but Christ by his blood purchased it for those who, by confessing themselves strangers on earth, seek the better country; he has altered the property of it, (as a purchaser doth,) so that now death is ours, the grave is ours, a bed of rest for us. The Germans in their language, call burying places, 'God's fields;' for in them God sows his people as a corn of wheat, Jno. xii. 24; see Hos. ii. 23; Isa. xvi. 19.

3. To perpetuate the infamy of those that bought and sold the blood of Christ. This field was commonly called Aceldama, the field of blood; not by the chief priests, they hoped in this burying place to bury the remembrance of their own crime; but by the people, who took notice of Judas's acknowledgment, that he had betrayed the innocent blood, though the chief priests made nothing of it. They fastened this name upon the field, In perpetuum rei memoriam—for a perpetual memorial. Note, Divine providence has many ways of entailing disgrace upon the wicked practices even of great men, who, though they seek to cover their shame, are put to a perpetual reproach.

4. That we may see how the Scripture was fulfilled, ver. 9, 10; "Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremy the prophet;" the words quoted are found in the prophecy of Zechariah, ch. xi. 12; how they are here said to be spoken by Jeremiah, is a difficult question; but the credit of Christ's doctrine doth not depend upon it; for that proves itself perfectly Divine, though there should appear something human as to small circumstances in the penmen of it. The Syriac version, which is ancient, reads only 'it was spoken by the prophet,' not naming any, whence some thought Jeremy was added by some scribe; some think the whole volume of the prophets, being in one book, and the prophecy of Jeremiah put first, it might not be improper, currente calamo—'with a running pen,' to quote any passage out of that volume under his name. The Jews used to say, the spirit of Jeremiah was in Zechariah, and so they were as one prophet; some suggest, that it was spoken by Jeremiah, but written by Zechariah; or, that Jeremiah wrote the 9th, 10th, and 11th chapters of Zechariah. Now this passage in the prophet is a representation of the great contempt of God that was found among the Jews, and the poor returns they made to him for rich receivings from him. But here that is really acted, which was the fifth Roman procurator of Judea. The first was Coponius, sent out with Quirinus, after the banishment of Archelaus; the second was Marcus Ambivius; the third, Annus Rufus; the fourth, Valerius Gratus, who was succeeded by Pilate about A.D. 26. (See Josephus, "Antiq.," xviii., 2, 2.) Pilate continued in office about ten years; and being hated by both Jews and Samaritans for the cruelty and caprice of his administration, he was accused by them before Vitellius, then governor of Syria, and sent by him to Rome, to answer to these complaints before the Emperor. (Josephus, "Antiq.," xviii., 3, 1; xviii., 4, 1, 2.) Tiberius was dead before the arrival of Pilate, and the latter is said to have been banished by Caligula to Vienna, in Gaul, and there to have died by his own hand about A.D. 41. (Eusebius, "Church History," ii., 7, 8.) For the part taken by Pilate in the condemnation of Jesus, compare Josephus, "Antiq.," xviii., 3, 3 ("Robinson's Lexicon to the New Testament"). In early Christian literature we find reference to the "Acts of Pilate," in which was there but figuratively expressed. The sum of money is the same, "thirty pieces of silver," this "they weighed for his price," at this rate they valued him, "a goodly price;" and this "cast to the potter in the house of the Lord;" which was here literally accomplished. Note, We should better understand the events of providence, if we were better acquainted even with the language and expressions of Scripture, for even those also are sometimes written upon the dispensations of providence so plain, that he that runs may read them. What David spoke figuratively, Ps. xlii. 7, Jonah made a literal application of, "All thy waves and thy billows are gone over me," Jonah ii. 3.

The giving of "the price of him that was valued," not for him, but for the potter's field, speaks, 1st. the high value that ought to be put upon Christ. The price was given, not for him; no, when it was given for him, it was soon brought back again with disdain, as infinitely below his worth; he cannot be valued with the gold of Ophir, nor this unspeakable gift bought with money. 2nd. The low value that was put upon him. "They of the children of Israel" did strangely undervalue him, when his price did but reach to buy a potter's field, a pitiful, sorry plot of ground, not worth looking upon. It added to the reproach of his being bought and sold, that it was at so low a rate: "cast it to the potter," so it is in Zechariah; a contemptible, petty chapman, not the merchant that deals in things of value. And, observe, "they of the children of Israel" thus undervalued him; they that were his own people, that should have known better, what estimate to put upon him; they to whom he was first sent, whose glory he was, and whom he had valued so highly, and bought so dear. He gave kings' ransoms for them, and the richest countries, so precious were they in his sight, Isa. xliii. 3, 4; Egypt, and Ethiopia, and Seba; but they gave a slave's ransom for him, see Ex. xxi. 32; and valued him but at the rate of a potter's field; so was that blood trodden under foot, which bought the kingdom of heaven for us. But all this was as the Lord appointed; so the prophetic vision was which typified this event, and so the event itself, as the other instances of Christ's sufferings, "by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God."

11 And Jesus stood before the governor: and the governor asked him, saying, Art thou the King of the Jews? And Jesus said unto him, Thou sayest. 12 And when he was accused of the chief priests and elders, he answered nothing. 13 Then said Pilate unto him, Hearest thou not how many things they witness against thee? 14 And he answered him to never a word; insomuch that the governor marvelled greatly. 15 Now at that feast the governor was wont to release unto the people a prisoner, whom they would. 16 And they had then a notable prisoner, called Barabbas. 17 Therefore when they were gathered together, Pilate said unto them, Whom will ye that I release unto you? Barabbas, or Jesus which is called Christ? 18 For he knew that for envy they had delivered him. 19 When he was set down on the judgment seat, his wife sent unto him, saying, Have thou nothing to do with that just man: for I have suffered many things this day in a dream because of him. 20 But the chief priests and elders persuaded the multitude that they should ask Barabbas, and destroy Jesus. 21 The governor answered and said unto them, Whether of the twain will ye that I release unto you? They said, Barabbas. 22 Pilate saith unto them, What shall I do then with Jesus which is called Christ? They all say unto him, Let him be crucified. 23 And the governor said, Why, what evil hath he done? But they cried out the more, saying, Let him be crucified. 24 When Pilate saw that he could prevail nothing, but that rather a tumult was made, he took water, and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this just person: see ye to it. 25 Then answered all the people, and said, His blood be on us, and on our children.

We have here an account of what passed in Pilate's judgment hall, when the blessed Jesus was brought thither betimes in the morning. Though it was no court day, Pilate immediately took his case before him. We have here,

First. The trial Christ had before Pilate.

1. His arraignment: "Jesus stood before the governor," as the prisoner before the judge. We could not stand before God because of our sins, nor lift up our face in his presence, if Christ had not been thus made sin for us. He was arraigned, that we might be discharged. Some think this speaks his courage and boldness, he stood undaunted, unmoved by all their rage. He thus stood in this judgment, that we might stand in God's judgment. He stood for a spectacle, as Naboth, when he was arraigned, was set on high among the people.

2. His indictment: "Art thou the king of the Jews?" The Jews were now not only under the government, but under the very jealous inspection of the Roman powers; which they were themselves to the highest degree disaffected to, and yet now pretend a concern for to serve this turn; accusing Jesus as an enemy to Cæsar, Lu. xxiii. 2; which they could produce no other proof of, but that he himself had newly owned he was the Christ. Now they thought, that whoever was the Christ, must be the king of the Jews, and must deliver them from the Roman power, and restore to them a temporal dominion, and enable them to trample upon all their neighbours. And according to this chimera of their own, they accused our Lord Jesus, as making himself king of the Jews, in opposition to the Roman yoke; whereas, though he said he was the Christ, he meant not such a Christ as this. Note, Many oppose Christ's holy religion upon a mistake of the nature of it; they dress it up in false colours, and then fight against it. They assuring the governor that, if he made himself Christ, he made himself king of the Jews, the governor takes it for granted, that he goes about to subvert the nation, and subvert the government. "Art thou a king?" (it was plain he was not so, de facto—actually;) but 'dost thou lay any claim to the government, or pretend a right to rule the Jews?' Note, it has often been the hard fate of Christ's holy religion, unjustly to fall under the suspicions of the civil powers, as if it were hurtful to kings and provinces, whereas it tends mightily to the benefit of both.

3. His plea: "Jesus said unto him, Thou sayest;" that is, 'It is as thou sayest, though not as thou meanest; I am a king, but not such a king as thou dost suspect me to be.' Thus before Pilate he witnessed a good confession, and was not ashamed to own himself a king, though it looked ridiculous; nor afraid, though at this time it was dangerous.

4. The evidence, ver. 12: "He was accused of the chief priests." Pilate found no fault in him; whatever was said, nothing was proved, and therefore what was wanting in matter, they made up in noise and violence, and followed him with repeated accusations, the same they had given in before; but by the repetition they thought to force a belief from the governor. They had learned, not only calumniari—to calumniate, but fortiter calumniari—to calumniate stoutly. The best men have often been accused of the worst crimes.

5. The prisoner's silence as to the prosecutors' accusations: "He answered nothing." 1st. Because it did not need, nothing was alleged but what carried its own confutation along with it. 2nd. He was now taken up with the great concern that lay between him and his Father, to whom he was offering up himself a sacrifice, to answer the demands of his justice, which he was so intent upon, that he minded not what they said against him. 3rd. His hour was come, and he submitted to his Father's will, "not as I will, but as thou wilt;" he knew what his Father's will was, and therefore silently "committed himself to him that judgeth righteously." We must not thus by our silence throw away our lives, because we are not lords of our lives, as Christ was of his; nor can we know, as he did, when our hour is come. But hence we must learn, not to render railing for railing, 1 Pet. ii. 23.

Now, First. Pilate pressed him to make some reply, ver. 13: "Hearest thou not how many things they witness against thee?" what these things were may be gathered from Lu. xxiii. 3, 5; and Jno. xix. 7. Pilate having no malice at all against him, was desirous he should clear himself, urge him to it, and believes he could do it. "Hearest thou not?" Yes, he did hear, and still he hears all that is witnessed unjustly against his truths and ways; but he keeps silence, because it is the day of his patience, and doth not answer, as he will shortly, Ps. l. 3. Secondly. He wondered at his silence; which was not interpreted so much a contempt of the court, as a contempt of himself. And, therefore, Pilate is not said to be angry at it, but to have "marvelled greatly" at it, as a thing very unusual. He believed him to be innocent, and had heard perhaps that never man spake like him, and therefore thought it strange that he had not one word to say for himself. Now,

Secondly. The outrage and violence of the people, in pressing the governor to crucify Christ. The chief priests had a great interest in the people, they called them Rabbi, rabbi, made idols of them, and oracles of all they said, and they made use of this to incense them against him, and by the power of the mob gained the point, which they could not otherwise carry. Now here are two instances of their outrage:

1. Their preferring Barabbas before him, and choosing to have him released rather than Jesus.

1st. It seems it was grown into a custom with the Roman governors, for the humouring of the Jews, to grace the feast of the passover with the release of a prisoner, ver. 15. This they thought did honour to the feast, and was agreeable to the commemoration of their deliverance, but it was an invention of their own, and no Divine institution; though some think it was ancient, and kept up by the Jewish princes, before they became a province of the empire. However, it was an ill custom, an obstruction to justice, and an encouragement to wickedness. But our gospel passover is celebrated with the release of prisoners, by him who "hath power on earth to forgive sins."

2nd. The prisoner put in competition with our Lord Jesus, was Barabbas, a notable prisoner he is here called, ver. 16, either because by birth and breeding he was of some note and quality, or because he had signalized himself by something remarkable in his crimes; whether he was so notable as to recommend himself the more to the favours of the people, and so the more likely to be begged, or whether so notable as to make himself more liable to their rage, is uncertain. Some think the latter, and therefore Pilate mentioned him, as taking it for granted, they would have desired any one's release rather than his. Treason, murder, and felony, are the three most enormous crimes that are usually punished by the sword of justice, and Barabbas was guilty of them all three, Lu. xxiii. 17; Jno. xviii. 40. A notable prisoner indeed, whose crimes were so complicated.

3rd. The proposal was made by Pilate the governor, ver. 17: "Whom will ye that I release unto you?" It is probable, the judge had the nomination of two, one of which the people were to choose: Pilate proposed to them to have Jesus released; he was convinced of his innocence, and that the prosecution was malicious, yet had not the courage to acquit him, as he ought to have done, by his own power, but would have him released by the people's election, and so he hoped to satisfy both his own conscience, and the people too; whereas finding no fault in him, he ought not to have put him upon the country, or brought him into peril of his life. But such little tricks and artifices as these, to trim the matter, and to keep in with conscience and the world too, are the common practice of those that seek more to please men than God. "What shall I do," saith Pilate, "with Jesus, which is called Christ?" He puts the people in mind of this, that this Jesus, whose release he proposed, was looked upon by some among them as the Messiah, and had given pregnant proofs of his being so: 'Do not reject one whom your nation has professed such an expectation of.' The reason why Pilate laboured thus to get Jesus discharged, was because "he knew that for envy the chief priests had delivered him up," ver. 18.

he is said to have made a full report to Tiberius of the circumstances attending the trial and crucifixion of Jesus. It has been supposed that what is now called the "Gospel of Nicodemus" in part represents the "Acts of Pilate," but such an opinion is not at all probable. There are documents still extant bearing Pilate's name, but not one of them is genuine. Cowper's "Apocryphal Gospels" contains them all, with full details.

xxvii. 9. The passage here ascribed to Jeremiah is loosely quoted from Zech. xi. 12, 13, and differs both from the Septuagint and the Hebrew. The name of Jeremiah is found in most copies and versions. The Syriac Peshito reads, "that which was spoken by the prophet," and a few other authorities omit the name of Jeremiah, while a few have Zechariah. The difficulty was noticed by Jerome, and still earlier by Origen, and no decisive explanation of it has been discovered. One important suggestion is that the quotation originally formed part of the writings of Jeremiah, which by mistake the Jews that it was not his guilt but his goodness that they were provoked at; and for this reason he hoped to bring him off by the people's act, and that they would be for his release. When David was envied by Saul, he was the darling of the people, and any one that heard the hosannas with which Christ was but a few days ago brought into Jerusalem, would have thought that he had been so, and that Pilate might safely have referred this matter to the commonalty, especially when so notorious a rogue was set up as rival with him for their favours. But it proved otherwise.

4th. While Pilate was thus labouring the matter, he was confirmed in his unwillingness to condemn Jesus by a message sent him from his wife, ver. 19, by way of caution, "Have thou nothing to do with that just man," together with the reason, "for I have suffered many things this day, in a dream, because of him." Probably this message was delivered to Pilate publicly, in the hearing of all that were present, for it was intended to be a warning not to him only, but to the prosecutors. Observe,

First. The special providence of God in sending this dream to Pilate's wife; it is not likely that she had heard any thing before concerning Christ, at least, not so as to occasion her dreaming of him, but it was immediately from God: perhaps she was one of the "devout and honourable women," and had some sense of religion; yet God revealed himself by dreams to some that had not, as to Nebuchadnezzar. She "suffered many things" in this dream; whether she dreamed of the cruel usage of an innocent person, or of the judgments that would fall upon those that had any hand in his death, or both, it seems it was a frightful dream, and her thoughts troubled her, as Dan. ii. 1-5. Note, The Father of spirits has many ways of access to the spirits of men, and "can seal their instructions in a dream, or vision of the night," Job xxxiii. 15; yet to those who have the written word, God more ordinarily speaks by conscience on a waking bed, than by dreams, when "deep sleep falls upon men."

Secondly. The tenderness and care of Pilate's wife in sending this caution thereupon to her husband, "Have thou nothing to do with that just man."

1st. This was an honourable testimony to our Lord Jesus, witnessing for him that he was a just man; even then when he was persecuted as the worst of malefactors, when his friends were afraid to appear in defence of him, God made even those that were strangers and enemies to speak in his favour; when Peter denied him, Judas confessed him; when the chief priests pronounced him guilty of death, Pilate declared he found no fault in him; when the women that loved him stood afar off, Pilate's wife, that knew little of him, showed a concern for him. Note, God will not leave himself without witnesses to the truth and equity of his cause, even then when it seems to be most spitefully run down by its enemies, and most shamefully deserted by its friends. 2nd. It was a fair warning to Pilate, "Have thou nothing to do with him." Note, God has many ways of giving cheeks to sinners in their sinful pursuits; and it is a great mercy to have such cheeks from providence, from faithful friends, and from our own consciences, and our great duty to hearken to them. "O do not this abominable thing which the Lord hates," is what we may hear said to us when we are entering into temptation, if we will but regard it. Pilate's lady sent him this warning out of the love she had to him; she feared not to rebuke him from him for meddling with that which belonged not to her, but let him take it how he would, she would give him the caution. Note, It is an instance of true love to our friends and relations to do what we can to keep them from sin; and the nearer any are to us, and the greater affection we have for them, the more solicitous we should be not to suffer sin to come or lie upon them, Lev. xix. 17. The best friendship is friendship to the soul. We are not told how Pilate turned this off; it is like with a jest, but by his proceeding against this just man it appears he did not regard it. Thus faithful admonitions are made light of when they are given as warnings against sin; but will not be so easily made light of when they shall be reflected upon as aggravations of sin.

5th. The chief priests and the elders were busy all this while to influence the people in favour of Barabbas, ver. 20: they "persuaded the multitude," both by themselves and their emissaries, whom they sent abroad among them, "that they should ask Barabbas, and destroy Jesus;" suggesting that this Jesus was a deceiver, in league with Satan, an enemy to their church and temple; that if he were let alone the Romans would come and take away their place and nation; that Barabbas, though an ill man, yet having not the interest that Jesus had, could not do so much mischief. Thus they managed the mob, who otherwise were well affected to Jesus; and if they had not been so much at the beck of their priests would never have done such a preposterous thing, as to prefer Barabbas before Jesus. Here, First, We cannot but look upon these wicked priests with indignation; by the law, in "matters of controversy between blood and blood," the people were to be guided by the priests, and to do as they informed them, Deu. xviii. 8. This great power put into their hands they wretchedly abused, and the leaders of the people caused them to err. Secondly, We cannot but look upon the deluded people with pity; "I have compassion on the multitude" to see them hurried thus violently to so great wickedness, to see them thus priest-ridden, and falling into the ditch with their blind leaders.

6th. Being thus overruled by the priests, at length they made their choice, ver. 21, "Whether of the twain," saith Pilate, "will ye that I release unto you?" hoping he had gained his point to have Jesus released. But to his great surprise they said, "Barabbas;" as if his crimes were less, and therefore he less deserved to die; or as if his merits were greater, and therefore he better deserved to live. The cry for Barabbas was so universal, one and all, that there was no colour to demand a poll between the candidates. "Be astonished, O heavens, at this, and thou, O earth, be horribly afraid!" Were ever men that pretended to reason or religion guilty of such prodigious madness, such horrid wickedness! This was it that Peter charged so home upon them, Acts iii. 14: "Ye desired a murderer to be granted you;" yet multitudes, who choose the world rather than God for their ruler and portion, thus choose their own delusions.

2. Their pressing earnestly to have Jesus crucified, ver. 22, 23. Pilate being amazed at their choice of Barabbas, was willing to hope it was rather from a fondness for him than from an enmity to Jesus, and therefore puts it to them, "What shall I do then with Jesus?" "Shall I release him likewise, for the greater honour of your feast? Or will you leave it to me?" No; "they all said, Let him be crucified." That death they desired he might die, because it was looked upon as the most scandalous and ignominious, and they hoped thereby to make his followers ashamed to own him and their relation to him. It was absurd for them to prescribe to the judge what sentence he should pass, but their malice and rage made them forget all rules of order and decency, and turned a court of justice into a riotous, routous, and seditious assembly. Now was truth fallen in the street, and equity could not enter; where one looked for judgment beheld oppression, the worst kind of oppression; for righteousness beheld a cry, the worst cry that ever was—Crucify, crucify, the Lord of glory! Though they that cried thus, perhaps, were not the same persons that the other day had cried, Hosanna; yet see what a change was made upon the face of the populary in a little time: when he rode in triumph into Jerusalem, so general were the acclamations of praise, that one would have thought he had no enemies; but now when he was led in triumph to Pilate's judgment seat, so general were the outcries of enmity, that one would think he had no friends. Such revolutions are there in this changeable world, through which our way to heaven lies, as our Master's did, by honour and dishonour, by evil report and good report, counter-changed, 2 Cor. vi. 8, that we may not be lifted up by honour, as if when we are applauded and caressed we had made our nest among the stars, and should die in that nest; nor yet be dejected or discouraged by dishonour, as if when we were despised and trampled upon we were trodden to the lowest hell, from which there is no redemption. Vides tu istos qui te laudant; omnes aut sunt hostes, aut (quod in æquo est) esse possunt—"You observe those who applaud you—either they are all your enemies, or, which is equivalent, they may become so." Seneca, de V. B. Now as to this demand, we are further told,

1st. How Pilate objected against it: "Why, what evil hath he done?" A proper question to ask before we censure any in common discourse, much more for a judge to ask before he pass a sentence of death. Note, It is much for the honour of the Lord Jesus, that though he suffered as an evildoer, yet neither his judge nor his prosecutors could find that he had done any evil. Had he done any evil against God? No; he always did those things that pleased him. Had he done any evil against the civil government? No; as he did himself so he taught others to "render to Caesar the things that were Caesar's." Had he done any evil against the public peace? No; he did not strive or cry, nor did his kingdom come with observation. Had he done any evil to particular persons? "Whose ox had he taken, or whom had he defrauded?" No; so far from that, that he "went about doing good." This repeated assertion of his unspotted innocence plainly intimates that he died to satisfy for the sins of others; for if it had not been for our transgressions that he was thus wounded, and for our offences that he was delivered up, and that upon his own voluntary undertaking to atone for them, I see not how these extraordinary sufferings of a person that had never thought, said, or done, anything amiss could be reconciled with the justice and equity of that Providence that governs the world, and at least permitted this to be done in it.

2nd. How they insisted upon it: "They cried out the more, Let him be crucified." They do not go about to show any evil he had done, but, right or wrong, he must be crucified; quitting all pretensions to the proof of the premises, they resolve to hold the conclusion, and what was wanting in evidence to make up in clamour; this unjust judge was wearied by importunity into an unjust sentence, as he in the parable into a just one, Lu. xviii. 4, and the cause carried purely by noise.

Thirdly. Here is the devolving of the guilt of Christ's blood upon the people and priests.

1. Pilate endeavours to transfer it from himself, ver. 24.

1st. He sees it to no purpose to contend. What he said, First, Would do no good, "he could prevail nothing;" he could not convince them what an unjust, unreasonable thing it was for him to condemn a man whom he believed innocent, and whom they could not prove guilty. See how strong the stream of lust and rage sometimes is, neither authority nor reason will prevail to give check to it. Nay, Secondly, It was more likely to do hurt; he saw "that rather a tumult was made;" this rude and brutish people fell to high words, and began to threaten Pilate what they would do if he did not gratify them; and how great a matter might this fire kindle, especially when the priests, those great incendiaries, blew the coals. Now this turbulent, tumultuous temper of the Jews, by which Pilate was awed to condemn Christ against his conscience, contributed more than anything to the ruin of that nation not long after; for their frequent insurrections provoked the Romans to destroy them, though they had reduced them; and their inveterate quarrels among themselves made them an easy prey to the common enemy: thus their sin was their ruin. Observe how easily we may be mistaken in the inclination of the common people; the priests were apprehensive that their endeavours to seize Christ would have caused an uproar, especially on the feast day; but it proved that Pilate's endeavour to save him caused an uproar, and that on the feast day: so uncertain are the sentiments of the crowd.

2nd. This puts him into a great strait, betwixt the peace of his own mind and the peace of the city; he is loath to condemn an innocent man, and yet loath to disoblige the people, and raise a devil that would not be soon laid. Had he steadily and resolutely adhered to the sacred laws of justice, as a judge ought to do, he had not been in any perplexity; the matter was plain and past dispute, that a man in whom was found no fault, ought not to be crucified upon any pretence whatsoever; nor must an unjust thing be done to gratify any man or company of men in the world; the cause is soon decided: Fiat justitia, ruat cælum—Let justice be done, though heaven and earth come together! If wickedness proceed from the wicked, though they be priests, yet my hand shall not be upon him.

3rd. Pilate thinks to trim the matter, and to pacify both the people and his own conscience too, by doing it and yet disowning it, acting the thing, and yet acquitting himself from it at the same time. Such absurdities and self-contradictions do they run upon whose convictions are strong, but their corruptions stronger; "Happy is he," saith the apostle, Rom. xiv. 22, "that condemneth not himself in that thing which he allows;" or, which is all one, that allows not himself in that thing which he condemns. Now Pilate endeavours to clear himself from the guilt.

First, By a sign: "He took water, and washed his hands before the multitude, not as if he thought thereby to cleanse himself from any guilt contracted before God, but to acquit himself before the people, from so much as contracting any guilt in this matter; as if he should say, 'If it be done, bear witness it is none of my doing.'" He borrowed the ceremony from that law which appointed it to be used for the clearing of the country from the guilt of an undiscovered murder, Deu. xxi. 6, 7; and he used it the more to affect the people with the conviction he was under of the prisoner's innocence; and probably such was the noise of the rabble, that if he had not used some such surprising sign in the view of them all, he could not have been heard.

Secondly, By a saying, in which, 1st. He clears himself, "I am innocent of the blood of this just person:" what nonsense was this, to condemn him, and yet protest he is innocent of his blood! but for men to protest against a thing and yet to practise it, is only to proclaim that they sin against their consciences; and though Pilate professed his innocence, God chargeth him with guilt, Acts iv. 27. Some think to justify themselves by pleading that their hands were not in the sin; but David kills by the sword of the children of Ammon, and Ahab by the elders of Jezreel; Pilate here thinks to justify himself by pleading that his heart was not in the action; but that is an avowment which will never be admitted: Protestatio non valet contra factum—"in vain does he protest against the deed, which at the same time he perpetrates." 2nd. He cast it upon the priests and people, "See ye to it;" "if it must be done, I cannot help it, do you answer it before God and the world." Note, Sin is a brat that nobody is willing to own; and many deceive themselves with this, that they shall bear no blame if they can but find any to lay the blame upon; but it is not so easy a thing to transfer the guilt of sin as many think it is. The condition of him that is infected with the plague is not the less dangerous, either for his catching the infection from others, or his communicating the infection to others: we may be ascribed to Zechariah. Another is that the Syriac represents the original reading, to which somebody at a very early date added wrongly the name of Jeremiah. Some have maintained that the error belongs to the evangelist himself, but the safest course is to leave it as a problem not yet clearly solved.

xvii. 11. To the very direct question of Pilate, Jesus gave as direct an answer, the words "Thou sayest" being equivalent to an affirmative.

xvii. 16. The word "notable," or distinguished, may refer to the position of Barabbas in society, or it may merely mean that he was well known and notorious. We prefer the latter explanation. The name is Syriac, meaning "a father's son," perhaps because resembling his father when an infant, perhaps because his father's favourite (Prov. iv. 3). Dean Alford says the name was not an uncommon one, and possibly it was not.

xvii. 19. The incident recorded here has been taken advantage tempted to sin, but cannot be forced. The priests threw it upon Judas, "See thou to it;" and now Pilate throws it upon them, "See ye to it;" "for with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you."

2. The priests and people consented to take the guilt upon themselves; they said, "His blood be on us, and on our children;" "we are so well assured that there is neither sin nor danger in putting him to death, that we are willing to run the hazard of it;" as if the guilt would do harm to them or theirs. They saw that it was the dread of guilt that made Pilate hesitate, and that he was getting over this difficulty by a fancy of transferring it; to prevent the return of hesitation, and to confirm him in that fancy, they in the heat of their rage agreed to it rather than lose the prey they had in their hands, and cried, "His blood be upon us." Now,

1st. By this they designed to indemnify Pilate, that is, to make him think himself indemnified, by becoming bound to Divine justice to save him harmless. But those that are themselves bankrupts and beggars will never be admitted security for others, nor taken as a bail for them. None could bear the sin of others but he that had none of his own to answer for; it is a bold undertaking, and too big for any creature, to become bound for a sinner to Almighty God.

2nd. But they did really imprecate wrath and vengeance upon themselves and their posterity. What a desperate word was this, and how little did they think what was the direful import of it! nor to what an abyss of misery it would bring them and theirs! Christ had lately told them, that upon them would "come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from that of righteous Abel;" but as if that were too little, they here imprecate upon themselves the guilt of that blood, which was more precious than all the rest, and the guilt of which would lie heavier. O the daring presumption of wilful sinners, that run upon God, upon his neck, and defy his justice! Job xv. 25, 26. Observe.

First. How cruel they were in their imprecation; they not only imprecated the punishment of this sin upon themselves, but upon their children too, even those that were yet unborn, without so much as limiting the entail of the curse, as God himself had been pleased to limit it, to the third and fourth generation. It was madness to pull it upon themselves, but the height of barbarity to entail it on their posterity. Sure they were like the ostrich, hardened against their young ones, as though they were not theirs. What a dreadful conveyance was this of guilt and wrath to them and their heirs for ever, and this delivered by joint consent, nemine contradicente—unanimously, as their own act and deed, which certainly amounted to a forfeiture and defeasance of that ancient charter, "I will be a God to thee, and to thy seed;" their entailing the curse of the Messiah's blood upon their nation, cut off the entail of the blessings of that blood from their families, that, according to another promise made to Abraham, in him all the families of the earth might be blessed. See what enemies wicked men are to their own children and families; those that damn their own souls, care not how many they take to hell with them.

Secondly. How righteous God was in his retribution according to this imprecation; they said, "His blood be on us, and on our children," and God said Amen to it, so shall thy doom be; as they loved cursing, so it came upon them. The wretched remains of that abandoned people feel it to this day; from the time they imprecated this blood upon them they were followed with one judgment after another, till they were quite laid waste, and made an astonishment, a hissing, and a by-word; yet on some of them, and some of theirs, this blood came not to condemn them, but to save them: Divine mercy upon their repenting and believing cut off this entail; and then the promise was again to them, and to their children. God is better to us and ours than we are.

26 Then released he Barabbas unto them: and when he had scourged Jesus, he delivered him to be crucified. 27 Then the soldiers of the governor took Jesus into the common hall, and gathered unto him the whole band of soldiers. 28 And they stripped him, and put on him a scarlet robe. 29 And when they had platted a crown of thorns, they put it upon his head, and a reed in his right hand: and they bowed the knee before him, and mocked him, saying, Hail, King of the Jews! 30 And they spit upon him, and took the reed, and smote him on the head. 31 And after that they had mocked him, they took the robe off from him, and put his own raiment on him, and led him away to crucify him. 32 And as they came out, they found a man of Cyrene, Simon by name: him they compelled to bear his cross.

In these verses we have the preparatives for, and prefaces to, the crucifixion of our Lord Jesus. Here is, First. The sentence passed and the warrant signed for his execution, and this immediately, the same hour.

1. Barabbas was released, that notorious criminal; if he had not been put in competition with Christ for the favour of the people, it is likely he had died for his crimes, but that proved the means of his escape, to intimate that Christ was condemned for this purpose, that sinners, even the chief of sinners, might be released; he was delivered up that we might be delivered, whereas the common instance of Divine providence is, that "the wicked is a ransom for the righteous, and the transgressor for the upright," Pr. xxi. 18; xi. 18. In this unparalleled instance of Divine grace the upright is a ransom for the transgressors, the just for the unjust.

2. Jesus was scourged: this was an ignominious, cruel punishment, especially as it was inflicted by the Romans, who were not under the moderation of the Jewish law, which forbade scourgings above forty stripes, and most unreasonably inflicted on one that was sentenced to die; the rods were not to introduce the axes, but supersede them. Thus the Scripture was fulfilled: "The ploughers ploughed on my back," Ps. cxix. 3; and Isa. l. 6, "I gave my back to the smiters;" and Isa. liii. 5, "By his stripes we are healed;" he was chastised with whips, that we might not be for ever chastised with scorpions.

3. He was then "delivered to be crucified;" though his chastisement was in order to our peace, yet there is no peace made but by "the blood of his cross," Col. i. 20: therefore the scourging is not enough, he must be crucified; a kind of death used only among the Romans, the manner of it such as that it seems to be the result of wit and cruelty in combination, each putting forth itself to the utmost to make death in the highest degree terrible and miserable. A cross was set up in the ground, to which the hands and feet were nailed, on which nails the weight of the body hung, till it died of the pain. This was the death to which Christ was condemned, that he might answer the type of the brazen serpent lifted up upon a pole: it was a bloody death,—a painful, shameful, cursed death; it was so miserable a death, that merciful princes appointed those who were condemned to it by the law to be strangled first, and then nailed to the cross: so Julius Cæsar did by some pirates, Sueton. l. 1. Constantine, the first Christian emperor, by an edict abolished the use of that punishment among the Romans, Sozomen. Hist. l. i. c. 8. Ne salutare signum subseruiet ad perniciem—"that the symbol of salvation might not be subservient to the victims' destruction."

Secondly. The barbarous treatment which the soldiers gave him, while things were getting ready for his execution. When he was condemned, he ought to have had some time allowed him to prepare for death; there was a law made by the Roman senate in Tiberius's time, perhaps upon complaint of this and the like precipitation, that the execution of criminals should be deferred at least ten days after sentence, Sueton. in Tiber. c. 25; but there were scarce allowed so many minutes to our Lord Jesus; nor had he any breathing time during those minutes: it was a crisis, and there were no lucid intervals allowed him, "deep called unto deep," and the storm continued without any intermission.

When he was "delivered to be crucified," that was enough; they that kill the body, yield there is no more that they can do; but Christ's enemies will do more, and if it be possible wrap up a thousand deaths in one. Though Pilate pronounced him innocent, yet his soldiers, his guards, set themselves to abuse him, being swayed more by the fury of the people against him, than by their master's testimony for him; the Jewish rabble infected the Roman soldiery, or perhaps it was not so much in spite to him, as to make sport for themselves, that they thus abused him. They understood that he pretended to a crown, and to taunt him with that gave them some diversion, and an opportunity to make themselves and one another merry. Note, It is an argument of a base, servile, sordid spirit to insult over those that are in misery, and to make the calamities of any matter of sport and merriment. Observe,

1. Where this was done; in "the common hall." The governor's house, which should have been a shelter to the wronged and abused, is made the theatre of this barbarity. I wonder the governor, who was so desirous to acquit himself from the blood of this just person, would suffer this to be done in his house. Perhaps he did not order it to be done, but he connived at it; and those in authority will be accountable not only for the wickedness which they do, or appoint, but for that which they do not restrain, when it is in the power of their hands. Masters of families should not suffer their houses to be the places of abuse to any, nor their servants to make sport with the sins, or miseries, or religion of others.

2. Who were concerned in it. "They gathered the whole band;" the soldiers that were to attend the execution would have the whole regiment (at least five hundred, some think twelve or thirteen hundred,) to share in the diversion. If Christ was thus made a spectacle, let none of his followers think it strange to be so used, 1 Cor. iv. 9; Heb. x. 33.

3. What particular indignities were done him:

1st. "They stripped him," ver. 28. The shame of nakedness came in with sin, Gen. iii. 7; and therefore Christ, when he came to satisfy for sin, and take it away, was made naked, and submitted to that shame, that he might prepare for us white raiment to cover us, Rev. iii. 18.

2nd. They "put on him a scarlet robe;" some old red cloak, such as the Roman soldiers wore, in imitation of the scarlet robes which kings and emperors wore, thus upbraiding him with his being called a king. This sham of majesty they put upon him in his dress, when nothing but meanness and misery appeared in his countenance, only to expose him to the spectators as the more ridiculous; yet there was something of mystery in it: this was he that was red in his apparel, Isa. lxiii. 1, 2; that washed his garments in wine, Gen. xlix. 10; therefore he was dressed in a scarlet robe. Our sins were as scarlet and crimson; Christ's being clad in a scarlet robe, signified his bearing our sins, to his shame, in his own body upon the tree, that we might wash our robes and make them white in the blood of the Lamb.

3rd. They "platted a crown of thorns, and put it upon his head," ver. 29. This was to carry on the humour of making him a mock king; yet, had they intended it only for a reproach, they might have platted a crown of straw or rushes, but they designed it to be painful to him, and to be literally, what crowns are said to be figuratively, lined with thorns; he that invented this abuse, it is likely, valued himself upon the wit of it; but there was a mystery in it.

First. Thorns came in with sin, and were part of the curse that was the product of sin, Gen. iii. 18. Therefore Christ being made a curse for us, and dying to remove the curse from us, felt the pain and smart of those thorns, nay, and binds them as a crown to him, Job xxxi. 36, for his sufferings for us were his glory. Secondly. Now he answered the type of Abraham's ram that was caught in the thicket, and so offered up instead of Isaac, Gen. xxii. 13. Thirdly. Thorns signify afflictions, 2 Chr. xxxiii. 11. These Christ put into a crown, so much did he alter the property of them to them that are his, and give them cause to "glory in tribulation," and made it to work for them a weight of glory.

Fourthly. Christ was crowned with thorns, to shew that his kingdom was not of this world, nor the glory of it worldly glory, but attended here with bonds and afflictions, while the glory of it is to be revealed. Fifthly. It was the custom of some heathen nations to bring their sacrifices to the altars crowned with garlands; these thorns were the garlands with which this great sacrifice was crowned. Sixthly. These thorns, it is likely, fetched blood from his blessed head, which trickled down his face "like the precious ointment" (typifying the blood of Christ with which he consecrated himself) "upon the head, which ran down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard," Ps. cxxxiii. 2. Thus when he came to espouse to himself his love, his dove, his undefiled church, "his head was filled with dew, and his locks with the drops of the night," Cant. v. 2.

4th. They "put a reed in his right hand;" this was intended for a mock sceptre, another of the insignia of the majesty they jeered him with, as if this were a sceptre good enough for such a king, as was like "a reed shaken with the wind," ch. xi. 7; like sceptre, like kingdom, both weak and wavering, and withering and worthless; but they were quite mistaken, for his throne is "for ever and ever, and the sceptre of his kingdom is a right sceptre," Ps. xlv. 6.

5th. "They bowed the knee before him, and mocked him, saying, Hail, King of the Jews." Having made him a sham king, they thus made a jest of doing homage to him, thus ridiculing his pretensions to sovereignty, as Joseph's brethren, Gen. xxxvii. 8, "shalt thou indeed reign over us?" But as they were afterwards compelled to do obeisance to him, and enrich his dreams, so these here bowed the knee in scorn to him, who was soon after this exalted to the of by the framers of legends, who say the wife of Pilate was called Procla, or Claudia Procula. The so-called "Gospel of Nicodemus" (chap. ii.) represents Pilate as more than hinting that his wife had embraced Jewish religious opinions. The Greek Church commemorates Procla on October 28th, and the Ethiopic calendar contains both her name and that of Pilate. The reason is, that Pilate attested the innocence of Jesus, and Procla sought to effect his deliverance from the Jews.

xxvii. 24. The use of water was enjoined upon the Jews (Deut. xxi. 6, 7) in purging themselves from the guilt of murder. Similar emblematic usages were known among the Greeks and Romans, but they were more frequent among the Jews, and hence probably the act of Pilate.

xxvii. 26. Crucifixion, or impalement, was practised by several ancient nations. Before execution the criminal was often scourged. Hence Lucian, "In my opinion he ought to be crucified, having been right hand of God, that "to his name every knee might bow," or break before him. It is ill jesting with that which, sooner or later, will come in earnest.

6th. "They spit upon him:" thus he had been abused in the high priest's hall, ch. xxvi. 67. In doing homage, the subject kissed the sovereign in token of his allegiance; thus Samuel kissed Saul, and we are bid to "kiss the Son;" but they, in this mock homage, instead of kissing him spat in his face; that blessed face, which outshines the sun, and before which the angels cover theirs, was thus polluted. It is strange that the sons of men should ever do such a piece of villany, and that the Son of God should ever suffer such a piece of ignominy.

7th. They "took the reed, and smote him on the head." That which they had made the mock ensign of his royalty, they now make the real instrument of their cruelty, and his pain. They smote him, it is probable, upon the crown of thorns, and so struck them into his head, that they might wound it the deeper, which made the more sport for them, to whom his pain was the greatest pleasure. Thus was he "despised and rejected of men, a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief." All this misery and shame he underwent that he might purchase for us everlasting life, and joy, and glory.

Thirdly, The conveying of him to the place of execution. After they had mocked and abused him, as long as they thought fit, they then "took the robe off from him," to signify their divesting him of all that kingly authority they had invested him with, by putting it on him; and they put his own raiment on him, because that was to fall to the soldiers' share that were employed in the execution. They took off the robe, but no mention is made of their taking off the crown of thorns, whence it is commonly supposed (though there is no certainty of it) that he was crucified with that on his head; for, as he is a priest upon his throne, so he was a king upon his cross. Christ was led to be crucified in his own raiment, because he himself was to "bear our sins in his own body upon the tree." And here,

1. They lead him away to be crucified. "He was led as a lamb to the slaughter," as a sacrifice to the altar. We may well imagine how they hurried him on, and dragged him along with all the speed possible, lest any thing should intervene to prevent the glutting of their cruel rage with his precious blood. It is likely they now loaded him with taunts and reproaches, and treated him as the offscouring of all things. They led him away out of the city, for Christ, "that he might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate," Heb. xiii. 12, as if he that was the glory of them that waited for redemption in Jerusalem, were not worthy to live among them. To this he himself had an eye when, in the parable, he speaks of his being cast out of the vineyard, ch. xxii. 39.

2. They compelled Simon of Cyrene to bear his cross, ver. 30. It seems at first he carried the cross himself, as Isaac carried the wood for the burnt offering, which was to burn him. And this was intended, as other things, both for pain and shame to him. But, after a while, they took the cross off from him, either, 1st. In compassion to him, because they saw it was too great a load for him. We can hardly think they had any consideration of that; yet it teaches us that God considers the frame of his people, and will not "suffer them to be tempted above what they are able;" he gives them some breathing-time, but they must expect that the cross will return, and the lucid intervals only give them space to prepare for the next fit. But, 2nd. Perhaps it was because he could not, with the cross on his back, go forward so fast as they would have him. Or, 3rd. They were afraid lest he should faint away under the load of his cross, and die, and so prevent what their malice further intended to do against him. Thus even the tender mercies of the wicked, which seem to be so, are really cruel. Taking the cross off from him, they compelled one Simon of Cyrene, pressing him to the service by the authority of the governor or the priests. It was a reproach, and none would do it but by compulsion. Some think this Simon was a disciple of Christ, at least a well-wisher to him, and they knew it, and therefore put this upon him. Note, All that will approve themselves disciples indeed, must follow Christ, "bearing his cross," ch. xvi. 14; "bearing his reproach," Heb. xiii. 13; we must know "the fellowship of his sufferings" for us, and patiently submit to all the sufferings for him we are called out to; for those only shall reign with him that suffer with him, shall sit with him in his kingdom that drink of his cup, and are baptized with his baptism.

33 And when they were come unto a place called Golgotha, that is to say, a place of a skull, 34 They gave him vinegar to drink mingled with gall: and when he had tasted thereof, he would not drink. 35 And they crucified him, and parted his garments, casting lots: that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, They parted my garments among them, and upon my vesture did they cast lots. 36 And sitting down they watched him there; 37 And set up over his head his accusation written, THIS IS JESUS THE KING OF THE JEWS. 38 Then were there two thieves crucified with him, one on the right hand, and another on the left. 39 And they that passed by reviled him, wagging their heads, 40 And saying, Thou that destroyest the temple, and buildest it in three days, save thyself. If thou be the Son of God, come down from the cross. 41 Likewise also the chief priests mocking him, with the scribes and elders said, 42 He saved others; himself he cannot save. If he be the King of Israel, let him now come down from the cross, and we will believe him. 43 He trusted in God; let him deliver him now, if he will have him: for he said, I am the Son of God. 44 The thieves also, which were crucified with him, cast the same in his teeth. 45 Now from the sixth hour there was darkness over all the land unto the ninth hour. 46 And about the ninth hour Jesus cried with a loud voice, saying, Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani? that is to say, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? 47 Some of them that stood there, when they heard that, said, This man calleth for Elias. 48 And straightway one of them ran, and took a sponge, and filled it with vinegar, and put it on a reed, and gave him to drink. 49 The rest said, Let be, let us see whether Elias will come to save him.

We have here the crucifixion of our Lord Jesus. First. The place where our Lord Jesus was put to death.

1. They came to a place called Golgotha, near adjoining to Jerusalem, probably the common place of execution. If he had had a house of his own in Jerusalem, probably, for his greater disgrace, they would have crucified him before his own door. But now, in the same place where criminals were sacrificed to the justice of the government, was our Lord Jesus sacrificed to the justice of God. Some think it is called the place of a skull, because it was the common charnel-house, where the bones and skulls of dead men were laid together out of the way, lest people should touch them, and be defiled thereby. Here lay the trophies of death's victory over multitudes of the children of men; and when, by dying, Christ would destroy death, he added this circumstance of honour to his victory, that he triumphed over death upon his own dunghill.

2. There they crucified him, ver. 35; nailed his hands and feet to the cross, and then reared it up, and him hanging on it; for so the manner of the Romans was to crucify. Let our hearts be touched with the feeling of that exquisite pain which our blessed Saviour now endured, and let us look upon him who was thus pierced, and mourn. Was ever sorrow like unto his sorrow? And when we behold what manner of death he died, let us in that behold with what manner of love he loved us.

Secondly. The barbarous and abusive treatment they gave him, in which their wit and malice vied which should excel; as if death, so great a death, were not bad enough, they contrived to add to the bitterness and terror of it.

1. By the drink they provided for him before he was nailed to the cross, ver. 34. It was usual to have a cup of spiced wine for those to drink of that were to be put to death, according to Solomon's direction, Pr. xxxi. 6, 7. "Give strong drink to him that is ready to perish;" but with that cup which Christ was to drink of, they mingled wormwood and gall, to make it sour and bitter. This signified, 1st. The sin of man, which is a root of bitterness, "bearing gall and wormwood," Deu. xxix. 18. The sinner perhaps rolls it under his tongue as a sweet morsel, but to God it is grapes of gall, Deu. xxxii. 32. It was so to the Lord Jesus when he bore our sins, and, sooner or later, it will be so to the sinner himself, bitterness at the latter end, more bitter than death, Eccl. vii. 26. 2nd. It signified the wrath of God; that cup which his Father put into his hand, a bitter cup indeed, like the bitter water which caused the curse, Num. v. 18. This drink they offered him, as was literally foretold, Ps. lxxix. 21. And, 3rd. He tasted thereof, and so had the worst of it; took the bitter taste into his mouth; he let no bitter cup go by him untasted, when he was making atonement for all our sinful tasting of forbidden fruit, now he was tasting death in its full bitterness. Secondly. He would not drink it, because he would not have the best of it; would have nothing like an opiate to lessen his sense of pain; for he would die so as to feel himself die, because he had so much work to do, as our high priest, in his suffering work.

2. By the dividing of his garments, ver. 35. When they nailed him to the cross, they stripped him of his garments, at least his upper garments; for by sin we were made naked to our shame, and thus he purchased for us white raiment to cover us. If we be at any time stripped of our comforts for Christ, let us bear it patiently; he was stripped for us. Enemies may strip us of our clothes, but cannot strip us of our best comforts; cannot take from us the garments of praise. The clothes of those that are executed are the executioner's fee. Four soldiers were employed in crucifying Christ, and they must each of them have a share. His upper garment, if it were divided, would be of no use to any of them, and therefore they agreed to cast lots for it. 1st. Some think the garment was so fine and rich that it was worth contending for; but that agreed not with the poverty Christ appeared in. 2nd. Perhaps they had heard of those that had been cured by touching the hem of his garment, and they thought it valuable for some magic virtue in it. Or, 3rd. They hoped to get money of his friends for such a sacred relic. Or, 4th. Because, in derision, they would seem to put a value upon it as royal clothing. Or, 5th. It was for diversion, to pass away the time while they waited for his death, they would play a game at dice for the clothes; but, whatever they designed, the Word of God was herein accomplished. In that famous Psalm, the first words of which Christ made use of upon the cross, it was said, "they parted my garments among them, and cast lots upon my vesture," Ps. xxii. 18, which was never true of David, but looks primarily at Christ, of whom David in spirit spake: then is the offence of this part of the cross ceased; for it appears to have been "by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God." Christ stripped himself of his glories to divide them among us. They now sat down and watched him, ver. 36. The chief priests were careful, no doubt, in setting this guard, lest the people, whom they still stood in awe of, should rise and rescue him. But Providence so ordered it, that those who were appointed to watch him, thereby became unexceptionable witnesses for him; having the opportunity to see and hear that which extorted from them that noble confession, ver. 34, "Truly this was the Son of God."

3. By the title set up over his head, ver. 37. It was usual, for the vindicating of public justice, and putting the greater shame upon malefactors that were executed, not only by a cry to proclaim before them, but by a writing also over their heads, to notify what was the crime for which they suffered; so they set up over Christ's head, his accusation written, to give public notice of the charge against him, "This is Jesus, the King of the Jews." This they designed first scourged;" and Livy, "Some, who had been ringleaders of the conspiracy at Etruria, the prætor scourged with rods and then crucified." Millington's "Testimony of the Heathen" gives other examples.

xxvii. 27. The soldiers were Roman soldiers, who at once proceeded to execute their commission. The common hall is called the Prætorium in the Greek, where the term seems to be used of the place where the guards were stationed. The residence of Pilate as a whole was correctly called the Prætorium, and as a matter of fact, it was the former palace of Herod at Jerusalem, built with great magnificence, in a commanding position. What is here called a "band of soldiers" was, strictly speaking, a cohort, or the tenth part of a legion, but the actual number of men varied considerably.

xxvii. 29. We cannot say what thorns were employed for this crown. Many kinds of thorns are found in Palestine. Of one of them, the sisyphus, or jujube-tree, Dr. Tristram says, "The flexible for his reproach, but God so overruled it, that even his accusation redounded to his honour. For, 1st. Here was no crime alleged against him. It is not said that he was a pretended Saviour, or a usurping king, though they would have it thought so, Jno. xix. 21. But, This is Jesus, a Saviour, to be sure that was no crime; and, This is the King of the Jews, nor was that a crime,—for they expected that the Messiah should be so,—so that, his enemies themselves being judges, he did no evil. Nay, 2nd. Here was a very glorious truth asserted concerning him, that he is Jesus, the King of the Jews, that king whom the Jews expected, and ought to have submitted to; so that his accusation amounts to this,—that he was the true Messiah, and Saviour of the world: as Balaam, when he was sent for to curse Israel, blessed them altogether, and that three times, Num. xxiv. 10; so Pilate, instead of accusing Christ as a criminal, proclaimed him a king, and that three times, in three inscriptions. Thus God makes men to serve his purposes quite beyond their own.

4. By his companions with him in suffering, ver. 38. "There were two thieves crucified with him" at the same time, in the same place, under the same guard. Two highwaymen, or robbers upon the road, as the word properly signifies. It is probable this was appointed to be the execution day, and therefore they hurried the prosecution of Christ in the morning, that they might have him ready to be executed with the other criminals. Some think Pilate ordered it thus, that this piece of necessary justice in executing these thieves, might atone for his injustice in condemning Christ; others, that the Jews contrived it to add to the ignominy of the sufferings of our Lord Jesus; however it was, the Scripture was fulfilled in it, Isa. liii. 12. "He was numbered with the transgressors."

1st. It was a reproach to him that he was crucified with them. Though, while he lived, he was separate from sinners, yet, in their deaths, they were not divided; but he was made to partake with the vilest malefactors in their plagues, as if he had been a partaker with them in their sins; for he was made sin for us, and took upon him "the likeness of sinful flesh." He was at his death numbered among the transgressors, and had his lot with the wicked, that we, at our death, might be numbered among the saints, and have our lot among the chosen.

2nd. It was an additional reproach that he was crucified in the midst between them, as if he had been the worst of the three, the principal malefactor; for among three, the middle is the place for the chief. Every circumstance was contrived to his dishonour, as if the great Saviour were of all other the greatest sinner. It was also intended to ruffle and discompose him in his last moments with the shrieks, and groans, and blasphemies of these malefactors, who, it is likely, made a hideous outcry when they were nailed to the cross; but thus would Christ affect himself with the miseries of sinners, when he was suffering for their salvation. Some of Christ's apostles were afterwards crucified, as Peter and Andrew, but none of them were crucified with him, lest it should have looked as if they had been joint undertakers with him in satisfying for man's sin, and joint purchasers of life and glory; therefore he was crucified between two malefactors, who could not be supposed to contribute any thing to the merit of his death; for he "himself bore our sins in his own body."

5. By the blasphemies and revilings with which they loaded him when he was hanging upon the cross; though we read not that they cast any reflections on the thieves that were crucified with him. One would have thought when they had nailed him to the cross, they had done their worst, and malice itself had been exhausted. Indeed, if a criminal be put in the pillory, or carted, because it is a punishment less than death, it is usually attended with such expressions of abuse; but a dying man, though an ill man, should be treated with compassion. It is an insatiable revenge, indeed, which will not be satisfied with death, so great a death. But to complete the humiliation of the Lord Jesus, and to shew that when he was dying, he was bearing iniquity, he was then loaded with reproach, and for aught appears, not one of his friends, who the other day cried hosanna to him, durst be seen to shew him any respect.

1st. The common people "that passed by reviled him." His extreme misery, and exemplary patience under it, did not mollify them, or make them to relent; but they who by their outcries brought him to this, now think to justify themselves in it by their reproaches, as if they did well to condemn him. They reviled him, ἱσακονῶντες; they blasphemed him, and blasphemy it was in the strictest sense, speaking evil of him who "thought it not robbery to be equal with God." Observe here,

First. The persons that reviled him. "They that passed by,"—the travellers that went along the road, and it was a great road, leading from Jerusalem to Gibeon,—they were possessed with prejudices against him by the reports and clamours of the high priest's creatures. It is a hard thing, and requires more application and resolution than is ordinarily met with, to keep up a good opinion of persons and things that are every where run down and spoken against. Every one is apt to say as the most say, and to throw a stone at that which is put into an ill name. Turba Remi sequitur fortunam semper et odit damnatos,—"the Roman rabble fluctuate with a man's fluctuating fortunes, and fail not to depress those that are sinking." Juv.

Secondly. The gesture they used in contempt of him; "Wagging their heads," which signifies their triumph in his fall, and their insulting over him, Isa. xxxvii. 22; Jer. xviii. 16; Lam. ii. 15. The language of it was, "Aha, so would we have it," Ps. xxxv. 25. Thus they insulted over him that was the Saviour of their country, as the Philistines did over Samson, the destroyer of their country. This very gesture was prophesied of, Ps. xxii. 8, "They shake the head at me;" and Ps. cix. 25.

Thirdly. The taunts and jeers they uttered. These are here recorded. 1st. They upbraided him with his destroying the temple. Though the judges themselves were sensible that what he had said of that was misrepresented, as appears, Mark xiv. 19, yet they industriously spread it among the people, to bring an odium upon him, that he had a design to destroy the temple, than which nothing would more incense the people against him. And this was not the only time that the enemies of Christ had laboured to make others believe that ill of religion, and the people of God, which they themselves have known to be false, and the charge unjust. "Thou that destroyest the temple," that vast and strong fabric, try thy strength now in plucking up that cross, and drawing those nails, and so save thyself; if thou hast the power thou hast boasted of, this is a proper time to exert it, and give proof of it; for it is supposed every man will do his utmost to save himself. This made the cross of Christ such a stumbling-block to the Jews, that they looked upon it to be inconsistent with the power of the Messiah; he was crucified in weakness, 2 Cor. xiii. 4. So it seemed to them; but indeed Christ crucified is the power of God. 2nd. They upbraided him with his saying that he was the Son of God; if thou be so, say they, "Come down from the cross." Now they take the devil's words out of his mouth, with which he tempted him in the wilderness, ch. iv. 3, 6, and renew the same assault, "If thou be the Son of God." They think, now or never he must prove himself to be the Son of God; forgetting that he had proved it by the miracles he wrought, particularly his raising the dead; nor willing to wait for the complete proof of it by his own resurrection, to which he had so often referred himself and them; which, if they had observed it, would have anticipated the offence of the cross. This comes of judging things by the present aspect of them, without a due remembrance of what is past, and a patient expectation of what may further be produced.

2nd. The chief priests and scribes, the church rulers and the elders, the rulers, they mocked him, ver. 41. They did not think it enough to invite the rabble to do it, but gave Christ the dishonour, and themselves the diversion, of reproaching him in their own proper persons. They should have been in the temple at their devotion; for it was the first day of the feast of unleavened bread, when there was to be a holy convocation, Lev. xxiii. 7; but they were here at the place of execution, spitting their venom at the Lord Jesus. How much below the grandeur and gravity of their character was this? Could any thing tend more to make them contemptible and base before the people? One would have thought, though they neither feared God, nor regarded man yet common prudence should have taught them, who had so great a hand in Christ's death, to keep as much as might be behind the curtain, and to play least in sight; but nothing is so mean as that malice may stick at it. Did they disparage themselves thus to do despite to Christ, and shall we be afraid of disparaging ourselves by joining with the multitude to do him honour, and not rather say, "If this be to be vile, I will be yet more vile." Two things the priests and elders upbraided him with:

First. That he could not save himself, ver. 42. He had been before abused in his prophetic and kingly office, and now in his priestly office as a Saviour. 1st. They take it for granted he could not save himself, and therefore had not the power he pretended to, when really he would not save himself, because he would die to save us. They should have argued, "he saved others, therefore he could save himself; and if he do not, it is for some good reason." But, 2nd. They would insinuate, that because he did not now save himself, therefore all his pretence to save others was but sham and delusion, and was never really done; though the truth of his miracles was demonstrated beyond contradiction. 3rd. They upbraided him with being the king of Israel. They dreamed of the external pomp and power of the Messiah, and therefore thought the cross altogether disagreeable to the king of Israel, and inconsistent with that character. Many people could like the king of Israel well enough, if he would but come down from the cross,—if they could have his kingdom without the tribulation, through which they must enter into it. But the matter is settled, if no cross, then no Christ, no crown; those that would reign with him, must be willing to suffer with him, for Christ and his cross are nailed together in this world. 4th. They challenged him to come down from the cross, and so to have left his undertaking unfinished, we had been for ever undone; but his unchangeable love and resolution set him above and fortified him against this temptation, so that he did not fail, nor was discouraged. 5th. They promised, that if he would come down from the cross, they would believe him. Let him give them that proof of his being the Messiah, and they would own him to be so. When they had formerly demanded a sign, he told them the sign he would give them should be, not his coming down from the cross, but which was a greater instance of his power, his coming up from the grave, which they had not patience to wait two or three days for. If he had come down from the cross, they might with as much reason have said that the soldiers had juggled in nailing him to it, as they said, when he was raised from the dead, that the "disciples came by night and stole him away." But to promise ourselves, that we would believe, if we had such and such means and motives of faith, as we ourselves would prescribe, when we do not improve what God has appointed, is not only a gross instance of the deceitfulness of our hearts, but the sorry refuge, or subterfuge rather, of an obstinate, destroying infidelity.

Secondly. That God his Father would not save him, ver. 43: "He trusted in God," that is, he pretended to do so; for he said, "I am the Son of God." Those who call God Father, and themselves his children, thereby profess to put a confidence in him, Ps. ix. 10. Now they suggest, that he did but deceive himself and others, when he made himself so much the darling of Heaven; for if he had been the Son of God, (as Job's friends argued concerning him,) he would not have been abandoned to all this misery, much less abandoned in it. This was a sword in his bones, as David complains of the like, Ps. xlii. 10; and it was a two-edged sword, for it was intended, 1st. To vilify him, and to make the standers-by think him a deceiver and an impostor; as if his saying that he was the Son of God were now effectually disproved. 2nd. To terrify him, and drive him to distrust and despair of his Father's power and love; which some think was the thing he feared, religiously feared, prayed against, and was delivered from, Heb. v. 7. David complained more of the endeavours of his persecutors to shake his faith, and drive him from his hope in God, than of their attempts to shake his throne, and drive him from his kingdom; their saying, "There is no help for him in God," Ps. iii. 2; and "God has forsaken him," Ps. lxxi. 11. In this, as in other things, he was a type of Christ. Nay, these very words David, in that famous prophecy of Christ, mentions, as spoken by his enemies, Ps. xxii. 8: He "trusted on the Lord that he would deliver him." Sure these priests and scribes had forgot their psalter, or they would not have used these same words, so exactly to answer the type and prophecy. But "the Scriptures must be fulfilled."

3rd. To complete the reproach, "the thieves also which were crucified with him" were not only not reviled as he was, as if they had been saints, compared with him; but, though fellow sufferers with him, joined in with his persecutors, and "cast the same in his teeth," that is, one of them did, who said, "If thou be the Christ, save thyself and us," Lu. xxiii. 39. One would think, of all people, this thief had least cause, and should have had least mind to banter Christ. Partners in suffering, though for different causes, usually commiserate one another; and few, whatever they have done before, will breathe their last in revilings; but it seems the greatest mortifications of the body, and the most humbling rebukes of Providence, will not of themselves mortify the corruptions of the soul, nor suppress the wickedness of the wicked, without the grace of God.

Well, thus our Lord Jesus, having undertaken to satisfy the justice of God, for the wrong done him in his honour by sin, he did it by suffering in his honour; not only by divesting himself of that which was due to him as the Son of God, but by submitting to the utmost indignity that could be done to the worst of men; because he was made sin for us, he was thus made a curse for us, to make reproach easy to us, if at any time we suffer it, and have all manner of evil said against us falsely for righteousness' sake.

Thirdly. We have here the frowns of Heaven which our Lord Jesus was under, in the midst of all these injuries and indignities from men. Concerning which, observe,

1. How this was signified by an extraordinary and miraculous eclipse of the sun, which continued for three hours, ver. 45. There was darkness ἐν τῷ ἡλίῳ, "over all the earth," so most interpreters understand it, though our translation confines it to that land. Some of the ancients appealed to the annals of the nations concerning this extraordinary eclipse at the death of Christ, as a thing well known, and which gave notice to those parts of the world of something great then in doing, as the sun's going back in Hezekiah's time did. It is reported that Dionysius, at Heliopolis, in Egypt, took notice of boughs are tough, and well suited for the purpose." He also mentions the Paliurus aculeatus, or Christ's thorn, which is common about Jerusalem, and has often been supposed to be the material of which the crown of thorns was made. He adds that its flexible boughs would admit of its being applied to such a purpose. Others have been suggested, but both of those we have mentioned are found close to Jerusalem. The "reed" was probably the common reed of Palestine, the Arundo donax.

xxvii. 31. Speaking of a crucifixion, Cicero says, "According to regular custom, the cross was erected behind the city, in the Pompeian road." Executions among the Jews took place outside the camp or city, and such we see was the practice with the Romans.

xxvii. 33. Golgotha, or "a place of a skull," was outside Jerusalem, but we have no certain knowledge why it was so called, or even where it was. The traditional site of Golgotha, or Calvary, is strongly disputed.

this darkness, and said, Aut Deus naturæ patitur, aut mundi machina disolvitur.—“either the God of nature is suffering, or the machine of the world is tumbling into ruin.” An extraordinary light gave intelligence of the birth of Christ, ch. ii. 2. and therefore it was proper an extraordinary darkness should notify his death, for he is “the light of the world.” The indignities done to our Lord Jesus made the heavens astonished, and horribly afraid, and even put into disorder and confusion: such wickedness as this the sun never saw before, and therefore withdrew, and would not see this. This surprising, amazing darkness was designed to stop the mouths of those blasphemers who were reviling Christ as he hung on the cross; and it should seem for the present to have struck such a terror upon them, that though their hearts were not changed, yet they were silent, and stood doubting what this should mean, till after three hours the darkness scattered, and then, as appears by ver. 47. like Pharaoh, when the plague was over, they hardened their hearts. But that which was principally intended in this darkness was,

1st. Christ’s present conflict with the powers of darkness. Now the prince of this world, and his forces, the rulers of the darkness of this world, were to be cast out, to be spoiled, and vanquished; and to make his victory the more illustrious, he fights them on their own ground, gives them all the advantage they could have against him by this darkness, lets them take the wind and sun, and yet baffles them, and so becomes more than a conqueror.

2nd. His present want of heavenly comforts. This darkness signified that dark cloud which the human soul of our Lord Jesus was now under. God makes his sun to shine upon the just and upon the unjust, but even the light of the sun was withheld from our Saviour when he was made sin for us. “A pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun;” but because now his soul was exceeding sorrowful, and the cup of Divine displeasure was filled to him without mixture, even the light of the sun was suspended. When earth denied him a drop of cold water, heaven denied him a beam of light; being to deliver us from utter darkness, he did himself, in the depth of his sufferings, walk in darkness, and had no light, Isa. l. 10. During the three hours that this darkness continued, we do not find that he said one word, but passed this time in a silent retirement into his own soul, which was now in an agony, wrestling with the powers of darkness, and taking in the impressions of his Father’s displeasure, not against himself, but the sin of man, which he was now making his soul an offering for. Never were there three such hours since the day that God created man upon the earth, never such a dark and awful scene; the crisis of that great affair of man’s redemption and salvation.

3. How he complained of it, ver. 46. “About the ninth hour,” when it began to clear up, after a long and silent conflict, “Jesus cried, Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani?” The words are related in the Syriac tongue, in which they were spoken, because worthy of double remark, and for the sake of the perverse construction which his enemies put upon them, in putting Elias for Eli. Now observe here,

1st. Whence he borrowed this complaint, from Ps. xxii. 1. It is likely he did not (as some have thought) repeat the whole psalm; yet hereby he intimated, that the whole was to be applied to him, and that David in spirit there spake of his humiliation and exaltation. This, and that other word, “Into thy hands I commit my spirit,” he fetched from David’s psalms, (though he could have expressed himself in his own words,) to teach us of what use the Word of God is to us to direct us in prayer, and to recommend to us the use of Scripture expressions in prayer, which will help our infirmities.

2nd. How he uttered it, “with a loud voice;” which speaks the extremity of his pain and anguish, the strength of nature remaining in him, and the great earnestness of his spirit in this expostulation. Now the Scripture was fulfilled, Joel iii. 15, 16. “The sun and the moon shall be darkened. The Lord shall also roar out of Zion, and utter his voice from Jerusalem.” David often speaks of his crying aloud in prayer, Ps. lv. 17.

3rd. What the complaint was, “My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?” A strange complaint to come from the mouth of our Lord Jesus, who, we are sure, was God’s elect, in whom his soul delighted, Isa. xlii. 1. and one in whom he was always well pleased. The Father now loved him, nay, he knew that therefore he loved him, because he laid down his life for the sheep; what, and yet forsaken of him, and in the midst of his sufferings too? Sure never sorrow was like unto that sorrow, which extorted such a complaint as this from one who, being perfectly free from sin, could never be a terror to himself; but the heart knows its own bitterness: no wonder that such a complaint as this made the earth to quake, and rent the rocks; for it is enough to “make both the ears of every one that hears it to tingle,” and ought to be spoken of with great reverence. Note,

First. That our Lord Jesus was, in his sufferings, for a time forsaken by his Father. So he saith himself, who we are sure was under no mistake concerning his own case. Not that the union between the Divine and human nature was in the least weakened or shocked; no, he was now, by the Eternal Spirit, offering himself. Nor, as if there were any abatement of his Father’s love to him, or his to his Father; we are sure there was upon his mind no horror of God, or despair of his favour, nor any thing of the torments of hell; but his Father forsook him, that is, 1st. He delivered him up into the hands of his enemies, and did not appear to deliver him out of their hands. He let loose the powers of darkness against him, and suffered them to do their worst, worse than against Job. Now was that scripture fulfilled, Job xvi. 9. “God has turned me over into the hands of the wicked,” and no angel is sent from heaven to deliver him, no friend on earth raised up to appear for him. 2nd. He withdrew from him the present comfortable sense of his complacency in him. When his soul was first troubled, he had a voice from heaven to comfort him, Jno. xii. 27, 28. when he was in his agony in the garden, there appeared an angel from heaven strengthening him; but now he had neither the one nor the other. God hid his face from him, and for a while withdrew his rod and staff in the darksome valley. God forsook him, not as he forsook Saul, leaving him to an endless despair, but as sometimes he forsook David, leaving him to a present dependency. 3rd. He let out upon his soul an afflicting sense of his wrath against man for sin. Christ was made sin for us, a curse for us; and therefore, though God loved him as a Son, he frowned upon him as a surety. These impressions he was pleased to admit, and to waive that resistance of them which he could have made; because he would accommodate himself to this part of his undertaking, as he had done to all the rest, when it was in his power to have avoided it.

Secondly. That Christ’s being forsaken of his Father was the most grievous of his sufferings, and that which he complained most of. Here he laid the most doleful accents; he did not say, “Why am I scourged? and why spit upon? and why nailed to the cross?” Nor did he say to his disciples, when they turned their back upon him, “Why have ye forsaken me?” But when his Father stood at a distance, he cried out thus; for this was it that put wormwood and gall into the affliction and misery. This brought the waters into the soul, Ps. lxxix. 1-3.

Thirdly. That our Lord Jesus, even when he was thus forsaken of his Father, yet he kept hold of him as his God notwithstanding: “My God, my God;” though forsaking me, yet mine. Christ was God’s servant in carrying on the work of redemption; to him he was to make satisfaction, and by him to be carried through and crowned; and upon that account he calls him his God; for he was now doing his will; see Isa. xlix. 4, 9. This supported him, and bore him up, that even in the depth of his sufferings God was his God, and this he resolves to keep fast hold of.

3. See how his enemies impudently bantered and ridiculed this complaint, ver. 47. “They said, This man calleth for Elias.” Some think this was the ignorant mistake of the Roman soldiers, who had heard talk of Elias, and of the Jews’ expectation of the coming of Elias, but knew not the signification of Eli, Eli, and so made this blundering comment upon these words of Christ, perhaps not hearing the latter part of what he said, for the noise of the people. Note, Many of the reproaches cast upon the Word of God, and the people of God, take rise from gross mistakes. Divine truths are often corrupted by ignorance of the language and style of the Scripture. Those that hear by the halves, pervert what they hear. But others think it was the wilful mistake of some of the Jews, who knew very well what he said, but were minded to abuse him, and make themselves and their companions merry, and to misrepresent him as one that, being forsaken of God, was driven to trust in creatures; perhaps hinting also, that he who had pretended to be himself the Messiah, would now be glad to be beholden to Elias, who was expected to be only the harbinger and forerunner of the Messiah. Note, It is no new thing for the most pious devotions of the best men to be ridiculed and abused by profane scoffers; nor are we to think it strange, if what is well said in praying and preaching, be misconstrued, and turned to our reproach; Christ’s words were so, though he spake as never man spake.

Fourthly. The cold comfort which his enemies ministered to him in this agony, which was like all the rest.

1. Some “gave him vinegar to drink,” ver. 48. instead of some cordial water, to revive and refresh him under this heavy burthen, they tantalized him with that which did not only add to the reproach they were loading him with, but did too sensibly represent that cup of trembling which his Father had put into his hand. “One of them ran” to fetch it, seeming to be officious to him, but really glad of an opportunity to abuse and affront him, and afraid lest any one should take it out of his hands.

2. Others, with the same purpose of disturbing and abusing him, refer him to Elias, ver. 49. “Let us see whether Elias will come to save him.” “Come, let him alone, his case is desperate, neither heaven nor earth can help him; let us do nothing either to hasten his death, or to retard it; he has appealed to Elias, and to Elias let him go.”

50 Jesus, when he had cried again with a loud voice, yielded up the ghost. 51 And, behold, the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom; and the earth did quake, and the rocks rent; 52 And the graves were opened; and many bodies of the saints which slept arose, 53 And came out of the graves after his resurrection, and went into the holy city, and appeared unto many. 54 Now when the centurion, and they that were with him, watching Jesus, saw the earthquake, and those things that were done, they feared greatly, saying, Truly this was the Son of God. 55 And many women were there beholding afar off, which followed Jesus from Galilee, ministering unto him: 56 Among which was Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James and Joseph, and the mother of Zebedee’s children.

We have here at length an account of the death of Christ, and several remarkable passages that attended it.

First. The manner how he breathed his last, ver. 50. Between the third and the sixth hour, that is, between nine and twelve o’clock, as we reckon, he was nailed to the cross; and soon after the ninth hour, that is, between three and four o’clock in the afternoon, he died. That was the time of the offering of the evening sacrifice, and the time when the paschal lamb was killed; and Christ our passover is sacrificed for us, and offered himself in the evening of the world, a sacrifice to God, of a sweet-smelling savour. It was at that time of the day that the angel Gabriel delivered to Daniel that glorious prediction of the Messiah, Dan. ix. 21, 24. And some think that, from that very time when the angel spoke it, to this time when Christ died, was just seventy weeks, that is, four hundred and ninety years to a day, to an hour; as the departure of Israel out of Egypt, was at the end of the four hundred and thirty years, even the selfsame day, Ex. xii. 41. Two things are here noted concerning the manner of Christ’s dying:

1. That he “cried with a loud voice,” as before, ver. 46. Now, 1st. This was a sign, that after all his pains and fatigues, yet his life was whole in him, and nature strong. The voice of dying men is one of the first things that fails; with a panting breath, and a faltering tongue, a few broken words are hardly spoken, and more hardly heard. But Christ, just before he expired, spoke like a man in his full strength, to shew that his life was not forced from him, but was freely delivered by him into his Father’s hands, as his own act and deed. He that had strength to cry thus when he died, could have got loose from the arrest he was under, and have bid defiance to the powers of death; but to shew that by “the Eternal Spirit he offered himself,” being the priest as well as the sacrifice, he “cried with a loud voice.”

2nd. It was significant. This loud voice shews that he attacked our spiritual enemies with an undaunted courage, and such a bravery of resolution, as speaks him hearty in the cause, and daring in the encounter. He was now spoiling principalities and powers, and in this loud voice he did as it were shout for mastery, as one mighty to save, Isa. lxiii. 1. and compare with this, Isa. xlii. 13, 14. He now bowed himself with all his might, as Samson did, when he said, “Let me die with the Philistines,” Jud. xvi. 30. Animamque in vulnere ponit,—and lays down his life.” His crying with a loud voice when xxvii. 34. The vinegar here mentioned was probably sour wine, and is called wine by the evangelist Mark. What Matthew describes as “gall” is styled “myrrh” by Mark, and perhaps with greater exactness. Matthew appears to use the word “gall” as a general designation for a bitter ingredient, which Mark tells us was myrrh. Other explanations have been suggested, both as to the mixture and the reason of offering it to Jesus. Some say it was usual to give a stupefying drink to criminals before execution, and that this was an example of the practice. Others, however, think that as the Romans seasoned our wines with drugs and perfumes, the drink may have simply been that of the soldiers, who had it at hand. The first view is the more common.

xxvii. 35. The words “that it might be fulfilled,” &c., to the end of the verse, are omitted by so many ancient authorities, that it is supposed they are an interpolation, and they are therefore left out by the best modern critics and editors.

he died, signified that his death should be published and proclaimed to all the world; all mankind being concerned in it, and obliged to take notice of it. Christ's loud cry was like a trumpet blown over the sacrifices.

2. That then he "yielded up the ghost;" this is the usual periphrasis of dying. To show that the Son of God, upon the cross, died truly and properly die by the violence of the pain he was put to, his soul was separated from his body, and so his body was left really and truly dead. It was certain he did die, for it was requisite he should die: "thus it was written," both in the close rolls of the Divine counsels, and in the letters patent of the Divine predictions, and therefore thus "it behoved him to suffer." Death being the penalty for the breach of the first covenant, "thou shalt surely die," the Mediator of the new covenant must make atonement by means of death, otherwise no remission. Heb. ix. 15. He had undertaken to make his soul an offering for sin, and he did it when he yielded up the ghost, and voluntarily resigned it.

Secondly. The miracles that attended his death. So many miracles being wrought by him in his life, we might well expect some to be wrought concerning him at his death, for his name was called Wonderful. Had he been fetched away as Elijah in a fiery chariot, that had itself been miracle enough; but being sent for away by an ignominious cross, it was requisite that his humiliation should be attended with some signal emanations of the Divine glory.

1. "Behold, the veil of the temple was rent in twain." This relation is ushered in with "behold," turn aside and see this great sight, and be astonished at it. Just as our Lord Jesus expired, at the time of the offering of the evening sacrifice, and upon a solemn day, when the priests were officiating in the temple, and might themselves be eye-witnesses of it, "the veil of the temple was rent" by an invisible power; that veil which parted between the holy place, and the most holy. They had condemned him for saying, "I will destroy this temple," understanding it literally, now by this specimen of his power he let them know, that if he had pleased he could have made his words good. In this, as in other of Christ's miracles, there was a mystery.

1st. It was in correspondence with the temple of Christ's body, which was now in the dissolving. That was the true temple, in which dwelt the fulness of the Godhead; when Christ "cried with a loud voice, and gave up the ghost," and so dissolved that temple, the literal temple did as it were echo to that cry, and answer the stroke by rending its veil. Note, Death is the rending of the veil of flesh which interposeth between us and the holy of holies; the death of Christ was so; the death of true Christians is so.

2nd. It signified the revealing and unfolding of the mysteries of the Old Testament. The veil of the temple was for concealment, as was that on the face of Moses, therefore it was called "the veil of the covering;" for it was highly penal for an person to see the furniture of the most holy place, except the high priest, and he but once a year, with great ceremony, and through a cloud of smoke; all which signified the darkness of that dispensation, 2 Cor. iii. 13. But now at the death of Christ all was laid open, the mysteries unveiled, so that now he that runs may read the meaning of them. Now we see that the mercy seat signified Christ the great propitiation, the pot of manna signified Christ the bread of life. Thus "we all with open face, behold as in a glass," which helps the sight, as the veil hindered it, "the glory of the Lord." Our eyes see the salvation.

3rd. It signified the uniting of Jew and Gentile by the removing of the partition wall between them, which was the ceremonial law, by which the Jews were distinguished from all other people, as a garden enclosed, were brought near to God, whilst others were made to keep their distance; Christ in his death repealed the ceremonial law, cancelled that "handwriting of ordinances," took it out of the way, nailed it to his cross, and so "broke down the middle wall of partition;" and by abolishing those institutions, "abolished the enmity, and made in himself of twain one new man," (as two rooms are made one, and that large and lightsome, by taking down the partition,) "so making peace," Eph. ii. 14-16. Christ died to rend all dividing veils, and to make all his one, Jno. xvii. 21.

4th. It signified the consecrating and laying open of "a new and living way" to God. The veil kept people off from drawing near to the most holy place, where the Shechinah was; but the rending of it signified, that Christ by his death opened a way to God. First. For himself. This was the great day of atonement, when our Lord Jesus, as the great high priest, not "by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood entered once for all into the holy place;" in token of which the veil was rent, Heb. ix. 7, &c. Having offered his sacrifice in the outer court, the blood of it was now to be sprinkled upon the mercy seat within the veil; wherefore "lift up your heads, O ye gates, and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors; for the King of glory," the priest of glory, "shall come in." Now was he caused to draw near, and made to approach, Jer. xxx. 21. Though he did not personally ascend into the holy place not made with hands till above forty days after, yet he immediately acquired a right to enter, and had a virtual admission. Secondly. For us in him. So the apostle applies it, Heb. x. 19, 20: we have "boldness to enter into the holiest, by that new and living way, which he has consecrated for us, through the veil." He died to bring us to God, and in order thereunto to rend that veil of guilt and wrath which interposed between us and him, to take away the cherubim and flaming sword, and to open the way to the tree of life. We have free access through Christ to the throne of grace, or mercy seat, now, and to the throne of glory hereafter, Heb. iv. 16; vi. 20. The rending of the veil signified, (as that ancient hymn excellently expresseth it,) that "when Christ had overcome the sharpness of death, he opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers." Nothing can obstruct or discourage our access to heaven, for the veil is rent: "a door is opened in heaven," Rev. iv. 1.

2. "The earth did quake;" not only mount Calvary where Christ was crucified, but the whole land, and the adjacent countries. This earthquake signified two things:

1st. The horrible wickedness of Christ's crucifiers. The earth by trembling under such a load, bore its testimony to the innocence of him that was persecuted, and against the impiety of those that persecuted him. Never did the whole creation before groan under such a burthen as the Son of God crucified, and the guilty wretches that crucified him. The earth quaked, as if it feared to open its mouth to receive the blood of Christ, so much more precious than that of Abel, which it had received, and was cursed for it, Gen. iv. 11, 12; and as if it fain would open its mouth to swallow up those rebels that put him to death, as it had swallowed up Dathan and Abiram for a much less crime. When the prophet would express God's great displeasure against the wickedness of the wicked, he asked, "Shall not the land tremble for this?" Am. viii. 8.

2nd. The glorious achievements of Christ's cross. This earthquake signified the mighty shock, nay, the fatal blow now given to the devil's kingdom. So vigorous was the assault Christ now made upon the infernal powers, that (as of old, when he went out of Seir, when he marched through the field of Edom,) the earth trembled, Jud. v. 4; Ps. lxxviii. 7, 8. God shakes all nations, when the Desire of all nations is to come, and there is a "yet once more," which perhaps refers to this shaking, Hag. ii. 7, 21.

3. "The rocks rent:" the hardest and firmest part of the earth was made to feel this mighty shock. Christ had said, that if the children should cease to cry hosanna, "the stones would immediately cry out," and now in effect they did so, proclaiming the glory of the suffering Jesus, and themselves more sensible of the wrong done him, than the hardhearted Jews were, who yet will shortly be glad to find a hole in the rocks, and a cleft in the ragged rocks, to hide them from the face of him that sitteth on the throne: see Rev. vi. 16; Isa. ii. 21. But when God's fury is poured out like fire, the rocks are thrown down by him, Nah. i. 6. Jesus Christ is the rock, and the rending of these rocks signified the rending of that rock. 1st. That in the clefts of it we may be hid, as Moses in the cleft of the rock at Horeb, that there we may behold the glory of the Lord, as he did, Ex. xxxiii. 22. Christ's dove is said to be hid in the clefts of the rock, Cant. ii. 14; that is, as some make the allusion, sheltered in the wounds of our Lord Jesus, the rock rent. 2nd. That from the clefts of it rivers of living water may flow, and follow us in this wilderness, as from the rock which Moses smote, Ex. xvii. 6; and which God clave, Ps. lxxviii. 15; "and that rock was Christ," 1 Cor. x. 4. When we celebrate the memorial of Christ's death, our hard and rocky hearts must be rent, the heart, and not the garments. That heart is harder than a rock that will not yield, that will not melt, where Jesus Christ is evidently set forth crucified.

4. "The graves were opened." This matter is not related so fully as our curiosity would wish; for the Scripture was not intended to gratify that; it should seem the same earthquake that rent the rocks, opened the graves, "and many bodies of the saints which slept arose;" death to the saints is but the sleep of the body, and the grave the bed it sleeps in; they awoke by the power of the Lord Jesus. "And" (ver. 53) "came out of the graves after his resurrection, and went into" Jerusalem, "the holy city, and appeared unto many." Now here,

1st. We may raise many inquiries concerning it, which we cannot resolve: as First. Who these saints were that did arise? Some think the ancient patriarchs, that were in such care to be buried in the land of Canaan, perhaps in the believing foresight of the advantage of this early resurrection. Christ had lately proved the doctrine of the resurrection from the instance of the patriarchs, ch. xxii. 32; and here was a speedy confirmation of his argument. Others think, these that rose were modern saints, such as had seen Christ in the flesh, but died before him: as his father Joseph, Zacharias, Simeon, John Baptist, and others, that had been known to the disciples while they lived, and therefore were the fitter to be witnesses to them in an apparition after. What if we should suppose that they were the martyrs, who in the Old Testament times had sealed the truths of God with their blood, that were thus dignified and distinguished? Christ particularly points at them, as his forerunners ch. xxiii. 35; and we find, Rev. xx. 4, 5, that those who were beheaded for the testimony of Jesus, rose before the rest of the dead. Sufferers with Christ shall first reign with him. Secondly. It is uncertain whether, as some think, they rose to life now at the death of Christ, and disposed of themselves elsewhere, but did not go into the city till after his resurrection; or whether, as others think, though their sepulchres, which the Pharisees had built and garnished, ch. xxiii. 29, and so made remarkable, were shattered now by the earthquake, (so little did God matter that hypocritical respect,) yet they did not revive and rise till after his resurrection; only for brevity-sake it is mentioned here upon the mention of the opening of the graves, which seems more probable. Thirdly. Some think they rose only to bear witness of Christ's resurrection to those to whom they appeared; and having finished their testimony, retired to their graves again. But it is more agreeable, both to Christ's honour and theirs, to suppose, though we cannot prove, that they rose as Christ did, to die no more, and therefore ascended with him to glory. Sure they who did partake of this first resurrection, on them a second death had no power. Fourthly. To whom they appeared; (not to all the people, it is certain, but to many;) whether enemies or friends; in what manner they appeared; how often; what they said and did; and how they disappeared;—are secret things which belong not to us; we must not covet to be wise above what is written. The relating of this matter so briefly, is a plain intimation to us, that we must not look that way for the confirmation of our faith, "we have a more sure word of prophecy;" see Lu. xvi. 31.

2nd. Yet we may learn many good lessons from it. First. That even those who lived and died before the death and resurrection of Christ had saving benefit thereby, as well as those that have lived since; for he was the same yesterday that he is to day, and will be for ever, Heb. xiii. 8. Secondly. That Jesus Christ by dying conquered, disarmed, and disabled death. These saints that rose were the present trophies of the victory of Christ's cross over the powers of death, which he thus made a show of openly. Having by death destroyed him that had the power of death, he thus "led captivity captive," and gloried in these retaken prizes, in them fulfilling that scripture, "I will ransom them from the power of the grave." Thirdly. That in the virtue of Christ's resurrection, the bodies of all the saints shall in the fulness of time rise again. This was an earnest of the general resurrection at the last day, "when all that are in their graves shall hear the voice of the Son of God." And perhaps Jerusalem is therefore called here the holy city, because the saints at the general resurrection shall enter into the new Jerusalem; which will be indeed, what the other was in name and type only, the holy city, Rev. xxi. 2. Fourthly. That all the saints do by the influence of Christ's death, and in conformity to it, rise from the death of sin to the life of righteousness. They are raised up with him to a Divine and spiritual life; they go into the holy city, become citizens of it, have their conversation in it, and appear to many as persons not of this world.

Thirdly. The conviction of his enemies that were employed in the execution, ver. 54, which some make no less than another miracle, all things considered. Observe, 1. The persons convinced: "the centurion, and they that were with him, watching Jesus;" a captain and his company, that were set on the guard on this occasion. 1st. They were soldiers, whose profession is commonly hardening, and whose breasts are commonly not so susceptible as some others of the impressions either of fear or pity. But there is no spirit too big, too bold for the power of Christ to break and humble. 2nd. They were Romans, Gentiles, who knew not the Scriptures that were now fulfilled, yet they only were convinced. A sad presage of the blindness that should happen to Israel, when the Gospel should be sent to the Gentiles to open their eyes. Here were the Gentiles softened, and the Jews hardened. 3rd. They were the persecutors of Christ, and those that but just before had reviled him, as appears, Lu. xxiii. 36. How soon can God, by the power he has over men's consciences, alter their language, and fetch confessions of his truths to his own glory, out of the mouths of those that have breathed nothing but threatenings, and slaughter, and blasphemies. 2. The means of their conviction: they perceived "the earthquake," which frightened them, and saw other the "things that were done." These were designed to assert the honour of Christ in his sufferings, and had their end on these soldiers, whatever they had on others. Note, The dreadful appearances of God in his providence, sometimes work strangely for the conviction and awakening of sinners. 3. The expressions of this conviction, in two things: 1st. The terror that was struck upon them, "they feared greatly;" feared lest they should have been buried in the darkness, or swallowed up in the earthquake. Note, God can easily frighten the most daring xxvii. 44. Alford's translation of this verse is, "The robbers also, which were crucified with him, reviled him with the same words."

xxvii. 46. Our Lord's utterance is in an Aramaic dialect, and correctly represents the sense of the Hebrew words of Psa. xxii. 1.

xxvii. 48. This vinegar is perhaps the same as that of verse 34, and is supposed to have been the posca, which was a common drink among Roman soldiers on service.

xxvii. 51. The veil of the Temple was a curtain which was xxvii. 37. It is said to have been customary with the Romans, on any extraordinary occasion, to put over the head of the malefactor, or on some part of his person, a title or inscription setting forth the crime for which he suffered. With regard to the words of the title as given by Matthew, they differ from those given by the other evangelists, and are probably a mere summary.

xxvii. 42. Ancient copies read, "He is King of Israel," which is no doubt the language of sarcasm and incredulity.

of his adversaries, and make them know themselves to be but men. Guilt puts men into fear. He that, when iniquity abounds, doth not fear always with a fear of caution, when judgments are abroad, cannot but fear greatly with a fear of amazement; whereas there are those who will not fear, though the earth be removed, Ps. xli. 1, 2. 2nd. The testimony that was extorted from them. They said, "truly this was the Son of God;" a noble confession: Peter was blessed for it, ch. xvi. 16, 17. It was the great matter now in dispute, the point upon which he and his enemies had joined issue, ch. xxvi. 63, 64. His disciples believed it, but at this time durst not confess it; our Saviour himself was tempted to question it, when he said, "Why hast thou forsaken me?" The Jews, now he was dying upon the cross, looked upon it as plainly determined against him, that he was not the Son of God, because he did not come down from the cross. And yet now this centurion and the soldiers make this voluntary confession of the Christian faith, "truly this was the Son of God." The best of his disciples could not have said more at any time, and at this time they had not faith and courage enough to say thus much. Note, God can maintain and assert the honour of a truth when it seems to be crushed and run down; for 'great is the truth, and will prevail.'

Fourthly. The attendance of his friends, that were witnesses of his death, ver. 55, 56. Observe,

1. Who they were, "many women which followed him from Galilee." Not his apostles (only elsewhere we find John by the cross, Jno. xix. 26.). Their hearts failed them; they durst not appear, for fear of coming under the same condemnation. But here were a company of women, some would have called them silly women, that boldly stuck to Christ, when the rest of his disciples had basely deserted him. Note, Even those of the weaker sex are often by the grace of God made strong in faith, that Christ's strength may be made perfect in weakness. There have been women martyrs, famous for courage and resolution in Christ's cause. Now of these women, it is said, 1st. That they had followed Jesus from Galilee, out of the great love they had to him, and a desire to hear him preach; otherwise the males only were obliged to come up to worship at the feast. Now having followed him such a long journey, as from Galilee to Jerusalem, eighty or an hundred miles, they resolved not to forsake him now. Note, Our former services and sufferings for Christ should be an argument with us faithfully to persevere to the end in our attendance on him. Have we followed him so far, and so long, done so much, and laid out so much for him, and shall we forsake him now? Gal. iii. 3, 4. 2nd. That they "ministered to him of their substance," for his necessary subsistence. How gladly would they have ministered to him now if they might have been admitted, but being forbidden that, they resolved to follow him. Note, When we are restrained from doing what we would, we must do what we can, in the service of Christ. Now he is in heaven, though he is out of the reach of our ministration, yet he is not out of the reach of our believing views. 3rd. Some of them are particularly named; for God will honour those that honour Christ. They were such as we have several times met with before, and it was their praise that we meet with them to the last.

2. What they did, they were "beholding afar off." 1st. "They stood afar off." Whether their own fear or their enemies' fury kept them at a distance, is not certain; however, it was an aggravation of the sufferings of Christ, that his "lovers and friends stood aloof from his sore." Ps. xxxviii. 11; Job xix. 13. Perhaps they might have come nearer if they would; but good people when they are in sufferings must not think it strange, if some of their best friends be shy of them. When Paul's danger was imminent, no man stood by him, 2 Tim. iv. 16. If we be thus looked strangely upon, remember our Master was so before us. 2nd. They were there "beholding;" in which they shewed a concern and kindness for Christ; when they were debarred from doing any other office of love to him, they looked a look of love towards him. First. It was a sorrowful look; they looked unto him who was now pierced, and mourned; no doubt were in bitterness for him. We may well imagine now it cut them to the heart to see him in this torment; and what floods of tears it fetched from their eyes. Let us with an eye of faith behold Christ and him crucified, and be affected with that great love wherewith he loved us. But, Secondly. It was no more but a look; they beheld him, but they could not help him. Note, When Christ was in his sufferings, the best of his friends were but spectators and lookers on, even the "angelic guards stood trembling by," saith Mr. Norris, for he "trod the wine-press alone, and of the people there was none with him; so his own arm wrought salvation."

57 When the even was come, there came a rich man of Arimathea, named Joseph, who also himself was Jesus' disciple: 58 He went to Pilate, and begged the body of Jesus. Then Pilate commanded the body to be delivered. 59 And when Joseph had taken the body, he wrapped it in a clean linen cloth, 60 And laid it in his own new tomb, which he had hewn out in the rock: and he rolled a great stone to the door of the sepulchre, and departed. 61 And there was Mary Magdalene, and the other Mary, sitting over against the sepulchre. 62 Now the next day, that followed the day of the preparation, the chief priests and Pharisees came together unto Pilate, 63 Saying, Sir, we remember that that deceiver said, while he was yet alive, After three days I will rise again. 64 Command therefore that the sepulchre be made sure until the third day, lest his disciples come by night, and steal him away, and say unto the people, He is risen from the dead: so the last error shall be worse than the first. 65 Pilate said unto them, Ye have a watch: go your way, make it as sure as ye can. 66 So they went, and made the sepulchre sure, sealing the stone, and setting a watch.

ARIMATEA.

We have here an account of Christ's burial, and the manner and circumstances of it, concerning which, observe, 1. The kindness and good will of his friends that laid him in the grave. 11. The malice and ill will of his enemies that were very solicitous to keep him there.

First. His friends gave him a decent burial. Observe, 1. In general, that Jesus Christ was buried: when his precious soul was gone to Paradise, his blessed body was deposited in the chambers of the grave, that he might answer the type of Jonas, and fulfil the prophecy of Isaiah, "he made his grave with the wicked." Thus "in all things" he must "be made like unto his brethren," sin only excepted; and, like us, unto dust he must return: he was buried, to make his death the more certain, and his resurrection the more illustrious. Pilate would not deliver his body to be buried till he was well assured he was really dead; while the witnesses lay unburied, there was some hopes concerning them, Rev. xi. 8; but Christ, the great witness, is as one "free among the dead, like the slain that lie in the grave." He was buried, that he might take off the terror of the grave, and make it easy to us, might warm and perfume that cold, noisome bed for us, and that we might be buried with him.

2. The particular circumstances of his burial here related. 1st. The time when he was buried: "when the even was come," the same evening that he died, before sunset, as is usual in burying malefactors. It was not deferred till the next day, because it was the sabbath; for burying the dead is not proper work either for a day of rest or for a day of rejoicing, as the sabbath is.

2nd. The person that took care of the funeral was Joseph of Arimathea. The apostles were all fled, and none of them appeared to shew this respect to their master, which the disciples of John shewed to him after he was beheaded; they "took up his body and buried it," ch. xiv. 12. The women that followed him durst not move in it, then did God stir up this good man to do it; for what work God has to do, he will find out instruments to do it. Joseph was a fit man, for, First. He had wherewithal to do it, being a rich man; most of Christ's disciples were poor men, such were most fit to go about the country to preach the Gospel, but here was one that was a rich man, ready to be employed in a piece of service which required a man of estate. Note, Worldly wealth, though it is to many an obstruction in religion's way, yet in some services to be done for Christ, it is an advantage and an opportunity, and it is well for those who have it, if withal they have a heart to use it for God's glory. Secondly. He was well affected to our Lord Jesus, for he was himself his disciple, believed in him, though he did not openly profess it. Note, Christ has more secret disciples than we are aware of: "seven thousand in Israel," Rom. xi. 4.

3rd. The grant of the dead body procured from Pilate, ver. 58. "Joseph went to Pilate," the proper person to be applied to on this occasion, who had the disposal of the body, for in things wherein the power of the magistrate is concerned, due regard must be had to that power, and nothing done to break in upon it. What we do that is good, must be done peaceably, and not tumultuously. Pilate was willing to give the body to one that would inter it decently, that he might do something towards atoning for the guilt his conscience charged him with, in condemning an innocent person. In Joseph's petition, and Pilate's ready grant of it, honour was done to Christ, and a testimony borne to his integrity.

4th. The dressing of the body in its grave clothes, ver. 59. Though he was an honourable councillor, yet he himself took the body, as it should seem, into suspended between the holy of holies and the holy place (Exod. xxvi. 33).

xxvii. 52, 53. Certain German critics have thought these verses an interpolation, but all evidence is opposed to such an opinion. Meyer says, "These dead arose, according to Epiphanius, Ambrose, Calow, &c., with a glorified body, and ascended with Christ." Bengel observes that the resurrection of the saints was subsequent to that of Jesus.

xxvii. 56. "The mother of Zebedee's children"—or, rather, of the sons of Zebedee, James and John—is called by her name, Salome, in Mark xv. 40.

xxvii. 61. The woman here called "the other Mary" is in Mark xv. 47 called Mary, the mother of Joses. Some think she was the wife of Cleophas.

xxvii. 62—66. It appears from this that the application to Pilate for a guard at the sepulchre was an after-thought. No guard was his own arms, from the infamous and accursed tree, Acts xiii. 29; for where there is true love to Christ, no service will be thought too mean to stoop to for him. Having taken it, he wrapped it in a clean linen cloth, for burying in linen was then the common usage, which Joseph complied with. Note, Care is to be taken of the dead bodies of good men, for there is a glory intended for them at the resurrection, which we must hereby testify our belief of, and wind up the dead body as designed for a better place. This common act of humanity, if done after a godly sort, may be made an acceptable piece of Christianity.

5th. The depositing it in the sepulchre, ver. 60. Here was nothing of that pomp and solemnity, with which the grandees of the world are "brought to the grave," and laid "in the tomb," Job xxi. 32. A private funeral did best befit him whose kingdom came not with observation.

First. He was laid in a borrowed tomb, in Joseph's burying place; as he had not a house of his own wherein to lay his head while he lived, so he had not a grave of his own wherein to lay his body when he was dead, which was an instance of his poverty; yet in this there might be somewhat of a mystery. The grave is the peculiar heritage of a sinner, Job xxiv. 19; there is nothing we can truly call our own but our sins and our graves; "he returneth to his earth," Ps. cxlvi. 4. When we go to the grave, we go to our own place; but our Lord Jesus, that had no sin of his own, had no grave of his own; dying under imputed sin, it was fit he should be buried in a borrowed grave. The Jews designed that he should have made his grave with the wicked, should have been buried with the thieves with whom he was crucified, should have overruled it, so as that he should make it with the rich in his death, Isa. liii. 9.

Secondly. He was laid in a new tomb, which Joseph, it is likely, designed for himself, but it would be never the worse for his lying in it who was to rise so quickly; but a great deal the better for his lying in it, who has altered the property of the grave, and made it anew indeed, by turning it into a bed of rest, nay, into a bed of spices, for all the saints.

Thirdly. In a tomb that was hewn out of a rock. The ground about Jerusalem was generally rocky; Shebna had his sepulchre hewn out thereabouts in a rock, Isa. xxii. 16. Providence ordered it that Christ's sepulchre should be in a solid, entire rock, that no room might be left to suspect his disciples to have had access to it by some underground passage, or to have broke through the back wall of it to steal the body; for there was no access to it but by the door, which was watched.

Fourthly. A great stone was rolled to the door of the sepulchre; this also was according to the custom of the Jews, in burying their dead, as appears by the description of the grave of Lazarus, Jno. xi. 38, signifying that those who are dead are separated, and cut off from all the living; if the grave were his prison, now was the door locked and bolted. The rolling of the stone to the grave's mouth, was with them as filling up the grave is with us; it completed the funeral. Having thus in silence and sorrow deposited the precious body of our Lord Jesus in the grave, the house appointed for all the living, they departed without any further ceremony. It is the most melancholy circumstance in the funerals of our Christian friends, when we have laid their bodies in the dark and silent grave, to go home and leave them behind; but alas, it is not we that go home and leave them behind; no, it is they that are gone to the better home, and have left us behind.

6th. The company that attended the funeral, and that was very small and mean; here were none of the relations in mourning to follow the corpse, no formalities to grace the solemnity, but some good women that were true mourners, "Mary Magdalene, and the other Mary," ver. 61. These, as they had attended him to the cross, so they followed him to the grave; as if they composed themselves to sorrow, they sat "over against the sepulchre," not so much to fill their eyes with the sight of what was done, as to empty them in rivers of tears. Note, True love to Christ will carry us through to the utmost in following him. Death itself cannot quench that divine fire, Cant. viii. 6, 7.

Secondly. His enemies did what they could to prevent his resurrection; what they did herein was "the next day that followed the day of the preparation," ver. 62. That was the seventh day of the week, the Jewish sabbath, yet not expressly called so, but described by this periphrasis, because it was now shortly to give way to the Christian sabbath, which began the day after. Now, 1. All that day Christ lay dead in the grave, having for six days laboured and done all his work, on his seventh day he rested, and was refreshed. 2. On that day the chief priests and Pharisees, when they should have been at their devotions, asking pardon for the sins of the week past, were dealing with Pilate about securing the sepulchre, and so adding rebellion to their sin: they that had so often quarrelled with Christ for works of the greatest mercy on that day, were themselves busied in a work of the greatest malice. Observe here,

1. Their address to Pilate; they were vexed that the body was given to one that would bury it decently, but since it must be so, they desire a guard may be set on the sepulchre.

1st. Their petition sets forth, that "that deceiver" (so they call him who is truth itself) "had said, After three days I will rise again." He had said so, and his disciples remembered those very words for the confirmation of their faith; but his persecutors remember them for the provocation of their rage and malice: thus the same word of Christ to the one was a savour of life unto life, to the other of death unto death. See how they compliment Pilate with the title of Sir, while they reproach Christ with the title of deceiver; thus the most malicious slanderers of good men are commonly the most sordid flatterers of great men.

2nd. It further sets forth their jealousy, "Lest his disciples come by night and steal him away, and say, He is risen." First. That which really they were afraid of was his resurrection. That which is most Christ's honour and his people's joy, is most the terror of his enemies: that which exasperated Joseph's brethren against him was the pre-arrangements of his rise, and of his having dominion over them, Gen. xxxvii. 8, and all they aimed at in what they did against him was to prevent that. "Come," say they, "let us slay him, and see what will become of his dreams;" so the chief priests and Pharisees here laboured to defeat the predictions of Christ's resurrection, saying, as David's enemies of him, Ps. xli. 8. "Now that he lieth he shall rise up no more;" if he should, that would break all their measures. Note, Christ's enemies, even when they have gained their point, yet are still in fear of losing it again. Perhaps the priests were surprised at the respect shewed to Christ's dead body by Joseph and Nicodemus, two honourable councillors, and looked upon it as an ill presage; nor can they forget his raising Lazarus from the dead, which so confounded them.

Secondly. That which they took on them to be afraid of was, "lest his disciples should come by night and steal him away," which was a very improbable thing; for, 1st. They had not the courage to own him while he lived, when they might have done him and themselves real service, and it was not likely that his death should put courage into such cowards. 2nd. What could they promise themselves by stealing away his body, and making people believe he was risen; when if he should not rise, and so prove himself a deceiver, his disciples, that had left all for him in this world in dependence upon a recompense appointed at first. "The day of the preparation" was Friday, and the next day was the Sabbath; but as it is not at all probable that the chief priests and Pharisees went to Pilate during the hours of the Sabbath, it may be that they did not go until the evening, when the legal Sabbath was over. This would still be the next day, or the morrow, according to Roman ideas, although it would be the eve of the first day in the Jewish sense—our Saturday evening, in fact. This circumstance explains why the women who came to the se-them to carry on a cheat upon themselves, to steal away his body, and say, "He is risen," when if he were not risen their faith was vain, and they were "of all men the most miserable?" The chief priests apprehend, that if the doctrine of Christ's resurrection be once preached and believed, "the last error will be worse than the first;" a proverbial expression, speaking no more than this, "That we shall all be routed, all undone;" they think it was their error that they had so long connived at his preaching and miracles, which error they thought they had rectified by putting him to death; but if people should be persuaded of his resurrection, that would spoil all again; his interest would revive with him, and theirs must needs sink who had so barbarously murdered him. Note, Those that oppose Christ and his kingdom will see, not only their attempts baffled, but themselves miserably plunged and embarrassed, their errors each worse than the other, and the last worst of all, Ps. ii. 4, 5.

3rd. In consideration hereof they humbly move to have a guard set upon the sepulchre till the third day: "command that the sepulchre be made sure." Pilate must still be their drudge, his civil and military power must both be engaged to serve their malice; one would think death's prisoners needed no other guard, and that the grave were security enough to itself; but what will not those fear that are conscious to themselves both of guilt and impotency, in opposing the Lord and his Anointed?

2. Pilate's answer to this address, ver. 65: "Ye have a watch: make it sure, as sure as you can." He was ready to gratify Christ's friends, in allowing them the body, and his enemies in setting a guard upon it, being desirous to please all sides, whilst perhaps he laughed in his sleeve at both, for making such ado, pro and con, about the dead body of a man, looking upon the hopes of one side, and the fears of the other, to be alike ridiculous. "You have a watch;" he means the constant guard that was kept in the tower of Antonia, out of which he allows them to detach as many as they pleased for that purpose, but, as if ashamed to be himself seen in such a thing, he leaves the management of it wholly to them. Methinks that word, "make it as sure as you can," looks like a banter, either, 1st. Of their fears; Be sure to set a strong guard upon the dead man; or rather, 2nd. Of their hopes; Do your worst, try your wit and strength to the utmost, but if he be of God, he will rise, in spite of you and all your guards. I am apt to think that by this time Pilate had had some talk with the centurion, his own officer, of whom he would be apt to enquire how that just man died, whom he had condemned with such reluctance; and he would give him an account of those things, which made him conclude that "truly he was the Son of God," and Pilate would give more credit to him than to a thousand of those spiteful priests that called him a deceiver; and if so, no marvel that he tacitly derides their project, in thinking to secure the sepulchre upon him, that had so lately rent the rocks, and made the earth to quake. Tertullian speaking of Pilate, saith, Ipsæ jam pro sua conscientia Christianus.—In his conscience he was a Christian; and it was possible he might be under such convictions at this time, upon the centurion's report, and yet never be thoroughly persuaded, no more than Agrippa or Felix was, to be a Christian.

3. They sealed the stone, ver. 66: "They sealed the stone," probably with the great seal of their sanhedrim, whereby they interposed their authority, for who durst break the public seal? But not trusting too much to that, without they set a watch, to keep his disciples from coming to steal him away, and, if possible, to hinder him from coming out of the grave. So they intended, but God brought this good out of it, that they who were set to oppose his resurrection, thereby had an opportunity to observe it, and did so, and told the chief priests what they observed, who were thereby rendered the more inexcusable. Here was all the power of earth and hell combined to keep Christ a prisoner, but all in vain when his hour was come; death, and those sons and heirs of death, could then no longer hold him, no longer have dominion over him. To guard the sepulchre against the poor weak disciples was folly, because needless; but to think to guard it against the power of God was folly, because fruitless, and to no purpose; and yet they thought they had dealt wisely.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

In the foregoing chapters we saw the Captain of our salvation engaged with the powers of darkness, attacked by them, and vigorously attacking them; victory seemed to hover between the combatants, nay, at length it inclined to the enemies' side, and our champion fell before them; behold, God has "delivered his strength into captivity, and his glory into the enemies' hand." Christ in the grave is like the ark in Dagon's temple; the powers of darkness seemed to ride masters, but "then the Lord awaked as one out of sleep, and like a mighty man that shouteth by reason of wine," Ps. lxxviii. 61—65. The Prince of our peace is in this chapter rallying again, coming out of the grave a conqueror, yea, more than a conqueror, leading captivity captive; though the ark be a prisoner, Dagon falls before it, and it proves that "none is able to stand before the holy Lord God." Now the resurrection of Christ being one of the main foundations of our religion, it is requisite that we should have infallible proofs of it; four of which proofs we have in this chapter, which are but a few of many, for Luke and John give a larger account of the proofs of Christ's resurrection than Matthew and Mark do. Here is, I. The testimony of the angel to Christ's resurrection, ver. 1—8. II. His appearance himself to the women, ver. 9, 10. III. The confession of the adversaries that were upon the guard, ver. 11—15. IV. Christ's appearance to the disciples in Galilee, and the commission he gave them, ver. 16—20.

IN the end of the sabbath, as it began to dawn toward the first day of the week, came Mary Magdalene and the other Mary to see the sepulchre. 2 And, behold, there was a great earthquake: for the angel of the Lord descended from heaven, and came and rolled back the stone from the door, and sat upon it. 3 His countenance was like lightning, and his raiment white as snow: 4 And for fear of him the keepers did shake, and became as dead men. 5 And the pulchre on the Sunday morning suspected no obstacle greater than the removal of the stone at the door of the tomb (Mark xvi. 1—3), not knowing a guard had been set. Pilate said, "Ye have a watch," as usually rendered, but the words may mean, "Have a guard," i.e., "Take a guard for your purpose." It has been said that the words recognise the guards of the Temple, but such an idea is uncalled for, and it is not likely that the Temple guards would be sent to watch the tomb of an executed criminal. The stone would be angel answered and said unto the women, Fear not ye: for I know that ye seek Jesus, which was crucified. 6 He is not here: for he is risen, as he said. Come, see the place where the Lord lay. 7 And go quickly, and tell his disciples that he is risen from the dead; and, behold, he goeth before you into Galilee; there shall ye see him: lo, I have told you. 8 And they departed quickly from the sepulchre with fear and great joy; and did run to bring his disciples word. 9 And as they went to tell his disciples, behold, Jesus met them, saying, All hail. And they came and held him by the feet, and worshipped him. 10 Then said Jesus unto them, Be not afraid: go tell my brethren that they go into Galilee, and there shall they see me.

For the proof of Christ's resurrection, we have here the testimony of the angel, and of Christ himself, concerning his resurrection. Now we may think it would have done better, if the matter had been so ordered that a competent number of witnesses should have been present, and have seen the stone rolled away by the angel, and the dead body reviving, as people saw Lazarus come out of his grave, and then the matter had been past dispute; but let not us prescribe to Infinite Wisdom, which ordered that the witnesses of his resurrection should see him risen, but not see him rise. His incarnation was a mystery, so was this second incarnation, (if we may so call it), this new making of the body of Christ for his exalted state; it was therefore made in secret: "Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed." Christ gave such proofs of his resurrection as were corroborated by the Scriptures, and by the word which he had spoken, Lu. xxiv. 6, 7, 44; Mar. xvi. 7; for here we must "walk by faith, not by sight." We have here,

First. The coming of the good women to the sepulchre. Observe, 1. When they came: "In the end of the sabbath, as it began to dawn towards the first day of the week," ver. 1. This fixeth the time of Christ's resurrection.

1st. He rose the third day after his death; that was the time which he had often prefixed, and he kept within it. He was buried in the evening of the sixth day of the week, and rose in the morning of the first day of the following week; so that he lay in the grave about thirty-six or thirty-eight hours. He lay so long to shew that he was really and truly dead, and no longer, that he might not see corruption. He rose the third day to answer the type of the prophet Jonas, ch. xii. 40, and to accomplish that prediction, Hos. vi. 2, "The third day he will raise us up, and we shall live in his sight."

2nd. He rose after the Jewish sabbath, and it was the passover sabbath; all that day he lay in the grave, to signify the abolishing of the Jewish feasts, and the other parts of the ceremonial law, and that his people must be dead to such observances, and take no more notice of them than he did when he lay in the grave. Christ on the sixth day finished his work, he said, "It is finished;" on the seventh day he rested, and then on the first day of the next week did, as it were, begin a new world, and enter upon new work. Let no man therefore judge us now in respect of the new moons, or of the Jewish sabbaths, which were indeed a shadow of good things to come, but the substance is of Christ. We may further observe, that the time of the saints' lying in the grave is a sabbath to them, (such as the Jewish sabbath was, which consisted chiefly in bodily rest,) for there they rest from their labours, Job iii. 17, and it is owing to Christ.

3rd. He rose upon "the first day of the week." On the first day of the first week God "commanded the light to shine out of darkness;" on this day therefore did He who was to be the light of the world shine out of the darkness of the grave; and the seventh day sabbath being buried with Christ, it rose again in the first day sabbath, called the Lord's day, Rev. i. 10; and no other day of the week is from henceforward mentioned in all the New Testament but this, and this often, as the day which Christians religiously observed in solemn assemblies to the honour of Christ, Jno. xx. 19, 26; Acts xx. 7; 1 Cor. xvi. 2. If the deliverance of Israel out of the land of the north superseded the remembrance of that out of Egypt, Jer. xxii. 7, 8, much more doth our redemption by Christ eclipse the glory of God's former works. The sabbath was instituted in remembrance of the perfecting of the work of creation, Gen. ii. 1. Man by his revolt made a breach upon that perfect work, which was never perfectly repaired till Christ rose from the dead, and the heavens and the earth were again finished, and the disordered hosts of them modelled anew; and the day on which this was done was justly blessed and sanctified, and the seventh day from that. He who on that day rose from the dead is the same by whom, and for whom, all things were at first created, and now anew created.

4th. He rose "as it began to dawn" towards that day; as soon as it could be said that the third day was come, the time prefixed for his resurrection, he rose. After his withdrawals from his people, he returns with all convenient speed, and cuts the work as short in righteousness as may be. He had said to his disciples, that though within a little while they should not see him, yet again a little while and they should see him, and accordingly he made it as little a while as possible, Isa. liv. 7, 8. Christ rose when the day began to dawn, because then the day spring from on high did again visit us, Lu. i. 78. His passion began in the night; when he hung on the cross the sun was darkened; he was laid in the grave in the dusk of the evening; but he rose from the grave when the sun was near rising, for he is the bright and morning star, Rev. xxii. 16; the true light. Those who address themselves early in the morning to the religious services of the Christian sabbath, that they may take the day before them, therein follow this example of Christ, and that of David, "Early will I seek thee."

2. Who they were that came to the sepulchre: "Mary Magdalene and the other ary," the same that attended the funeral, and sat "over against the sepulchre," as before they sat over against the cross; still they studied to express their love to Christ, still they were inquiring after him. Then shall we know, if we thus follow on to know. No mention is made of the Virgin Mary being with them; it is likely the beloved disciple, who had taken her to his own home hindered her from "going to the grave to weep there." Their attendance on Christ, not only to the grave, but in the grave, represents his like care for those that are his, when they have made their bed in the darkness. As Christ in the grave was beloved of the saints, so the saints in the grave are beloved of Christ; for death and the grave cannot slacken that bond of love which is between them.

3. What they came to do; the other evangelists say they came to anoint the body; Matthew saith they came "to see the sepulchre," whether it was as they left it; hearing, perhaps, but not being sure, that the chief priests had set a guard upon it. They went to shew their goodwill in another visit to the dear remains of their beloved Master, and perhaps not without some thoughts of his resurrection, for they could not have quite forgot all he had said of it. Note, Visits to the grave are of great use to Christians, and will help to make it familiar to them, and to take off the terror of it; especially visits to the grave of our Lord Jesus, where we may see sin buried out of sight, the pattern of our sanctification, and the great proof of redeeming love shining illustriously even in that land of darkness.

Secondly. The appearance of an angel of the Lord to them, ver. 2—4. We have here an account of the manner of the resurrection of Christ, as far as it was fit we should know.

1. "There was a great earthquake;" when he died, the earth that received him shook for fear; now he rose, the earth that resigned him leaped for joy in his exaltation. This earthquake did, as it were, loose the bond of death, and shake off the fetters of the grave, and introduced the "Desire of all nations," Hag. ii. 6, 7. It was the signal of Christ's victory; notice was hereby given of it, that when the heavens rejoiced the earth also might be glad. It was a specimen of the shake that will be given to the earth at the general resurrection, when mountains and islands shall be removed, that the earth may no longer cover her slain. There was a noise and a shaking in the valley, when the bones were to come together, "bone to his bone," Eze. xxxvii. 7. The kingdom of Christ which was now to be set up, made the earth to quake, and terribly shook it. Those that are sanctified, and thereby raised to a spiritual life, while it is in the doing find an earthquake in their own bosoms, as Paul, who trembled and was astonished.

2. "The angel of the Lord descended from heaven." The angels frequently attended our Lord Jesus;—at his birth, in his temptation, in his agony; but upon the cross we find no angel attending him: when his Father forsook him, the angels withdrew from him; but now he is resuming the glory he had before the foundation of the world, now, behold, "the angels of God worship him."

3. He "came and rolled back the stone from the door, and sat upon it." Our Lord Jesus could have "rolled back the stone" himself, by his own power, but he chose to have it done by an angel, to signify that, having undertaken to make satisfaction for our sin, as such was imputed to him, and being under arrest pursuant to that imputation, he did not break prison, but had a fair and legal discharge, obtained from heaven; he did not break prison, but an officer was sent on purpose to roll away the stone, and so to open the prison door, which would never have been done if he had not made a full satisfaction. But being "delivered for our offences," to complete the deliverance, he "was raised again for our justification;" he died to pay our debt, and rose again to take out our acquaintance. The stone of our sins was rolled to the door of the grave of our Lord Jesus, (and we find the rolling of a great stone to signify the contracting of guilt, 1 Sam. xiv. 33.) But to demonstrate that Divine justice was satisfied, an angel was commissioned to roll back the stone; not that the angel raised him from the dead, no more than those that took away the stone from Lazarus' grave raised him, but thus he intimated the consent of Heaven to his release, and the joy of heaven in it. The enemies of Christ had sealed the stone, resolving, like Babylon, not to open the house of his prisoners. "Shall the prey be taken from the mighty?" For this was their hour, but all the powers of death and darkness are under the control of the God of light and life. An angel from heaven has power to break the seal, though it were the great seal of Israel, and is able to roll away the stone, though never so great. Thus "the captives of the mighty are taken away." The angel's sitting upon the stone when he had rolled it away, is very observable, and speaks a secure triumph over all the obstructions of Christ's resurrection. There he sat, defying all the powers of hell to roll the stone to the grave again. Christ erects his seat of rest and seat of judgment upon the opposition of his enemies; "the Lord sitteth upon the floods." The angel sat as a guard to the grave; having frightened away the enemy's black guard, he sat expecting the women, and ready to give them an account of his resurrection.

4. That "his countenance was like lightning, and his raiment white as snow," ver. 3. This was a visible representation, by that which we call splendid and illustrious, of the glories of the invisible world, which know no difference of colours. His look upon the keepers was like flashes of lightning: "he cast forth lightning, and scattered them," Ps. cxliv. 6. The whiteness of his raiment was an emblem, not only of purity, but of joy and triumph. When Christ died, the court of heaven went into deep mourning, signified by the darkening of the sun; but when he arose, they again put on the garments of praise. The glory of this angel represented the glory of Christ, to which he was now risen, for it is the same description that was given of him in his transfiguration, 1. xvi. 2. But when he conversed with his disciples after his resurrection, he drew a veil over it, and it spoke the glory of the saints in their resurrection, when they shall be "as the angels of God in heaven."

5. That "for fear of him the keepers did shake, and became as dead men," ver. 4. They were soldiers, that thought themselves hardened against fear, yet the very sight of an angel struck them with terror. Thus when the Son of God "arose to judgment, the stout-hearted were spoiled," Ps. lxxvi. 5, 9. Note, The resurrection of Christ, as it is the joy of his friends, so it is the terror and confusion of his enemies. "They did shake;" the word ἐκείνησαν is the same with that which was used for the earthquake, ver. 2, σεισμός; when the earth shook, these children of the earth that had their portion in it shook too; whereas those that have their happiness in things above, though the earth be removed, yet are without fear. The keepers became "as dead men" when he whom they kept guard upon became alive, and they whom they kept guard against revived with him. It struck a terror upon them to see themselves baffled in that which was their business here. They were posted here to keep a dead man in his grave, as easy a piece of service sure as ever was assigned them, and yet it proves too hard for them. They were told that they must expect to be assaulted by a company of feeble, faint-hearted disciples, who, for fear of them, would soon shake, and become as dead men; but are amazed when they find themselves attacked by a mighty angel, whom they dare not look in the face. Thus doth God frustrate his enemies, by frightening them, Ps. ix. 20.

Thirdly. The message which this angel delivered to the women, ver. 5—7.

1. He encourageth them against their fears, ver. 5. To come near to graves and tombs, especially in silence and solitude, has something in it frightful, much more was it so to those women to find an angel at the sepulchre; but he soon makes them easy with the word, "Fear not ye." The keepers shook, and sealed by stretching a cord across the opening of the sepulchre, and attaching it by means of wax, the breaking of which would be an offence calling for grave punishment.

xxviii. 1. The words rendered "In the end of the Sabbath, as it began to dawn toward the first day of the week," have caused more difficulty than seems necessary. The Greek term, translated "in the end," has various meanings, such as "late," "in the evening," "after," &c., and we may therefore choose the one which gives the best sense. Hence we should translate, "Now after the Sabbath," &c. The only other view of much importance is that which considers the Roman indications of time to be given here, and would render the words, "Now late on the Sabbath," &c. It is said that Matthew makes the first day of the week here begin at sun-rise (so Lange), but we cannot entertain such an idea, if only because it is clear from chap. xxvii. 62 that the evangelist follows the correct Jewish reckoning of time. (See also Mark xvi. 1, 2.)

became as dead men, but fear not ye. Let the sinners in Zion be afraid, for there is cause for it, but fear not, Abraham, nor any of the faithful seed of Abraham. Why should the daughters of Sarah, that do well, be afraid with any amazement? 1 Pet. iii. 6. "Fear not ye." Let not the news I have to tell you be any surprise to you, for you were told before your Master would rise; let it be no terror to you, for your resurrection will be your consolation. "Fear not any hurt that I will do you, nor any evil tidings I have to tell you." "Fear not ye: for I know that ye seek Jesus." I know you are friends to the cause; I do not come to frighten you, but to encourage you. Note, Those that seek Jesus have no reason to be afraid, for if they seek him diligently they shall find him, and shall find him their bountiful rewarder. All our believing inquiries after the Lord Jesus are observed and taken notice of in heaven: "I know that ye seek Jesus," and shall certainly be answered as these were, "with good words, and comfortable words." Ye seek Jesus that was crucified." He mentions his being crucified, the more to commend their love to him; "ye seek him still, though he was crucified; you retain your kindness for him notwithstanding." Note, True believers love and seek Christ, not only though he was crucified, but because he was so.

2. He assures them of the resurrection of Christ, and there was enough in that to silence their fears, ver. 6: "He is not here, for he is risen." To be told he is not here would have been no welcome news to those who sought him, if it had not been added, "He is risen." Note, It is matter of comfort to those who seek Christ, and miss of finding him where they expected, that "he is risen." If we find him not in sensible comfort, yet "he is risen." We must not hearken to those who say, "Lo, here is Christ, or Lo, he is there," for he is not here, he is not there, "he is risen." In all our inquiries after Christ we must remember that he is risen, and we must seek him as one risen. 1st. Not with any gross carnal thoughts of him. There were those that knew Christ after the flesh, but now henceforth know him no more, 2 Cor. v. 16. It is true he had a body, but it is now a glorified body. They that make pictures and images of Christ forget that "he is not here, he is risen;" our communion with him must be spiritual, by faith in his word. Rom. x. 6-8. 2nd. We must seek him with great reverence and humility, and an awful regard to his glory, for "he is risen." God has highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name, and therefore every knee and every soul must bow before him. 3rd. We must seek him with a heavenly mind; when we are ready to make this world our home, and to say, "It is good to be here," let us remember our Lord Jesus "is not here, he is risen," and therefore let not our hearts be here, but let them rise too, and "seek the things that are above," Col. iii. 1-3; Phil. iii. 20.

Two things the angel refers these women to for the confirmation of their faith, touching Christ's resurrection: First. To his word, now fulfilled, which they might remember: "He is risen, as he said." This he voucheth as the proper object of faith; he said he would rise, and you know he is the truth itself, and therefore have reason to expect he should rise. Why should you be backward to believe that which he told you would be? Let us never think strange at that which the Word of Christ has raised our expectations of, whether the sufferings of this present time, or the glory that is to be revealed. If we remember what Christ hath said to us, we shall be the less surprised at what he doth with us. This angel, when he said, "He is not here, he is risen," makes it to appear that he preaches no other Gospel than what they had already received, for he refers himself to the Word of Christ as sufficient to bear him out: "He is risen, as he said." Secondly. To his grave now empty, which they might look into: "Come, see the place where the Lord lay." Compare what you have heard with what you see, and, putting both together, you will believe. You see he is not here, and remembering what he said, you may be satisfied "he is risen; come, see the place, and you will see he is not there; you will see he could not be stolen thence, and therefore must conclude he is risen." Note, It may be of use to affect us, and may have a good influence upon us, to come, and with an eye of faith "see the place where the Lord lay." See the marks he has there left of his love, in condescending so low for us; see how easy he has made that bed, and how lightsome for us, by lying in it himself; when we look into the grave, where we expect we must lie, to take off the terror of it let us look into the grave where the Lord lay: "the place where our Lord lay," so the Syriac. The angels own him for their Lord as well as we; for the whole family, both in heaven and earth, is named from him.

3. He directs them to go carry the tidings of it to his disciples, ver. 7: "Go quickly, and tell his disciples." It is probable they were for entertaining themselves with the sight of the sepulchre and discourse with the angels. It was good to be here, but they have other work appointed them; "this is a day of good tidings," and though they have the primer seisin of the comfort,—"the first taste"—of it, yet they must not have the monopoly of it, must not hold their peace, no more than those lepers, 2 Kin. vii. 9. They must go tell the disciples. Note, Public usefulness to others must be preferred before the pleasure of secret communion with God ourselves; for "it is more blessed to give than to receive." Observe,

1st. The disciples of Christ must first be told the news; not, Go, tell the chief priests and the Pharisees, that they may be confounded; but, Tell the disciples, that they may be comforted. God anticipates the joy of his friends more than the shame of his enemies, though the perfection of both is reserved for hereafter. Tell his disciples, it may be they will believe your report, however tell them. First. That they may encourage themselves under their present sorrows and dispersions. It was a dismal time with them, between grief and fear; what a cordial would this be to them now to hear their Master is risen. Secondly. That they may inquire further into it themselves. This alarm was sent them to awaken them from that strange stupidity which had seized them, and to raise their expectations; this was to set them on seeking him, and to prepare them for his appearance to them. General hints excite to closer searches. They now shall hear of him, but shall very shortly see him. Christ discovers himself gradually.

2nd. The women are sent to tell it them, and so are made, as it were, the apostles of the apostles. This was an honour put upon them, and a recompence for their constant, affectionate adherence to him, at the cross and in the grave, and a rebuke to the disciples who forsook him. Still God chooseth the weak things of the world to confound the mighty, and puts the treasure, not only into earthen vessels, but here into the weaker vessels: as the woman, being deceived by the suggestions of an evil angel, was first in the transgression, 1 Tim. ii. 14, so these women, being duly informed by the instructions of a good angel, were first in the belief of the redemption from transgression by Christ's resurrection, that that reproach of their sex might be rolled away, by putting this in the balance against it, which is their perpetual praise.

3rd. They were bid to "go quickly" upon this errand. Why, what haste was there? Would not the news keep cold, and be welcome to them at any time? Yes, but they were now overwhelmed with grief, and Christ would have this cordial hastened to them: when Daniel was humbling himself before God for sin, the angel Gabriel was caused to fly swiftly with a message of comfort, Dan. ix. 21. We must always be ready and forward, First. To obey the commands of God, Ps. cxix. 60. Secondly. To do good to our brethren, and to carry comfort to them, as those that feel for their afflictions: "Say not, go and come again, and to-morrow I will give;" but now, quickly.

4. They were directed to appoint the disciples to meet him in Galilee. There were other appearances of Christ to them before that in Galilee, which were sudden and surprising, but he would have one to be solemn and public, and gave them notice of it before. Now this general rendezvous was appointed in Galilee, eighty or an hundred miles from Jerusalem, First. In kindness to those of his disciples that remained in Galilee, and did not, perhaps they could not, come up to Jerusalem; and therefore into that country he would go to manifest himself to his friends there. "I know thy works, and where thou dwellest." Christ knows where his disciples dwell, and will visit there. Note, The exaltation of Christ doth not make him forget the meaner and poorer sort of his disciples, but even to them that are at a distance from the plenty of the means of grace he will graciously manifest himself. Secondly. In consideration of the weakness of his disciples that were now at Jerusalem, who as yet were afraid of the Jews, and durst not appear publicly, and therefore this meeting was adjourned to Galilee. Christ knows our fears, and considers our frame, and made his appointment where there was least danger of disturbance.

5. The angel solemnly affirms upon his word the truth of what he had related to them, "Lo, I have told you;" you may be assured of it, and depend upon it; I have told you, who dare not tell a lie. "The word spoken by angels was stedfast," Heb. ii. 2. God had been wont formerly to make known his mind to his people by the ministration of angels, as at the giving of the law; but intending in gospel times to lay aside that way of communication, (for "unto the angels hath he not put in subjection the world to come," nor appointed them to be the preachers of the Gospel,) this angel was now sent to certify the resurrection of Christ to the disciples, and so leave it in their hands to be published to the world, 2 Cor. iv. 7. In saying, "Lo, I have told you," he doth as it were discharge himself from the blame of their unbelief, if they should not receive this record, and throw it upon them. "I have done my errand, I have faithfully delivered my message; now look you to it, believe it at your peril; whether you will hear, or whether you will forbear, 'I have told you.'" Note, Those messengers from God that discharge their trust faithfully may take the comfort of that, whatever the success be, Acts xx. 26, 27.

Fourthly. The women's departure from the sepulchre, to bring notice to the disciples, ver. 8. And observe,

1. What frame and temper of spirit they were in: "they departed with fear and great joy;" a strange mixture,—fear and joy at the same time, in the same soul. To hear that Christ was risen was matter of joy; but to be led into his grave, and to see and talk with an angel about it, could not but cause fear. It was good news; but they were afraid it was too good to be true. But observe, it is said of their joy, it was great joy; it is not said so of their fear. Note, 1st. Holy fear has joy attending it. They that serve the Lord with reverence serve him with gladness. 2nd. Spiritual joy is mixed with trembling, Ps. ii. 11. It is only perfect love and joy that will cast out all fear.

2. What haste they made: "They did run." The fear and joy together quickened their pace, and added wings to their motion; the angel bid them go quickly, and they ran. Those that are sent on God's errand must not loiter, or lose time; where the heart is enlarged with the glad tidings of the Gospel, the feet will run the way of God's commandments.

3. What errand they went upon: they did run to "bring his disciples word." Not doubting but it would be joyful news to them, they ran to comfort them with the same comforts wherewith they themselves were comforted of God. Note, The disciples of Christ should be forward to communicate to each other their experiences of sweet communion with Heaven; should tell others what God has done for their souls, and spoken to them. Joy in Christ Jesus, like the ointment of the right hand, will betray itself, and fill all places within the lines of its communication, with its odours. When Samson found honey, he brought it to his parents.

Fifthly, Christ's appearing to the women, to confirm the testimony of the angel, ver. 9, 10. These zealous, good women not only heard the first tidings of him, but had the first sight of him after his resurrection. The angel directed those that would see him to go to Galilee; but before that time came, even here also they looked after him that lives and sees them. Note, Jesus Christ is often better than his word, but never worse; often anticipates, but never frustrates the believing expectations of his people. Here is,

1. Christ's surprising appearance to the women: "As they went to tell his disciples, behold Jesus met them." Note, God's gracious visits usually meet us in the way of duty; and to those who use what they have for others' benefit, more shall be given. This interview with Christ was unexpected, or ever they were aware, Cant. vi. 12. Note, Christ is nearer to his people than they imagine. They needed not descend into the deep to fetch Christ thence; he was not there, he was risen; nor go up to heaven, for he was not yet ascended; but Christ was nigh them, and still Christ, in the Word, is nigh us.

2. The salutation wherewith he accosted them: "All hail," καίρετε. We use the old English form of salutation, wishing all health to those we meet; for so "All hail," signifies, and is expressive of the Greek form of salutation here used, answering to that of the Hebrew, 'Peace be unto you.' And it speaks, 1st. The good-will of Christ to us and our happiness, even since he entered upon his state of exaltation. Though he be advanced, he wisheth us as well as ever, and is as much concerned for our comfort. 2nd. The freedom and holy familiarity which he used in his fellowship with his disciples; for he called them friends. But the Greek word signifies, 'Rejoice ye.' They were affected both with fear and joy; what he said to them tended to encourage their joy, ver. 9, 'Rejoice ye;' and to silence their fear, ver. 10, 'Be not afraid.' Note, It is the will of Christ that his people should be a cheerful, joyful people; and his resurrection furnisheth them with abundant matter for joy.

3. The affectionate respect they paid him: "They came and held him by the feet, and worshipped him." Thus they expressed, 1st. The reverence and honour they had for him; they threw themselves at his feet, put themselves into a posture of adoration, and worshipped him with humility and godly fear, as the Son of God, and now exalted. 2nd. The love and affection they had to him: they held him, and would not let him go, Cant. iii. 4. How beautiful were the feet of the Lord Jesus to them, Isa. lii. 7. 3rd. The transport of joy they were in, now they had this further assurance of his resurrection; they welcomed it with both arms. Thus we must embrace Jesus Christ offered us in the Gospel, with reverence cast ourselves at his feet, by faith take hold of him, and with love and joy lay him near our hearts.

4. The encouraging words Christ said to them, ver. 10. We do not find they said any thing to him; their affectionate embraces and adorations spoke plainly enough; and what he said to them was no more than what the angel had said, ver. 5, 7; for he "will confirm the word of his messengers." Isa. xlv. 26; and his way of comforting his people is by his Spirit; to speak over again to their hearts the same that they had heard before from his angels the ministers. Now observe here,

1st. How he rebukes their fear: "Be not afraid." They must not fear being imposed upon by these repeated notices of his resurrection, nor fear any hurt by the appearance of one from the dead; for the news, though strange, was xviii. 2-4. Some in ancient and in modern times have taken this narration as an account of the circumstances of the actual resurrection of our Saviour; but others regard it as an account of what the women actually saw, the resurrection having previously taken place. From what is said of the keepers, or guards, it is clear that they had not abandoned their post.

xviii. 7. The Greek word rendered "goeth before" corresponds in sense with the Syriac participle and the English form, "is going before." Therefore, "he is going before you" means "he is about to go," or will go shortly. That Jesus was not yet gone, verse 9 shows. For the promise to do so, see chap. xxvi. 32.

xxviii. 9. The words "as they went to tell his disciples" are omitted by the Vatican, Sinaitic, and Cambridge MSS., by the Syriac and Vulgate versions, and by some modern editors, as Lachmann, Tischendorf, Tregelles, and Alford. They are found, however, in the Alexandrian and in twelve other Uncial MSS. It is supposed both true and good. Note, Christ rose from the dead to silence his people's fears; and there is enough in that to silence them.

2nd. How he repeats their message: "Go, tell my brethren," that they must prepare for a journey into Galilee; and there they shall see me. If there be any communion between our souls and Christ, it is he that appoints the meeting, and he will observe the appointment. Jerusalem had forfeited the honour of Christ's presence; it was a tumultuous city, therefore he adjourns the meeting to Galilee: "come, my beloved, let us go forth," Cant. vii. 11. But that which is especially observable here is, that he calls his disciples his brethren: "Go, tell my brethren," not only those of them that were akin to him, but all the rest; for they are all his brethren, ch. xii. 50: but he never called them so till after his resurrection, here, and Jno. xx. 17. Being by the resurrection himself "declared to be the Son of God with power," all the children of God were thereby declared to be his brethren. Being "the first begotten from the dead," he is become "the firstborn among many brethren," even of all that are planted together in the likeness of his resurrection. Christ did not now converse so constantly and familiarly with his disciples as he had done before his death; but lest they should think him grown strange to them, he gives them this endearing title, Go to my brethren, that the Scripture might be fulfilled which, speaking of his entrance upon his exalted state, saith, "I will declare thy name unto my brethren." They had shamefully deserted him in his sufferings; but to shew that he could forgive and forget, and to teach us to do so, he not only continues his purpose to meet them, but calls them brethren. Being all his brethren, they were brethren one to another, and must love as brethren. His owning them for his brethren, put a great honour upon them; but withal, gave them an example of humility in the midst of that honour.

11 Now when they were going, behold, some of the watch came into the city, and shewed unto the chief priests all the things that were done. 12 And when they were assembled with the elders, and had taken counsel, they gave large money unto the soldiers, 13 Saying, Say ye, His disciples came by night, and stole him away while we slept. 14 And if this come to the governor's ears, we will persuade him, and secure you. 15 So they took the money, and did as they were taught: and this saying is commonly reported among the Jews until this day.

For the further proof of the resurrection of Christ, we have here the confession of the adversaries that were upon the guard; and there are two things which strengthen this testimony: that they were eye-witnesses, and did themselves see the glory of the resurrection, which none else did; and that they were enemies, set there to oppose and obstruct his resurrection. Now observe here,

First. How this testimony was given in to the chief priests, ver. 11. When the women were going to bring that news to the disciples, which would fill their hearts with joy, the soldiers went to bring the same news to the chief priests, which would fill their faces with shame. "Some of the watch," probably those of them that commanded in chief, "came into the city," and brought to those who employed them, the report of their disappointment. "They shewed to the chief priests all the things that were done;" told them of the earthquake, the descent of the angel, the rolling of the stone away, and the coming of the body of Jesus alive out of the grave. Thus the sign of the prophet Jonas was brought to the chief priests, with the most clear and uncontested evidence that could be; and so the utmost means of conviction were afforded them: we may well imagine what a mortification it was to them, and that, like the enemies of the Jews, they were much cast down in their own eyes, Neh. vi. 16. It might justly have been expected that they should now have believed in Christ, and repented their putting him to death; but they were obstinate in their infidelity, and therefore sealed up under it.

Secondly. How it was baffled and stifted by them. They called an assembly, and considered what was to be done. For their own parts they were resolved not to believe that Jesus was risen; but their care was to keep others from believing, and themselves from being quite shamed from their disbelief of it. They had put him to death, and there was no way of standing to what they had done, but by confronting the evidence of his resurrection. Thus they who have sold themselves to work wickedness, find that one sin draws on another, and they have plunged themselves into a wretched necessity of adding iniquity to iniquity, which is part of the curse of Christ's persecutors, Psa. lxi. 27. The result of their debate was, that those soldiers must by all means be bribed off, and hired not to tell tales.

1. They put money into their hands; and what wickedness is it which men will not be brought to by the love of money? "They gave large money;" it is likely, a great deal more than they gave to Judas, "unto the soldiers." These chief priests loved their money as well as most people did, and were as loath to part with it; and yet, to carry on a malicious design against the Gospel of Christ, they were very prodigal of it; they gave the soldiers, it is likely, as much as they asked; and they knew how to improve their advantages. Here was large money given for the advancing of that which they knew to be a lie; yet many grudge a little money for the advancement of that which they know to be the truth, though they have a promise of being reimbursed in the resurrection of the just. Let us never starve a good cause, when we see a bad one so liberally supported.

2. They put a lie into their mouths: ver. 13. "Say ye, His disciples came by night, and stole him away while we slept;" a sorry shift is better than none; but this is a sorry one indeed. 1st. The sham was ridiculous, and carried along with it its own confutation; if they slept, how could they know any thing of the matter, or say who came? If any one of them were awake to observe it, no doubt he would awake them all to oppose it; for that was the only thing they had in charge. It was altogether improbable that a company of poor, weak, cowardly, dispirited men, should expose themselves for so inconsiderable an achievement as the rescue of the dead body. Why were not the houses where they lodged diligently searched, and other means used to discover the dead body? but this was so thin a lie as one might easily see through. But had it been never so plausible, 2nd. it was a very wicked thing for these priests and elders to hire these soldiers to tell a deliberate lie, (if it had been in a matter of never so small importance) against their consciences. Those know not what they do that draw others to commit one wilful sin; for that may debauch conscience, and be an inlet to many. But, 3rd. Considering this as intended to overthrow the great doctrine of Christ's resurrection, this was a sin against the last remedy, and was, in effect, a blasphemy against the Holy Ghost; imputing that to the rogues of the disciples which was done by the power of the Holy Ghost. But lest the soldiers should object the penalty they incurred by the Roman law, for sleeping upon the guard, which was very severe, Acts xii. 19, they promised to interpose with the governor: "we will persuade him, and secure you." We will use our own interest in him to get him not to take notice of it; and they had lately found how easily they could manage him. If really these soldiers had slept, and so suffered his disciples to steal him away, as they would have the world believe, it is certain the priests and elders would have been the forwardest to solicit the governor to punish them for their treachery; so that their care for the soldiers' safety plainly gives the lie to the story. They undertook to secure the sword of Pilate's justice; but could not secure them from the sword of God's justice, which hangs over the head of those that love and make a lie. They promise more than they can perform, who undertake to save a man harmless in the commission of a wilful sin. Well, thus was the plot laid; now, what success had it?

First. Those that were willing to deceive "took the money, and did as they were taught." They cared as little for Christ and his religion, as the chief priests and elders did; and men that have no religion at all can be very well pleased to see Christianity run down, and lend a hand to it, if need be to serve a turn: "They took the money;" that was it they aimed at and nothing else. Note, Money is a bait for the blackest temptation; mercenary tongues will sell the truth for it. The great argument to prove Christ to be the Son of God is his resurrection; and none could have more convincing proofs of the truth of that than these soldiers had: they saw the angel descend from heaven; saw the stone rolled away; saw the body of Christ come out of the grave, unless the consternation they felt hindered them; and yet were so far from being convinced by it themselves, that they were hired to belie him, and to hinder others from believing in him. Note, The most sensible evidences will not convince men without the concurring operation of the Holy Spirit.

Secondly. Those that were willing to be deceived, not only credited, but propagated the story. "This saying is commonly reported among the Jews until this day." The sham took well enough, and answered the end. The Jews who persisted in their infidelity, when they were pressed with the argument of Christ's resurrection, had this still ready to reply, "His disciples came and stole him away." To this purpose was the solemn narrative, which (as Justin Martyr relates in his Dialogue with Trypho the Jew) the great sanhedrim sent to all the Jews of the dispersion, concerning this affair, exciting them to a vigorous resistance of Christianity, that when they had crucified and buried him, the disciples came by night and stole him out of the sepulchre; designing thereby, not only to overthrow the truth of Christ's resurrection, but to render his disciples odious to the world, as the greatest villains in nature. When once a lie is raised, none knows how far it will spread, nor how long it will last, nor what mischief it will do. Some give another sense of this passage: "This saying is commonly reported;" that is, notwithstanding the artifice of the chief priests thus to impose upon the people, yet the collusion that was between them and the soldiers, and the money that was given to support the cheat, was commonly reported and whispered among the Jews; for, one way or other, truth will out.

16 Then the eleven disciples went away into Galilee, into a mountain where Jesus had appointed them. 17 And when they saw him, they worshipped him: but some doubted. 18 And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. 19 Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: 20 Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world. Amen.

This evangelist passeth over several other appearances of Christ, recorded by Luke and John, and hastens to this, which was of all other the most solemn, as being promised and appointed again and again, before his death, and after his resurrection. Observe,

First. How the disciples attended this appearance, according to the appointment, ver. 16: "They went into Galilee;" a long journey to go for one sight of Christ; but it was worth while. They had seen him several times at Jerusalem, and yet they went into Galilee to see him there. 1. Because he appointed them to do so. Though it seemed a needless thing to go into Galilee, to see him whom they might see at Jerusalem; especially when they must so soon come back again to Jerusalem, before his ascension; yet they had learned to obey Christ's commands, and not object against them. Note, Those who would maintain communion with Christ, must attend him there where he has appointed. Those that have met him in one ordinance, must attend him in another, — that have seen him at Jerusalem, must go to Galilee. 2. Because that was to be a public and general meeting. They had seen him themselves, and conversed with him in private; but that should not excuse their attendance in a solemn assembly, where many were to be gathered together to see him. Note, Our communion with God in secret must not supersede our attendance on public worship, as we have opportunity; for God loves the gates of Zion, and so must we. The place was a mountain in Galilee; probably the same mountain on which he was transfigured. There they met for privacy; and perhaps to signify the exalted state into which he was entered, and his advances towards the upper world.

Secondly. How they were affected with the appearance of Christ to them, ver. 17. Now was the time that "he was seen of above five hundred brethren at once," 1 Cor. xv. 6. Some think they saw him at first at some distance, above in the air, ὡς ἐν ἄνθρῳ; — "He was seen above of five hundred brethren;" so they read it; which gave occasion to some to doubt till he came nearer, ver. 18, and then they were satisfied. We are told,

1. That "they worshipped him;" many of them did so, nay, it should seem they all did that; they gave Divine honour to him, which was signified by some outward expressions of adoration. Note, All that see the Lord Jesus with an eye of faith are obliged to worship him. "But some doubted?" some of those that they were added by some early copyist, as required to make the sense complete.

xxviii. 10. The expression, "Go tell my brethren that they go into Galilee," means "Go, tell my brethren, in order that they may go into Galilee."

xxviii. 12. As Dean Alford suggests, this meeting of the Sanhedrim was hardly an official and open one, but rather special and private.

xxviii. 14. The sense is, "And if this be heard before the governor, we will persuade him, and make you free from anxiety." Some writers understand it to refer to a judicial examination or hearing before Pilate, but others suppose it means "when the report of this shall reach his ears." The danger to the soldiers was so great that they might well be anxious, but it was probably hoped to pacify Pilate by persuasion or a bribe.

xxviii. 15. Grotius quotes passages from Justin and Tertullian to that were then present. Note, Even among those that worship there are some that doubt. The faith of those that are sincere may yet be very weak and wavering. They doubted, ἰσχυροῦσαν,—they "hung in suspense," as the scales of the balance, when it is hard to say which preponderates. These doubts were afterwards removed, and their faith grew up to a full assurance; and it tended much to the honour of Christ, that the disciples doubted before they believed; so that they cannot be said to be credulous, and willing to be imposed upon, for they first questioned, and proved all things, and then held fast that which was true, and they found to be so.

Thirdly. What Jesus Christ said to them, ver. 18—20: "Jesus came and spake unto them." Though there were those that doubted, yet he did not therefore reject them, for "He will not break the bruised reed;" he did not stand at a distance, but came near, and gave them such convincing proofs of his resurrection as turned the wavering scale, and made their faith to triumph over their doubts. He came and spake familiarly to them, as one friend speaks to another, that they might be fully satisfied in the commission he was about to give them. He that drew near to God to speak for us to him, draws near to us to speak from him to us. Christ now delivered to his apostles the great charter of his kingdom in the world; was sending them out as his ambassadors, and here gives them their credentials. In opening this great charter, we may observe two things:

1. The commission which our Lord Jesus received himself from the Father; being about to authorize his apostles, if any ask, By what authority he doth it, and who gave him that authority? here he tells us, "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth;" a very great word, and which none but he could say. Hereby he asserts his universal dominion as Mediator; which is the great foundation of the Christian religion. He has "all power." Observe,

1st. Whence he hath this power. He did not assume it, or usurp it, but it was given him; he was legally entitled to it, and invested in it by a grant from Him who is the fountain of all being, and consequently of all power. God set him king, Ps. ii. 6; inaugurated and enthroned him, Lu. i. 32. As God, equal with the Father, all power was originally and essentially his; but as Mediator, as God-man, all power was given him, partly in recompence of his work, because he humbled himself, therefore God thus exalted him; and partly in pursuance of his design; he had this power given him over all flesh, that he might give eternal life to as many as were given him, Jno. xvi. 2, for the more effectual carrying on and completing our salvation. This power he was now more signally invested in upon his resurrection, Acts xiii. 33. He had power before,—“power to forgive sins,” Mat. ix. 6, but now “all power” is given him. He is now going to receive for himself a kingdom, Lu. xix. 12; to sit down at the right hand, Ps. cx. 1. Having purchased it, nothing remains but to take possession; it is his own for ever.

2nd. Where he has this power: “in heaven and earth,” comprehending the universe. Christ is the sole, universal monarch, he is “Lord of all,” Acts x. 36. He hath “all power in heaven;” he has power of dominion over the angels; they are all his humble servants, Eph. i. 20, 21. He has power of intercession with his Father, in the virtue of his satisfaction and atonement; he intercedes, not as a suppliant, but as a demandant; “Father, I will.” He hath all power on earth too; having prevailed with God by the sacrifice of atonement, he prevails with men, and deals with them as one having authority, by the ministry of reconciliation. He is indeed, in all causes, and over all persons, supreme moderator and governor. By him kings reign. All souls are his; and to him every heart and knee must bow, and every tongue confess him to be Lord. This our Lord Jesus tells them, not only to satisfy them of the authority he had to commission them, and to bring them out in the execution of their commission, but to take off the offence of the cross; they had no reason to be ashamed of Christ crucified, when they saw him thus glorified.

2. The commission he gives to those whom he sent forth: “Go ye, therefore.” This commission is given, 1st. To the apostles primarily; the chief ministers of state in Christ's kingdom, the architects that laid the foundation of the church. Now those that had followed Christ in the regeneration were set on thrones, Lu. xxii. 30. “Go ye.” It is not only a word of command, like that, “Son, go work;” but a word of encouragement, “Go and fear not; have not I sent you? Go, and make a business of this work.” They must not take state, and issue out summons to the nations to attend upon them; but they must go, and bring the Gospel to their doors: “Go ye.” They had doted on Christ's bodily presence, and hung upon that, and built all their joys and hopes upon that; but now Christ dischargeth them from further attendance on his person, and sends them abroad, about other work. “As an eagle stirs up her nest, flutters over her young,” to excite them to fly, (Deu. xxxii. 11), so Christ stirs up his disciples to disperse themselves into all the world. 2nd. It is given to their successors, the ministers of the Gospel, whose business it is to transmit the Gospel from age to age, to the end of the world in time, as it was theirs to transmit it from nation to nation, to the end of the world in place, and no less necessary. The Old Testament promise of a gospel ministry is made to a succession, Isa. lix. 21; and this here must be understood; otherwise, how could Christ be with them always to the consummation of the world? Christ, at his ascension, gave not only apostles and prophets, but pastors and teachers, Eph. iv. 11. Now observe,

First. How far this commission is extended, “to all nations.” “Go, and disciple all nations;” not that they must go all together into every place; but, by consent, disperse themselves in such manner as might best diffuse the light of the Gospel. Now this plainly signifies it to be the will of Christ, 1st. That the covenant of peculiarity made with the Jews should now be cancelled and disannulled. This word broke down the middle wall of partition, which had so long excluded the Gentiles from a visible church state; and whereas the apostles, when first sent out, were forbidden to go into the way of the Gentiles, now they were sent “to all nations.” 2nd. That salvation by Christ should be offered to all; and none excluded that did not, by their own unbelief and impenitence, exclude themselves. The salvation they were to preach is a common salvation: “whoever will, let him come,” and take the benefit of the act of indemnity; for there is no difference of Jew or Greek in Christ Jesus. 3rd. That Christianity should be twisted in with national constitutions, that the kingdoms of the world should become Christ's kingdoms, and their kings the church's nursing fathers.

Secondly. What is the principal intention of this commission, to “disciple all nations,” μαθητεύσατε. “Admit them disciples, do your utmost to make the nations Christian nations.” Not, “Go to the nations, and denounce the judgments of God against them,” as Jonah against Nineveh, and the Old Testament prophets; though they had reason enough to expect it, for their wickedness; but, “Go, and disciple them.” Christ the mediator is setting up a kingdom in the world, bring the nations to be his subjects; setting up a school, bring the nations to be his scholars; raising an army for the carrying on of the war against the powers of darkness, list the nations of the earth under his banner. The work which the apostles had to do, was to set up the Christian religion in all places, and it was honourable work; the achievements of the mighty heroes of the world were nothing to it: they conquered the nations for themselves, and made them miserable; the apostles conquered them for Christ, and made them happy.

Thirdly. Their instructions for executing this commission.

1st. They must admit disciples by the sacred rite of baptism: “Go into all nations, preach the Gospel to them, work miracles among them, and persuade them to come in themselves, and bring their children with them, into the church of Christ; and then admit them and theirs into the church, by washing them with water;” either dipping them in the water, or by pouring or sprinkling water upon them, which seems the more proper, because the thing is most frequently expressed so; as Isa. xlv. 3, “I will pour my Spirit on thy seed;” and Tit. iii. 5, 6, “which he shed on us abundantly;” and Eze. xxxvi. 25, “I will sprinkle clean water upon you;” and Isa. lii. 15, “So shall he sprinkle many nations,” which seems a prophecy of this commission to baptize the nations.

2nd. This baptism must be administered “in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost;” that is, First, By authority from the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. The baptism of Jesus is from Heaven, and not of man; for his ministers act by authority from the three persons in the godhead, who all concur, as to our creation, so to our redemption; they have their commission under the great seal of Heaven, which puts an honour upon the ordinance, though to a carnal eye, like him that instituted it, it has no form or comeliness. Secondly. Calling upon the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Every thing is sanctified by prayer, and particularly the waters of baptism. The prayer of faith obtains the presence of God with the ordinance, which is its lustre and beauty, its life and efficacy. But, Thirdly. It is “into the name” (εἰς τὸ ὄνομα) “of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.” This was intended as the summary of the first principles of the Christian religion, and of the new covenant; and according to it the ancient creeds were drawn up. By our being baptized, we solemnly profess, 1. Our assent to the Scripture revelation concerning God, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. We confess our belief that there is a God, that there is but one God; that, in the godhead, there is a Father that begets, a Son that is begotten, and a Holy Spirit of both. We are baptized, not into the names, but into the name of Father, Son, and Spirit, which plainly speaks that these three are one, and their name one. The distinct mentioning of the three persons in the Trinity, both in the Christian baptism here, and in the Christian blessing, 2 Cor. xiii. 14, as it is a full proof of the doctrine of the Trinity, so it has done much towards the preserving of it pure and entire through all ages of the church; for nothing is more great and awful in Christian assemblies than these two. 2. Our consent to a covenant relation to God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Baptism is a sacrament; that is, it is an oath. (Super sacramentum dicere, is, “to say upon oath.”) It is an oath of abjuration, by which we renounce the world and the flesh, as rivals with God for the throne in our hearts; and an oath of allegiance, by which we resign and give up ourselves to God, to be his,—our own selves, our whole selves—body, soul, and spirit,—to be governed by his will, and made happy in his favour; we become his men; so the form of homage in our law runs. Therefore baptism is applied to the person, as livery and seisin are given of the premises, because it is the person that is dedicated to God.

1st. It is into the name of the Father, believing him to be the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ (for that is principally intended here) by eternal generation, and our Father, as our creator, preserver, and benefactor; to whom, therefore, we resign ourselves as our absolute owner and proprietor, to act us and dispose of us—as our supreme rector and governor, to rule us, as free agents, by his law, and as our chief good, and highest end. 2nd. It is into the name of the Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, and correlate to the Father. Baptism was in a particular manner administered in the name of the Lord Jesus, Acts viii. 16; xix. 5. In baptism we assent, as Peter did, “Thou art Christ, the Son of the living God,” ch. xvi. 16; and consent, as Thomas did, “My Lord and my God,” Jno. xx. 28; we take Christ to be our prophet, priest, and king, and give up ourselves to be taught, and saved, and ruled by him. 3rd. It is into the name of the Holy Ghost. Believing the godhead of the Holy Spirit, and his agency in carrying on our redemption, we give up ourselves to his conduct and operation, as our sanctifier, teacher, guide, and comforter.

3rd. Those that are thus baptized, and enrolled among the disciples of Christ, must be taught, ver. 20: “teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you.” This speaks two things:

First. The duty of disciples, of all baptized Christians; they must observe all things whatsoever Christ has commanded; and, in order to that, must submit to the teaching of those whom he sends. Our admission into the visible church is in order to something further: when Christ hath disciplined us, he hath not done with us; he lists soldiers that he may train them up for his service. All that are baptized are thereby obliged, 1. To make the command of Christ their rule. There is a law of faith, and we are said to be under the law to Christ; we are by baptism bound, and must obey. 2. To observe what Christ has commanded. Due obedience to the commands of Christ requires a diligent observation; we are in danger of missing, if we take not good heed; and in all our obedience, we must have an eye to the command, and do what we do as unto the Lord. 3. To observe all things that he hath commanded, without exception; all the moral duties, and all the instituted ordinances. Our obedience to the laws of Christ is not sincere if it be not universal; we must stand complete in his whole will. 4. To confine themselves to the commands of Christ; and, as not to diminish from them, so not to add to them. 5. To learn their duty, according to the law of Christ, from those whom he has appointed to be teachers in his school; for therefore we were entered into his school.

Secondly. The duty of the apostles of Christ, and his ministers; and that is, to teach the commands of Christ, to expound them to his disciples, to press upon them the necessity of obedience, and to assist them in applying the general commands of Christ to particular cases. They must teach them, not their own inventions, but the institutions of Christ; to them they must religiously adhere, and in the knowledge of them Christians must be trained up. A standing ministry is hereby settled in the church, for the edifying of the body of Christ, till we all come to the perfect man, Eph. iv. 11—13. The heirs of heaven, till they come to age, must be under tutors and governors.

3. Here is the assurance he gives them of his spiritual presence with them in the execution of this commission: “And, lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world.” This exceeding great and precious promise is ushered in with a “behold,” to strengthen their faith, and engage their observation of it: “Take notice of this; it is what you may assure yourselves of, and venture upon.” Observe here,

1st. The favour promised them, “I am with you;” not, “I will be with you;” but “I am,” ἐγὼ εἰμι. As God sent Moses, so Christ sent his apostles, by this name, “I am;” for he is God, to whom past, present, and to come, are the same name. Rev. i. 8. He was now about to leave them, his bodily presence was now to be removed from them; and this grieved them. But he assures them of his spiritual presence, which was more expedient for them than his bodily presence could be: “I am with you;” that is, “My Spirit is with you;” the Comforter shall “abide with you,” Jno. xvi. 7; “I am with you, and not against you; with you, to take your part, to be on your side, and to hold with you;” as Michael our prince is said to do, Dan. x. 21. “I am with you, and not absent from you;” not at a distance; I am a very present help, Ps. xli. 1. Christ was now show that the Pharisees circulated this report by appointed messengers.

xxviii. 16. For “into a mountain,” translate “to the mountain,” as some particular mountain is intended. Some have thought Tabor is meant, others that it was a lonely mountain in the north of Galilee, while a later tradition fixes on the northern height of the Mount of Olives. This last opinion arises, perhaps, from the supposition that the incidents here recorded took place at the time of the Ascension, which is an error. St. Matthew records neither the fact nor the manner of the Ascension, but closes his narrative abruptly with the address to the disciples. Lange thinks the Ascension is omitted because of the Saviour's promise to be always with his disciples—an omnipresence which evidently comprehends it.

xxviii. 20. The word “Amen” is omitted by some of the oldest and best manuscripts, and by some versions and fathers, as well as by some modern editors. On this word Adam Clarke says, “When sending them to set up his kingdom in the world, which was a great undertaking: and then doth he seasonably promise them his presence with them. First. To carry them on through the difficulties they were likely to meet with: "I am with you, to bear you up, to plead your cause; with you, in all your services, in all your sufferings, to bring you through them with comfort and honour. When you go through the fire, or water, I will be with you; in the pulpit, in the prison, "Lo, I am with you." Secondly. To succeed this great undertaking: "Lo, I am with you;" to make your ministry effectual for the discipling of the nations, for the pulling down of the strongholds of Satan, and the setting up of stronger for the Lord Jesus. It was an unlikely thing that they should unhinge national constitutions in religion, and turn the stream of so long a usage—that they should establish a doctrine so directly contrary to the genius of the age, and persuade people to become the disciples of a crucified Jesus; but, "Lo, I am with you;" and therefore you shall gain your point.

2nd. The continuance of the favour, "always, even unto the end of the world." First. They shall have his constant presence, "always," παρὰς τὰς ἡμέρας, 'all days,' every day; 'I will be with you on sabbath days, on week days, fair days and foul days, winter days and summer days.' There is no day, no hour of the day, in which our Lord Jesus is not present with his churches, and with his ministers: if there were, that day, that hour, they were undone. Since his resurrection, he had appeared to them now and then; once a week, it may be, and scarcely that. But he assures them they shall have his spiritual presence continued to them without intermission. Wherever we are, the Word of Christ is nigh us, even in our mouth, and the Spirit of Christ nigh us, even in our hearts. "The God of Israel, the Saviour," is sometimes "a God that hideth himself," Isa. xlv. 15, but never a God that absenteth himself; sometimes in the dark, but never at a distance. Secondly. They shall have his perpetual presence, "even to the end of the world." There is a world before us that will never have an end, but this is hastening towards its period; and even till then the Christian religion shall, in one part of the world or other, be kept up, and the presence of Christ continued with his ministers. 1st. "I am with you to the end of the world;" not with your persons, they died quickly, but with you and your writings. There is a Divine power going along with the Scriptures of the New Testament, not only preserving them in being, producing strange effects by them, which will continue to the end of time. 2nd. "With you and your successors: with you, and all the ministers of the Gospel in the several ages of the church;" with all to whom this commission extends; with all that, being duly called and sent, thus baptize, and thus teach. When the end of the world is come, and the kingdom delivered up to God even the Father, there will then be no further need of ministers and their ministration; but till then they shall continue, and the great intentions of the institution shall be answered. This is an encouraging word to all the faithful ministers of Christ, that what was said to the apostles was said to them all, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee."

Two solemn farewells we find our Lord Jesus giving to his church; and his parting word, at both of them, is very encouraging. One was here, when he closed up his personal converse with them, and then his parting word was, "Lo, I am with you always;" "I leave you, and yet still I am with you." The other was, when he closed up the canon of the Scripture by the pen of his beloved disciple; and then his parting word was, "Surely, I come quickly;" "I leave you for a while, but I will be with you again shortly," Rev. xxii. 20. By this it appears he did not part in anger, but in love, and that it is his will we should keep up both our communion with him, and our expectation of him.

There is one word more remaining, which must not be overlooked; and that is, "Amen," which is not a cipher, intended only for a concluding word, like "finis," at the end of a book; but it has its significance. 1. It speaks Christ's confirmation of this promise, "Lo, I am with you." It is his amen, "in whom all the promises are yea and amen;" "Verily, I am, and will be with you; I, the amen, the faithful witness, do assure you of it." Or, 2. It speaks the church's concurrence with it, in their desire, and prayer, and expectation. It is the evangelist's 'amen, so be it, blessed Lord.' Our 'amen,' to Christ's promises, turns them into prayers. Hath Christ promised to be present with his ministers,—present in his Word,—present in the assemblies of his people, though but two or three are gathered together in his name, and this "always, even to the end of the world?"—let us heartily say 'Amen' to it; believe that it shall be so, and pray that it may be so: Lord, "remember this word unto thy servants, upon which thou hast caused us to hope."

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES TO THE GOSPEL OF ST. MATTHEW.

CHAP. I.—17. Carrying away into Babylon. This refers to the captivity of Jerusalem, and the removal of the Jews to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, (2 Chr. xxxvi.) 588 years before Christ. 20. Angel of the Lord. The word angel literally signifies a messenger. It is sometimes applied to men as messengers, (Lu. vii. 24; ix. 52; Jas. ii. 25.) to the winds, (Ps. civ. 4.) to the pestilence, (Ps. lxxviii. 49.) or to whatever is appointed to make known or execute the will of God. It is chiefly applied, however, in the Scriptures, to those invisible, holy, and happy beings who have not fallen into sin, who live in heaven, (1 Tim. v. 21, compare Jude 6.) who are sent forth to minister to those who shall be heirs of salvation, (Heb. i. 13, 14; Dan. ix. 21.) and whose only dignity and pleasure it is to do the will of God. Various ways were employed by them in making known the Divine will,—by dreams, visions, assuming a human appearance. In a dream. This was a common way of revealing the will of God to his ancient prophets and people, Gen. xx. 3; xxx. 1, 11, 24; xxxvii. 5; xli. 1; 1 Kin. iii. 5; Dan. vii. 1; Job iv. 13, 15. By what means it was ascertained that these dreams were from God, cannot now be told. It is sufficient for us to know that in this way many of the prophecies were communicated, and to remark that now there is no evidence that we are to put reliance on our dreams. Dreams are wild, irregular movements of the mind when it is unshackled by reason, and it is mere superstition to suppose that God ever makes known his will in this way. 23. His name, Emmanuel—God with us. Though the mere use of such a name would not prove that Jesus had a Divine nature, yet, as Matthew uses it, and meant evidently to apply it, it does prove that Jesus was more than a man; that he was God as well as man. And it is this which gives glory to the plan of redemption, which causes the angels to wonder, and makes it so vast, so grand, so full of instruction and comfort to Christians: see Phil. ii. 6–8. It is this which sheds such peace and joy into the sinner's heart; which gives him such security of salvation, and renders the condescension of God in redemption so great, and his character so lovely.

CHAP. II.—1. In Bethlehem of Judæa, in the days of Herod the king. Bethlehem, the birthplace of Christ, was a small town about six miles south of Jerusalem. The word Bethlehem denotes, "house of bread." It was also called Ephrata, a word supposed to signify fertility, Gen. xxxv. 19; Ru. iv. 2; Ps. cxxxii. 6. It was called the city of David, (Lu. ii. 4.) because it was the city of his nativity, 1 Sam. xvi. 1, 18. The soil of Bethlehem was noted for its fertility. Ancient travellers frequently speak of its productions; and the fig trees, olives, and pomegranates, and the barley fields which cover the north side, shew that it is still capable of being made what its name signifies, the house of bread.—Bonar & M'Cheyne's Narrative. The town is situated on an eminence in the midst of hills and vales. At present it contains about two hundred houses, inhabited chiefly by Christians and Mohammedans. About two hundred paces east of Bethlehem there is a church and convent, and beneath the church a subterranean chapel, lighted by thirty-two lamps, which is said to have been the stable where Jesus was born; but no reliance is to be placed on this tradition. Judæa was a province of the Roman empire. It was taken about sixty-three years before Christ's birth by Pompey, and placed under tribute. Herod received his appointment from the Romans; and though permitted to be called king, he was in all respects dependent on the Roman emperor. At the time of the birth of Christ, he had reigned thirty-four years. Jerusalem was the capital

it is considered that the word 'Amen' simply means 'so be it!' we may at once perceive that it could not be added by our Lord; for our Lord could not pray that his own will might be done, or his own promise fulfilled. The word is, therefore, utterly impertinent as a part of the sacred text, and could neither have been added by our Lord nor by the evangelist. The Amens at the end of the sacred books have no other authority than what they derive from the transcribers of copies, and at best are only to be considered as the pious wish of the writer, or of the Church, that the promises contained in the sacred volume may be accomplished." The same writer calls attention to the so-called subscriptions or epigraphs which appear in sundry copies and versions. He gives, for example, the following from the Arabic, as found in some copies:—"The end of the copy of the Gospel of Matthew the Apostle. He wrote it in the land of Palestine, by inspiration of the Holy Spirit, in the Hebrew tongue, eight years after the bodily ascension of Jesus, the of the kingdom of Judah, and was built on the line dividing this tribe from the tribe of Benjamin. It was once called Salem, (Gen. xiv. 18; Ps. lxxvi. 2), and, in the days of Abraham, was the abode of Melchizedek. When the Israelites took possession of the promised land, they found this stronghold in the possession of the Sevites, by whom it was called Jebus, or Jebust, Jos. xvii. 28. The name, Jerusalem, was compounded probably of the two, by changing a single letter, and calling it, for the sake of the sound, Jerusalem, instead of Jebusalem. It was built upon, and is encompassed by hills, was anciently inclosed with walls, (a portion of which still stand,) and was watered by the fountain of Siloam on the east, and by the fountain of Gihon on the west of the city, and in the time of Solomon by an aqueduct, part of which remains to this day, by which water was brought from the vicinity of Bethlehem. Jerusalem had perhaps its highest splendour in the days of Solomon. About four hundred years after, it was wholly destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar. It lay utterly desolate during the seventy years of the Jewish captivity. Then it was rebuilt, and restored to some degree of its former magnificence, and remained about six hundred years, when it was utterly destroyed by Titus, A.D. 70. (See Notes on Fall of Jerusalem in the Gospel of Luke, ch. xxi.) After various changes it was, in 1217, taken possession of by the Turks, who have ever since continued in possession of it. At present it contains a population of about twenty thousand, comprising Jews, Turks, Arabs, Armenians, Greeks, and Papists.

The Jews have a number of synagogues, the Romanists have one convent, the Greeks twelve, the Armenians four, three on mount Zion, one in the city; the Copts, Syrians, and Abyssinians, have each one convent; the Turks have a splendid mosque, the mosque of Omar, on the site of the temple. The streets are narrow, and the houses are of stone; most of them low and irregular, with flat roofs or terraces, and with small windows only towards the street, usually protected by iron gratings. 2. Worship him. This does not mean religious worship, for these men did not suppose he could be Divine, but only a prince, the king of the Jews, in which capacity they came to honour him, and pay him homage, according to the custom in the East. 12. In a dream. See note on ch. i. 20. 13. The angel. See ch. i. 20. Flee into Egypt. Egypt is situated to the south-west of Judaea, and is distant from Bethlehem about sixty miles. It was at this time a Roman province; the Greek language was spoken, and many Jews lived there, who had a temple and synagogue, so that Joseph would be among his own countrymen, and yet beyond the reach of Herod, whose jurisdiction extended only to the river Sihor, or river of Egypt.

16. Slew all the children. Though Josephus does not record the destruction of the children, he gives such a character of Herod, as an odious and bloody tyrant, as to show that he was abundantly capable of this wickedness. He tells us that Herod murdered his wife's brother—her grandfather—that his wife herself had a public execution, and that his two sons were strangled in prison by his orders. Also, that a little before he died, he commanded the presence of all the chief men of Judaea at Jericho, and when they were come together he had them all shut up in the circus, and calling for his sister Salome and her husband Alexis, he told them, "My life is now short. I know the Jewish people, and nothing will please them better than my death. You have them now in your custody. As soon as the breath is out of my body, and before my death can be known, do you let in the soldiers upon them, and kill them. All Judaea then, and every family, will, though unwillingly, mourn at my death." Nay, Josephus says, that with tears in his eyes, he conjured them, by their love to him and their fidelity to God, not to fail of doing him this honour. Three reasons may be given for the destruction of the children not being mentioned by Josephus: 1. A Jew would not be likely to record whatever would confirm the truth of Christianity. 2. Bethlehem was a small and obscure village, and the other crimes of Herod were so great and public, that it is not to be wondered at that the Jewish historians should pass over this. 3. The order was probably given in secret, and might not be known to Josephus. Besides, no argument can be drawn from the silence of the Jewish historian. No reason can be given why Matthew should not be as fully entitled to credit as Josephus; especially as, after the horrid crimes narrated above, on Josephus' own authority, there is no improbability in the account given by him. 18. Rama, where Samuel was born and died, was once strongly fortified; but a half-ruined Mohammedan mosque, originally a Christian church, and a few miserable dwellings, are all that remain of this once celebrated spot. It is situated on an eminence about six miles from Jerusalem. 19. Herod was dead. He left three sons, among whom his kingdom was thus divided: To Archelaus was given Judaea, Idumaea, and Samaria; to Philip, Batanea and Trachonitis; and to Antipas, Galilee and Perea. Each of these was also called Herod, and they are the individuals so frequently referred to in other parts of the New Testament.

22. The parts of Galilee. The country of Galilee. At this time the land of Palestine was divided into three parts—Galilee, on the north; Samaria, in the middle; and Judaea, on the south. 23. Nazareth. This was a small town situated in Galilee. It was built partly on a valley, and partly on the declivity of a hill, Lu. iv. 29. A hill is yet pointed out to the south of Nazareth as the one from which the people attempted to precipitate the Saviour. It was a place at that time proverbial for wickedness, Jno. i. 46. It is now a large village, with a convent and two churches. The population is estimated to be from three thousand to five thousand.

CHAP. III.—12. Whose fan. The fan is a well-known agricultural instrument which was used by the Jews, as it is at the present day, to separate grain from the chaff. His floor. The threshing-floor was an open space, thirty or forty paces in diameter, and on elevated ground for the purpose of keeping it dry, and for the convenience of winnowing the grain by the wind. The grain was usually trodden out by oxen. After being threshed it was winnowed. It was then separated from the dirt and coarse chaff by a sieve, and then still farther cleansed by a fan, an instrument to produce an artificial wind. This method is still practised in the East.

CHAP. IV.—1. The devil. This word literally means an adversary or an accuser; thence any one opposed; thence an enemy of any kind. It is given in Scripture by way of eminence to the leader of evil angels; a being characterised as full of subtlety, envy, art, and hatred to mankind. He is known also by the name of Satan, Job i. 6—12; Mat. xii. 26; Beelzebub, Mat. xii. 24; the old serpent, Rev. xii. 9; and the prince of the power of the air, Eph. ii. 2. The attentive reader of Scripture will not fail to remark that the statement of the existence, the moral propensities and the agency of Satan, is extended nearly through the whole of the sacred volume from Genesis to the Revelations; that its writers in their portraiture of our great adversary, employ the same images, and adhere to the same appellatives throughout: that a complete identity of character is exhibited, marked with the same features of force, cruelty, malignity, and fraud. He is everywhere depicted as alike the enemy of God and man; who having appeared as a serpent, in the history of the Fall, is recognised by St. Paul under the same character in express allusion to that event, and afterwards by St. John in the Apocalypse, as "that old serpent, the Devil and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world."—Robert Hall's Works, vol. v. p. 70. 13. Capernaum a city on the north-west corner of the sea of Tiberias, once a city of renown and the metropolis of all Galilee, but the site of which is now uncertain, see Note on Mat. xi. 20—26. 18. Sea of Galilee, also called the sea of Tiberias, and the lake of Gennesareth, and the sea of Chinnereth, Nam. xxxiv. 11; Deu. iii. 17; Jos. xii. 3. It is about fifteen miles in length, and from six to nine in width. Many populous cities once stood on its shores, such as Tiberias, Bethsaida, Capernaum, Chorazin, Hippos, &c. There is no part of Palestine which can be compared in beauty with the environs of this lake, through which the river Jordan flows directly, it is said, without mingling with its waters, so that the course of the Jordan can be distinctly seen. 23. Synagogues, or places where the people assembled together to worship God. Though the sacrifices of the Jews were appointed to be held in one place, at Jerusalem, there was nothing to forbid the other services of religion to be performed in any place. When synagogues were commenced is uncertain; they are mentioned by Josephus a considerable period before the coming of Christ; and in his time they were multiplied not only in Judaea, but wherever there were ten men willing to associate for the purpose. There were no less than four hundred and eighty in Jerusalem alone, before it was taken by the Romans. The Saviour and the apostles were in the habit of attending at those places, and of speaking to the people, Lu. iv. 15—22; Acts xiii. 14, 15. 24. Those possessed with devils, meaning that the persons so possessed were under the influence of evil spirits, who had complete possession of the faculties, and who produced many symptoms of disease not unlike melancholy, and madness, and epilepsy. That there was actual possession will appear from considering, 1. That Christ and the apostles spoke to them, and of them, as if they were so possessed. 2. They spake, conversed, expressed their knowledge and their fear of Christ—things that certainly could not be said of diseases, as some pretend, Mat. viii. 28; Lu. viii. 27. 3. They are represented as going out of the persons possessed and entering the bodies of others, Mat. viii. 32. 4. Jesus spake to them and called their names, and they answered him. He threatened them, commanded them to be silent, to depart, and not to return. Mark i. 25; v. 8; ix. 25. 5. If it may be denied that Christ believed in such possessions, it does not appear why any other clear sentiment of his may not in the same way be disputed. For there is perhaps no subject on which he expressed himself more clearly, or acted more uniformly, or which he left more deeply impressed on the minds of his disciples. Nor is there any absurdity in the opinion that those persons were really under the influence of devils. For, 1st. It is no more absurd to suppose that an angel or many angels, should have fallen or become wicked, than that so many men should. 2nd. It is no more singular that Satan should have possession of the human faculties, or inflict diseases, than that men should do it—a thing which is done every day. What more frequent than for a wicked man to corrupt the principles and morals of others, to induce them to become unbelieving, impenitent, intemperate, and so to produce a state of body and mind quite as bad as to be possessed with the devil? 3rd. We still see a multitude of cases, that no man can prove not to be produced by the presence of an evil spirit. "Insanity seems to me to be unquestionably Satanic influence," said Sir William Knighton, (Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 312.) and who would attempt to say that some evil being may not have much to do in the case of madmen? 4th. It afforded an opportunity for Christ to shew his power over the minds of devils and of men, and thus to evince himself qualified to meet every enemy of the race, and triumphantly to redeem his people. He came to destroy the power of Satan. Acts xvi. 18; Rom. xvi. 20, 21. Conceiving Satan, agreeable to the intimations of the Word of God, to be the chief or head of a spiritual dominion, we easily account for the extent of the agency he is affirmed to exert in tempting and seducing the human race; not by supposing him to be personally present wherever such an operation is carrying on, but by referring it to his auspices, and considering it as belonging to the history of his empire. As innumerable angels of light fight under the banners of the Redeemer, so there is reason to conclude, the devil also is assisted by an equally numerous host of his angels, composing those principalities and powers, over which Jesus Christ triumphed in the making a show of them openly. On this principle, the objection we are considering (that omnipresence is attributed to the apostate spirit) falls entirely to the ground, and no more ubiquity or omnipresence is attributed to Satan by our system, than to Alexander, Cæsar, or Tamerlane, whose power was felt and their authority acknowledged, far beyond the limits of their personal presence.—Robert Hall.

CHAP. V.—5-9. The following translation of these verses is from Wickliffe's Bible, about the year 1380. "And Jhesus seyng the people, went up to an hill: and whance he was sett, his discipulis camen to him. And he openyde his mouth and taught them, and seide, Blessid be yore men in spirit: for the kyngdom of hevenes is hereyn. Blessid ben mylde men; for thei schulen be comfortid. Blessid be thei that hungren and thirsten rigtwisnesse, for thei schal be fulfilled. Blessid ben merciful men; for thei schal get mercy. Blessid be thei that ben of cleane herte: for thei schulen se god. Blessid ben pesible men: for thei schulen be clepid goddis children." Baber's Edition. 22. Raca, means vain fellow, a word of contempt. Fool, means wretch or miscreant, a term of the greatest abhorrence; these imply greater anger than the first expression, "without a cause," or rashly. Hence three degrees of punishment are set forth by the three modes of punishment amongst the Jews: by the judgment, the lowest court; the council, or sanhedrim, who punished more severely; and the Gehenna, or valley of Hinnom, (where children were formerly sacrificed to Moloch, by the idolatrous Israelites, 2 Kin. xvi. 3; 2 Chr. xxviii. 3), used as a place of public execution, and here as elsewhere employed as a term to the future punishment of the wicked.) The amount, then, of this difficult and important verse is this: The Jews considered but one crime a violation of the sixth commandment, viz. actual murder. But Jesus says it is much broader. It relates not only to the external act, but to the feelings and words. He specifies three forms of such violation as above, and as among the Jews there were three degrees of punishment, so, he says, there shall be grades of condemnation for the different ways of violating the sixth commandment. Not only murder shall be punished by God, but anger and contempt shall be regarded by him as a violation of the law, and visited according to the offence. And all these expressions relate to degrees of punishment proportioned to the crime in the future world—the world of justice and of woe.

CHAP. VI.—2. Take no thought. The word thought, when the Bible was translated, meant anxiety, and is so used frequently in old English authors. The word anxiety would now exactly express the sense, and is exactly the thing against which the Saviour would guard us; see Lu. viii. 14; xxi. 34; Phil. iv. 6.

CHAP. VII.—21. Not every one that saith, &c. Many may be found, in the day of judgment, who may have been endowed with powers of prophecy, or miracle, as Balaam, or the magicians of Egypt, in the same way as many men of distinguished talents may be found, yet destitute of piety, and shut out of his kingdom.—See Mark ix. 38; Lu. ix. 19; 1 Cor. xiii. 1, 3. In this last place, Paul says, that though he spoke with the tongue of angels, and had the gift of pro-

Messiah, into heaven, in the first year of the reign of Claudius Cæsar, king of Rome." The Syriac copies generally have, "End of the holy Gospel of the preaching of Matthew, which he preached in Hebrew in the land of Palestine." A Greek copy, as quoted by Dr. Tischendorf, has this: "The Gospel according to Matthew; it was given by him in Jerusalem eight years after the ascension of Christ." Some copies add that it was delivered in the Hebrew tongue; that it was interpreted by John, or by James, the Lord's brother; that it was afterwards interpreted in the Greek tongue by the illustrious Apostle Bartholomew, though some say by John the Divine, &c. All these merely represent traditions of more or less antiquity. The Vatican copy only has the words, "According to Matthew," and the Sinaitic has no subscription whatever. The Alexandrian reads, "Gospel according to Matthew;" and the Cambridge MS. has, "The Gospel according to Matthew is ended." From these examples it will be gathered that these subscriptions form no part of the original.

phesy, and could remove mountains, and had not charity, or love, all would be of no avail. 22. In that day. That is, in the last day, the day of judgment; the time when the principles of all pretenders to prophecy and piety shall be tried. 23. Profess unto them, say unto them, plainly declare. I never knew you. That is, I never approved, loved, or regarded you as my friends.—See Ps. i. 6—11; 1 Tim. vi. 9; 1 Cor. viii. 3. This proves that, with all their pretensions, they had never been true followers of Christ. Jesus will not then say to false prophets, and false professors of religion, that he had once known them, and then rejected them; that they had been once Christians, and then had fallen away; that they had been pardoned, and then had apostatized; but that he had never known them, they had never been true Christians; whatever may have been their pretended joys, their raptures, their hopes, their self-confidence, their visions, their zeal, they had never been regarded by the Saviour as his true friends. There is not a more decided proof that Christians do not fall away from grace than this text. It settles the question, and proves that whatever else such men had, they never had any true religion.—See 1 Jno. ii. 19.

CHAP. VIII.—29. Why are ye so fearful? You should have remembered the Son of God, the Messiah, was on board. You should not have forgotten that he had power to save, and that with him you are safe. So Christians should never fear danger, disease, or death: with Jesus they are safe. No enemy can reach him; and is He safe, so they shall be also, Jno. xiv. 9. Rebuked the winds. Reproved them, or commanded them to be still. What a power was this! What irresistible proof that he was divine! His word awed the tempest and allayed the storm! There is not anywhere a sublimer description of a display of power; nor could there be a sublimer proof that he was truly the Son of God. Great calm. The winds were still, and the sea ceased to dash against the vessel and to endanger their lives. 32. Went into the herd of swine. Why is it any more absurd to suffer a wicked spirit to do injury than a wicked man; or to suffer a legion of devils to destroy a herd of swine, than for legions of men to desolate nations, and cover fields and towns with ruin and slaughter? 34. Besought him that he would depart. The most grovelling employment, the most abandoned sins, the most loathsome vices, are often loved more than the presence of Jesus, and more than all the blessings of his salvation.

CHAP. IX.—16. No man putteth a piece of new cloth, &c. The word here translated new, in the original signifies rude, undressed, or not fulled or cleaned by the cloth dresser. In this state, if applied to an old garment, and if wet, it would contract and draw off a part of the garment to which it was attached, and thus make the rent worse than it was. 17. Neither do men put new wine, &c. Bottles in Eastern nations were, and are still, made of skins of beasts, generally taken entire from a sheep or goat, and, when properly prepared, filled with wine or water. New skins or bottles would yield to the fermenting wine, and be strong enough to prevent them from bursting. By long usage, however, they of course became tender, and would be easily ruptured; new wine put into them would ferment and swell, and burst them open. By both these illustrations Christ intimates that there is a fitness or propriety of things. It is not fit that my doctrine should be attached to, or connected with, the old and corrupt doctrines of the Pharisees. New things should be put together and made to match.

CHAP. X.—4. Judas Iscariot. It is probable this name was given him from his native place. Carioth was a small town in the tribe of Judah. 5. Into the way of the Gentiles. That is, among the Gentiles, or nowhere but among the Jews. And into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not. Samaria was situated between Jerusalem and Galilee, so that in passing from the one to the other, it was a direct course to pass through Samaria. The people who inhabited Samaria were composed of a few of the ten tribes and a mixture of foreigners, and embraced a religion made up of Judaism and idolatry, 2 Kin. xvii. 26—28. The Lord, though here forbidding his apostles to go into any city of the Samaritans, preached the Gospel to them afterwards; (Jno. iv. 6—26;) and the apostles imitated his example, Acts viii. 25. The Gospel was, however, first preached to the Jews. 18. And ye shall be brought, &c. The prediction was completely and abundantly fulfilled, Acts v. 26; xii. 1—4; xxiii. 33; xxvi. 1—30. Peter is said to have been brought before Nero, John before Domitian, Roman emperors, and others before Parthian, Scythian, and Indian kings. The fulfilment of the prophecy is a signal evidence that Christ possessed a knowledge of the future. Few things were more improbable when this was uttered, than that the fishermen of Galilee would stand before the illustrious and mighty monarchs of the East and the West.

CHAP. XI.—21. Woe unto thee, Chorazin—Bethsaida. The precise situation of these towns is unknown. Tyre and Sidon. These were two cities on the shores of the Mediterranean sea, and on the western part of Judaea, therefore well known to the Jews. There is great uncertainty as to the site of ancient Tyre:—"Though thou be sought for, yet shalt thou never be found again," Eze. xxvi. 21. Sidon also has been brought low, Eze. xxviii. 22. Two places called by the name of Tyre and Sidon, however, yet remain. Capernaum. We did not search out the ruins of the city, but there were pointed out to us heaps among the luxuriant timber of the plain, which some have thought to be the remains of Capernaum. There seems every probability that Chorazin, Bethsaida, and Capernaum, were within the limits of the little plain of Gennesareth, but where no one can tell. The solemn woe pronounced by the Lord Jesus on these three cities, in whose streets he so often spoke the words of eternal life, has fallen with silent but exterminating power. It is more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon than for them. "And thou, Capernaum, which wast exalted to heaven, art brought down to hell." He took out his believing remnant from the midst of them, as he took Lot out of Sodom: Peter, Andrew, and Philip, three worthies from Bethsaida, (Jno. i. 44), and then he swept the unbelieving cities away with the besom of destruction. The awful voice rises from these ruined heaps of Gennesareth, warning the cities of our favoured land that a despised Gospel will bring them as low as Capernaum; "he that believeth not shall be damned."—Bonar & M'Cheyne's Narrative.

CHAP. XII.—1-13. The two cases related in this passage, determine what may be done on the sabbath. The one was a case of necessity, the other of mercy. The example of the Saviour, and his explanations, show that these are a part of the proper duties of that holy day. Beyond an honest and conscientious discharge of these two duties, men may not devote the sabbath to any secular purpose. If they do, they do it at their peril; they go beyond what he authorises; they do what he claimed the special right of doing, as being Lord of the sabbath; they usurp his place, and act and legislate in opposition to his authority and laws. Men may as well trample down any other law of the Bible, as that respecting the sabbath. 31. Blasphemy against the Holy Ghost shall not be forgiven unto men. The sin against the Holy Ghost, so far from conferring any rare distinction of wickedness on him who is guilty of it, is, in fact, the sin of all who, living under the dispensation of the Gospel, have, by their rejection of it, made it the "savour of death unto death." It is a sin which can be charged upon every man who has put the overtures of forgiveness away from him. It is a sin which if, in the great day of examination, you are found to be free from, will argue your acceptance of the Gospel, in virtue of which its forgiveness is made sure to you. And it is a sin which, if found on that day to adhere to you, will argue your final refusal of this same Gospel, in virtue of which your forgiveness is impossible, because you are out of the only way given under heaven whereby man can be saved.—Dr. Chalmers, sermon on this text.

CHAP. XIII.—22. The thorns. These represent cares, anxieties, and the deceitful love of riches, or the way in which a desire to be rich deceives us. They take the time and attention; they leave not opportunity to think and examine the state of the soul. Besides, riches allure and promise what they do not yield; they promise to make us happy, but when gained, do it not—the soul is not satisfied; there is the same desire to possess more wealth, and to this there is no end—but death, 1 Tim. vi. 7—11. How many, O how many, thus foolishly drown themselves in destruction and perdition! How many more might reach heaven, if it were not for this deep-rooted love of that which fills with care, deceives the soul, and finally leaves it naked, guilty, and lost.

CHAP. XIV.—25. Fourth watch of the night. In the time of the Saviour the Jews divided the night into four watches, the fourth having been introduced by the Romans. These watches consisted of three hours each. The first, (evening,) commenced at six, and continued till nine; the second, (midnight,) from nine to twelve; the third, (cock-crowing,) from twelve to three; and the fourth, (morning,) from three to six, Mark xiii. 35. It was in the last of these watches, or between three and six in the morning, that Jesus appeared to the disciples; so that he had spent most of the night alone in the mountain in prayer. Walking on the sea. A manifest and wonderful miracle. It was a boisterous sea; it was in a dark night; the little boat was four or five miles from the shore, tossed by the billows.

CHAP. XV.—7. Ye hypocrites. Hypocrisy is the concealment of some base principle under the pretence of religion. Never was there a clearer instance of it than this—an attempt to get rid of the duty of providing for needy parents, under an appearance of piety towards God.

CHAP. XVI.—18. Whichever of the views of this text mentioned in the Commentary be taken, nothing is more plain than that Christ did not mean, as the Roman Catholics say he did, to exalt Peter to supreme authority above all the other apostles, or to say that he was the only one on whom he would rear his church: see Acts xv., where the advice of James, and not of Peter, is followed; see also Gal. ii. 11, where Paul withstood Peter to his face, because he was to be blamed; a thing which could not have happened, if Christ, as the Papists allege, meant that Peter should be absolute and infallible. More than all, it is not said here, or anywhere else in the Bible, that Peter should have infallible successors, who should be the viceregents of Christ, and the head of the church. Luther, alluding to this utter want of Scriptural evidence for such a monstrous doctrine, jestingly asked, "Where is it written, except perhaps at Rome, in St. Peter's, upon the chimney, with a coal?" But the simplest method of dealing with this idea is pointed out by the words in the 23rd verse, where our Lord says to Peter, GET THEE BEHIND ME, SATAN. Allowing that this term is not applied to Peter personally, it yet shews that his reproach of Christ was Satanic, or the suggestion of the great spiritual adversary, and that it could not be Peter, but Peter's profession of the true faith, which was the rock on which the church was to be built. As to Peter's infallible successors—the popes—it can be proved that many popes have contradicted each other in matters of faith,—that for long periods there have been two or even three pretenders to the popedom,—that not a few of the popes have been monsters of iniquity, and that many secured their election to the papal chair by the most atrocious means—by force and fraud—by murder and bribery, and the assistance of prostitutes; and yet all these must be acknowledged as the vicars of Christ, entitled to exercise dominion over the consciences and the conduct of all his followers!—See Dr. Cunningham's edition of Stillingfleet on the Doctrines, &c., of the Church of Rome. Church. The word church means literally those called out from the world, and often means an assembly or congregation; see Acts xix. 32, Gr.; Acts vii. 38. It is applied to Christians, as being called out from the world. It means sometimes the whole body of believers worshipping in one place, Acts viii. 1; ix. 31; 1 Cor. i. 2, &c.; sometimes also a society in a single house, as Rom. xvi. 5. In common language, it means the church visible, that is, all who profess religion; or invisible, that is, all who are real Christians, professors or not. And the gates of hell, &c. Ancient cities were surrounded by walls. In the gates by which they were entered, were the principal places for holding courts, transacting business, and deliberating on public affairs. The word gates, therefore, is used for counsels, designs, machinations, evil purposes. Hell means here the place of departed spirits, particularly evil spirits. And the meaning of the passage is, that all the plots, stratagems, and machinations, of the enemies of the church should not be able to overcome it,—a prophecy that has been remarkably fulfilled.

CHAP. XVII.—1. A high mountain apart. It was commonly supposed that this was Tabor, a high mountain in Galilee, about a thousand feet above the plain. Its level top, about a mile in circumference, covered with groups of fine trees and brushwood, affords a spot of complete retirement in the very midst of the land. From the west it is like a truncated cone, appearing much steeper and higher, with the southern side almost destitute of trees. On all sides it is a marked and prominent object, as the prophet intimates when he says, "As Tabor is among the mountains," Jer. xlii. 18. If this was really the scene of the Transfiguration, there is a difficulty arising from the fact that both a fortress and a village once stood on its top, though otherwise it would not be easy to find a spot in this world more suitable for that heavenly transaction.—Bonar and M'Cheyne's Narrative. This fortified town existed for at least two hundred and twenty years before, and sixty years after, the birth of Christ, for which reason it is now generally thought that Tabor was not the site of the Transfiguration. This part of Galilee, however, abounds with "high mountains apart," and the above drawing of mount Tabor is given as an illustration of them all. 2. Thou shalt find a piece of money. In whatever way this is regarded, it is a proof that Jesus was possessed of Divine attributes. If he knew that the first fish that came up would have such a coin in its mouth, it was proof of omniscience. If he created the coin for the occasion, and placed it there, then it was proof of Divine power. The former is the more probable supposition. It is by no means absurd that a fish should have swallowed a silver coin, many of them bite eagerly at any thing bright, and would not hesitate therefore at swallowing a piece of money.—This miracle being wrought in support of religious institutions, teaches us of how much value Jesus considered them to the welfare of man. Religion promotes the purity, peace, intelligence

In concluding this note, mention may be made of an apocryphal Gospel ascribed to Matthew, and containing fictitious accounts of the birth of Mary and the infancy of our Saviour. A spurious inscription declares it to have been written in Hebrew by Matthew, and translated into Latin by Jerome. Bishop Ellicott calls it "an agglomeration of folly and fraud." It is made up from various sources, and is now only to be met with in Latin, or modern versions thereof. It was probably not written earlier than the fifth century, and is in some copies ascribed to "James, the son of Joseph." The document was partly published by Thilo in 1832, and completely by Dr. Tischendorf in 1853. The name of Matthew is also associated with other documents, the most curious of which is in Greek, and professes to be an account of his deeds and martyrdom.

Additional Notes.—Chap. iv. 11. The precise intention of the word "ministered" here is not apparent. The word is one which commonly signifies to wait or attend upon. The verb often occurs, and order of the community, and every man is therefore under the obligation to do his part towards its support. If any man doubts this, he has only to go to the place where there is no religion,—among scoffers, and thieves, and adulterers, and prostitutes, and pickpockets, and drunkards. No money is lost that goes in any way to suppress these vices.

CHAP. XVIII.—9. Hell fire. See Notes on Mark ix. 44, 46, 48. 20. For when two or three, &c. This is a general assertion, made to support the particular promise (ver. 19) to his apostles. He affirms that, wherever two or three are gathered together in his name, he is in the midst of them. In my name: That is, 1st. By my authority, acting for me in my church. See Jno. x. 25; xvi. 21. 2nd. It may mean, For my service, in the place of prayer and praise,—assembled in obedience to my command, and with a desire to promote my glory. There am I in the midst of them. Nothing could more clearly prove that Jesus must be everywhere present, and of course be God. Every day, perhaps every hour, two or three, or many more, may be assembled in every city or village in England, in the United States, Greenland, Africa; in Ceylon; in the Sandwich Islands; in Russia, and in Judæa—in almost every part of the world,—and in the midst of them all is Jesus the Saviour. Millions thus, at the same time, in every quarter of the globe, worship in his name, and experience the truth of the promise that he is present with them. It is impossible that he should be in all these places and not be God.

CHAP. XIX.—8. He saith unto them, &c. Jesus admits that divorce had been allowed, but declares that this was not the original design of marriage. Moses found the custom in use. He found a hardhearted and rebellious people. In these circumstances he did not deem it prudent to forbid a practice so universal; but that it might be regulated, and instead of suffering the husband to divorce his wife in a passion, he required him to give her a writing, to sit down deliberately and look at the matter; and, probably, also to bring the case before some scribe, or learned man, to write a divorce in a legal form. Here would then be an opportunity for reconciliation; and the man might, after all, be persuaded not to divorce his wife. This, says the Saviour, was a permission growing out of a particular state of things, and designed to remedy a prevailing evil. But at first it was not so. God intended that marriage should be between one man and one woman; and that they were only to be separated by the appointment of him who had formed the union.

CHAP. XX.—23. Is not mine to give, &c. The correct translation of this passage would be, "To sit on my right hand and on my left is not mine to give, except to those for whom it is prepared of my Father." This, the correct, sense is seen by leaving out that part of the verse in italics; and the present is one of the places in the Bible where the sense has been obscured or perverted by the introduction of words which have nothing to correspond with them in the original. See a similar instance in 1 Jno. ii. 23.

CHAP. XXI.—1. Mount of Olives, or Olivet, is on the east of Jerusalem. Between this and Jerusalem there runs a small stream, called the brook Cedron, or Cedron, which is dry in the hot season, but swells to a considerable size in the time of heavy rains. See Jno. xviii. 1. The Mount of Olives was so called from its producing in abundance the olive. It is about a mile in length, and about seven hundred feet in height, and overlooks Jerusalem, so that from its summit almost every part of the city can be seen. 12. Temple of God. The temple of God, or the temple dedicated and devoted to the service of God, was first built by Solomon on Moriah, about one thousand and five years before Christ: 1 Kin. iv. It remained till destroyed by the Chaldeans under Nebuchadnezzar, five hundred and eighty-four years before Christ, 2 Chr. xxxvi. 6, 19. After the Babylonish captivity the temple was rebuilt by Zerubbabel, but with vastly inferior beauty, Ezra iii. 8, 12. This was called the second temple. It was wholly razed to the ground by the Romans under Titus and Vespasian, according to the prediction of the Saviour. See Notes on Fall of Jerusalem, on ch. xxi. of Luke's Gospel. 21. Render therefore to Cæsar. It is right to obey the law of the land. Conscientious Christians make the best citizens. Yet we are to obey civil rulers no farther than their commands are consistent with the law of God. God is to be obeyed rather than man. And when a civil ruler commands a thing contrary to the law of the Bible and the dictates of our consciences, we may, we must resist it.

CHAP. XXII.—45. If David, &c. If he was then David's lord,—if he was his superior,—if he had an existence at that time, how could he be descended from him? They could not answer him. Nor is there any way of answering the question but by the admission that the Messiah was Divine as well as human; that he had an existence at the time of David, and was his lord and master, as God and king; and that as man he was descended from him.

CHAP. XXIII.—5. Phylacteries—were small slips of parchment, on which were written certain portions of the Old Testament, founded on a merely literal interpretation of Ex. xiii. 16. (Compare Pr. iii. 1—3; vi. 21.) See engraving of Pharisees with phylacteries, ch. xii. 14. 6. Rooms, more correctly rendered places or couches at feasts; for it was the custom among the Jews not to eat sitting, as we do, but reclining on couches. 24. Which strain at a gnat. A proverb. It should have been "to strain out a gnat;" and so it was, undoubtedly, rendered by the translators. The common reading is a misprint, and should be corrected. The Greek means, to strain out by a cloth or sieve.

CHAP. XXIV.—2. There shall not be left one stone, &c. See for fulfilment of this, and following predictions, the notes referred to on Luke's Gospel. 15. The abomination of desolation. This is a Hebrew expression, meaning an abominable or hateful destroyer. The Gentiles were all held in abomination by the Jews, Acts x. 28. The abomination of desolation means the Roman army, and is so explained by Lu. xxi. 20.

CHAP. XXV.—1. Which took their lamps. 'We wished to see the parable of the ten virgins illustrated, and our wish was gratified. The bridegroom was on his way to the house of the bride.' (Below he is figured as conducting her to his own, from her father's house.) 'According to custom, he walked in procession through several streets of the town, attended by a numerous body of friends, all in their showy Eastern garb. Persons bearing torches went first—an instrument, not unlike the bagpipe, was playing—two of the torch-bearers stood close to the bridegroom—and there was much mirth expressed by the crowd, especially when the procession stood still, which it did every few paces. We thought of the words of John, (Jno. iii. 29,) "The friend of the bridegroom, which standeth and heareth him, rejoiceth greatly because of the bridegroom's voice."—Bonar & M Cheyne's Narrative.

CHAP. XXVI.—2. Passover. See Comment and Notes on Ex. xii. 3. High Priest. Holding the office that was first conferred on Aaron, Ex. xxviii. Herod and the Romans changed the incumbents of the office at pleasure. Hence it is said, that Caiaphas was high priest for that year, Jno. xi. 51. Persons who had been high priest still retained the name; and hence more than one high priest is sometimes mentioned, though strictly there was but one who held the office. 20. He sat down. At first the supper was eaten standing, with their loins girded, and their staff in their hand, denoting the haste with which they were about to flee from Egypt. Afterwards, however, they introduced the practice it seems of partaking of this as they did of their ordinary meals. The original word is, "he reclined," that is, he placed himself on the couch in a reclining posture, in the usual manner in which they partook of their meals. It is the more important to notice this, as the Comment on the verse speaks of his sitting upright. 36. Then cometh, &c. After the institution of the supper, in the early part of the night, he went out to the Mount of Olives. On his journey he passed over the brook Cedron (Jno. xviii. 1), which bounded Jerusalem on the east. To a place. This place was evidently on the western side of the Mount of Olives, a short distance from Jerusalem, and commanding a full view of the city. John calls it a garden, a place planted with the olive and other trees; perhaps with a fountain of water, and with walks and groves. Messrs. Fisk and King, American missionaries, were there in 1823. They tell us that the garden is about a stone's cast from the brook of Cedron, that it now contains eight large and venerable looking olives. The spot is sandy and barren, and appears like a forsaken place. A low rotten wall surrounds it. Luke says, Jesus went as he was wont, that is, accustomed, to the Mount of Olives. John, in reference to the garden, records that he oftentimes rested thither with his disciples.

CHAP. XXVII.—25. His blood be on us, and on our children. The Jews had no right to call down this vengeance on their children; but in the righteous judgment of God it has come upon them. In less than forty years their city and temple were overthrown and destroyed. More than a million of people perished in the siege; thousands died by famine; thousands by disease; thousands by the sword; and their blood ran down the streets like water, so that Josephus says, it extinguished things that were burning in the city. To this day, also, the curse has remained. 31, 33. Led him away—unto a place called Golgotha. This is the place which in Luke is called Calvary. It was probably called the place of skulls, from being a place of execution. Mount Calvary was a small eminence, usually supposed to have been on the north-west of Jerusalem, without the walls of the city, but at a short distance. Jesus was put to death out of the city, because capital punishments were not allowed within the walls. See Num. xv. 35; 1 Kin. xxi. 13. This was a law among the Romans as well as the Jews. He also died there, because the bodies of the animals slain in sacrifice, as typical of him, were burned without the camp. He also, as the antitype, suffered without the gate, Heb. xiii. 11, 12.

CHAP. XXVIII.—13. All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. The Son of God, as Creator, had an original right to all things, to control them and to dispose of them. See Jno. i. 3; Col. i. 16, 17; Heb. i. 8. But it is here meant that the universe is put under him more particularly as Mediator; that he might redeem his people; that he might gather and rule over a church; that he might defend his chosen; that he might subdue all their enemies, and bring them off conquerors, and more than conquerors, Eph. i. 20—23; 1 Cor. xv. 25, 27; Jno. v. 22, 23; Phil. ii. 6, 11. His mediatorial government extends therefore over the material world,—over angels,—over devils,—over wicked men,—over his own people. HE IS THE HEAD OVER ALL THINGS TO THE CHURCH.

EASTERN MARRIAGE PROCESSION.

as in chap. viii. 15; xx. 28; Luke viii. 3; Acts xix. 22; Rom. xv. 25; 2 Cor. iii. 3; 1 Pet. i. 12, &c. A similar word appears in Heb. i. 14.

v. 26. The fine exacted must be paid. The farthing is the Roman quadrans, one of the smallest copper coins, considerably less than an English farthing.

v. 29, 30. "Offend" means cause thee to stumble or to do wrong. The word for "hell" here also is gehenna, by which the Jews of that time understood "hell."

vi. 22, 23. "Single" is here contrasted with "evil;" but there is no reference to what is called an evil eye. The word "evil," like our word "bad," has the sense of ill, suffering from disorder, which may include partial or total blindness. "Single," therefore, must mean sound, in a healthy condition, free from disease.

vi. 34. "Do not anticipate to-morrow's griefs, because to-morrow will have its own anxieties. Why add to-morrow's troubles to the troubles of to-day?"

AN EXPOSITION OF THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. MARK,

WITH

WE have heard the evidence given in by the first witness to the doctrine and miracles of our Lord Jesus; and now here is another witness produced, who calls for our attention. The second living creature saith, "Come and see," Rev. vi. 3. Now let us inquire a little, I. Concerning this witness. His name is Mark. Marcus was a Roman name, and a very common one, and yet we have no reason to think but that he was by birth a Jew; but as Saul, when he went among the nations took the Roman name of Paul, so he of Mark; his Jewish name perhaps being Mardocai, so Grotius. We read of John, whose surname was Mark, sister's son to Barnabas, whom Paul was displeased with, Acts xv. 37, 38, but afterwards had a great kindness for, and not only ordered the churches to receive him, Col. iv. 10, but sent for him to be his assistant, with this encomium, "He is profitable to me for the ministry," 2 Tim. iv. 11. And he reckons him among his fellow-labourers, Phile. 24. We read of Marcus, whom Peter calls his son, having been an instrument of his conversion, 1 Pet. v. 13. Whether that was the same with the other, and if not, which of them was the penman of this Gospel, is altogether uncertain. It is a tradition very current among the ancients, that St. Mark wrote this Gospel under the direction of St. Peter, and that it was confirmed by his authority; so Hieron. Catal. Script. Eccles. : Marcus discipulus et interpres Petri, juxta quod Petrum referentem audierat, legatus Roma a fratribus breve scripsit Evangelium,—"Mark, the disciple and interpreter of Peter, being sent from Rome by the brethren, wrote a concise Gospel, as he heard it related by Peter." And Tertullian saith, Adv. Marcion. lib. 4, cap. 5: Marcus quod edidit, Petri affirmetur, cujus interpres Marcus,—"Mark, the interpreter of Peter, delivered in writing the things which had been preached by Peter." But, as Dr. Whitby very well suggests, "What need we have recourse to the authority of Peter for the support of this Gospel, or to say with St. Jerome, that Peter approved of it, and recommended it to his authority to the church to be read; when, though it is true Mark was no apostle, yet we have all the reason in the world to think, that both he and Luke were of the number of the seventy disciples, who accompanied with the apostles all along, Acts i. 21; who had a commission like that of the apostles, Lu. x. 19, compared with Mar. xvi. 18; and who, it is highly probable, received the Holy Ghost when they did, Acts i. 15; ii. 1; so that it is no diminution at all to the validity or value of this Gospel, that Mark was not one of the twelve, as Matthew and John were. St. Jerome saith, that after the writing of this Gospel, he went into Egypt, and was the first that preached the Gospel at Alexandria, where he founded a church, to which he was a great example of holy living. Constituit Ecclesiam tanta doctrina et vite continentia, ut omnes sectatores Christi ad exemplum sui cogeret,—"He so adorned, by his doctrine and his life, the church which he founded, that his example influenced all the followers of Christ."

II. Concerning this testimony. Mark's Gospel, 1. Is but short, much shorter than Matthew's, not giving so full an account of Christ's sermons as that did, but insisting chiefly on his miracles. 2. It is very much a repetition of what we had in Matthew; many remarkable circumstances being added to the stories there related, but not many new matters. When many witnesses are called to prove the same fact, upon which a judgment is to be given, it is not thought tedious but highly necessary, that they should each of them relate it in their own words, again and again, that by the agreement of the testimony, the thing might be established; and therefore we must not think this book of Scripture needless, for it is written not only to confirm our belief that "Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God," but to put us in mind of things which we have read in the foregoing Gospel; that we may "give the more earnest heed to them, lest at any time we let them slip;" and even pure minds have need to be thus stirred up by way of remembrance. It was fit that such great things as these should be spoken and written, once, yea twice, because man is so unapt to perceive them, and so apt to forget them. There is no ground for the tradition that this Gospel was written first in Latin, though it was written at Rome; it was written in Greek, as was St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, the Greek being the more universal language.

CHAPTER I.

Mark's narrative takes not rise so early as those of Matthew and Luke do, from the birth of our Saviour, but from John's baptism: from which he presently passeth to Christ's public ministry. Accordingly in this chapter, we have, I. The office of John Baptist, illustrated by the prophecy of him, ver. 1-3; and the history of him, ver. 4-8. II. Christ's baptism, and his being owned from heaven, ver. 9-11. III. His temptation, ver. 12, 13. IV. His preaching, ver. 14, 15, 21, 22, 38, 39. V. His calling disciples, ver. 16-20. VI. His praying, ver. 35. VII. His working miracles: 1. His rebuking an unclean spirit, ver. 23-28; 2. His curing Peter's mother in law, that was ill of a fever, ver. 29-31; 3. His healing all that came to him, ver. 32, 34, 35; 4. His cleansing a leper, ver. 40-45.

HE beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God; 2 As it is written in the prophets, Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee. 3 The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight. 4 John did baptize in the wilderness, and preach the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins. 5 And there went out unto him all the land of Judæa, and they of Jerusalem, and were all baptized of him in the river of Jordan, confessing their sins. 6 And John was clothed with camel's hair, and with a girdle of a skin about his loins; and he did eat locusts and wild honey; 7 And preached, saying, There cometh one mightier than I after me, the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to stoop down and unloose. 8 I indeed have baptized you with water: but he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost.

We may observe here, First. What the New Testament is: The Divine Testament, to which we adhere above all that is human. The New Testament, to which we advance above that which was old. It is "the Gospel of Jesus Christ the Son of God," ver. 1. 1. It is Gospel; it is God's Word, and is faithful and true; see Rev. xix. 9; xxi. 5; xxii. 6. It is a good Word, and well worthy of

i. 2, 3. The two prophets here quoted are Malachi iii. 1 and Isaiah xl. 3. The reading, "in the prophets," occurs in the Alexandrian and divers other manuscripts; but the reading, "in Isaiah the prophet," is better supported, being found in the Sinaitic, Vatican, and Cambridge MSS., and in the Syriac and Vulgate versions. It is therefore followed by the chief modern editors and critics. Both readings are now found in Irenæus, but that in which he agrees with our version is suspected to be an alteration. Grotius says the reading,

"in Isaiah the prophet," would not have been brought forward against the Christians by Porphyry if there had been any various reading then, neither would the Christians have found it difficult to answer Porphyry's objection. Mark names only the greater of his two authorities, having specially in view the character of the preaching of John; the words from Malachi are merely introductory.

i. 4. Here also there is a various reading. For "John did baptize in the wilderness, and preach," some read, "There was John the all acceptance; it brings us glad tidings. 2. It is the Gospel of Jesus Christ, the anointed Saviour, the Messiah promised and expected. The foregoing Gospel began with the generation of Jesus Christ, that was but preliminary; this comes immediately to the business,—the Gospel of Christ. It is called his, not only because he is the Author of it, and it comes from him; but because he is the subject of it, and it treats wholly concerning him. 3. This Jesus is the Son of God. That truth is the foundation on which the Gospel is built, and which it is written to demonstrate; for if Jesus be not the Son of God, our faith is vain.

Secondly, What the reference of the New Testament is to the Old, and its coherence with it. The Gospel of Jesus Christ begins, and so we shall find it goes on, just "as it is written in the prophets," ver. 2; for it saith, "no other things than those which the prophets and Moses said should come," Acts xxvi. 22, which was most proper and powerful for the conviction of the Jews, that believed the Old Testament prophets to be sent of God, and ought to evidence that they did so by welcoming the accomplishment of their prophecies in its season; but it is of use to us all for the confirmation of our prophecies in the Old Testament and in the New, for the exact harmony that there is between both, shews that they both have the same Divine original. Quotations are here borrowed from two prophecies; that of Isaiah, which was the longest, and that of Malachi, which was the latest, (and there were above three hundred years between them,) that both spoke to the same purpose concerning "the beginning of the Gospel of Jesus Christ," in the ministry of John. 1. Malachi, in whom we had the Old Testament farewell, spoke very plainly, Mal. iii. 1. concerning John Baptist, who was to give the New Testament welcome: "Behold I send my messenger before thy face," ver. 2. Christ himself had taken notice of this, and applied it to John, Mat. xi. 10. who was God's messenger sent to prepare Christ's way. 2. Isaiah, the most evangelical of all the prophets, begins the evangelical part of his prophecy with this, which points to "the beginning of the Gospel of Christ," Isa. xl. 3: "The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness," ver. 3. Matthew had taken notice of this, and applied it to John, Mat. iii. 3. But from these two put together here, we may observe, 1st. That Christ in his Gospel comes among us, bringing with him a treasure of grace, and a sceptre of government. 2nd. Such is the corruption of the world, that it is something to do to make room for him, and to remove that which gives not only obstruction, but opposition to his progress. 3rd. When God sent his Son into the world he took care, and when he sends him into the heart he takes care, effectual care, to prepare his way before him; for the designs of his grace shall not be frustrated, nor may any expect the comforts of that grace, but such as by conviction of sin, and humiliation for it, are prepared for those comforts, and disposed to receive them. 4th. When the paths that were crooked are made straight, (the mistakes of the judgment rectified, and the crooked ways of the affections, then way is made for Christ's comforts. 5th. It is in a wilderness—for such this world is, that Christ's way is prepared, and theirs that follow him, like that which Israel passed through to Canaan. 6th. The messengers of conviction and terror, that come to prepare Christ's way, are God's messengers, whom he sends and will own, and must be received as such. 7th. They that are sent to "prepare the way of the Lord," in such a vast howling wilderness as this is, have need to cry aloud, and not spare, and to lift up their voice like a trumpet.

Thirdly, What the beginning of the New Testament was. The Gospel began in John Baptist; for "the law and the prophets were, until John," the only Divine revelation, but then the kingdom of God began to be preached, Lu. xvi. 16. Peter begins from the baptism of John, Acts i. 22. The Gospel did not begin so soon as the birth of Christ, for he took time to increase in wisdom and stature, nor so late as his entering upon his public ministry, but half a year before, when John began to preach the same doctrine that Christ afterwards preached. His baptism was the dawning of the gospel day; for

1. In John's way of living there was the beginning of a gospel spirit, for it spoke great self-denial, mortification of the flesh, a holy contempt of the world, and nonconformity to it, which may truly be called "the beginning of the Gospel of Christ" in any soul, ver. 6. He "was clothed with camel's hair," not with soft raiment; was girt, not with a golden but a leathern girdle; and, in contempt of dainties and delicate things, his meat was locusts and wild honey. Note, The more we sit loose to the body, and live above the world, the better we are prepared for Jesus Christ.

2. In John's preaching and baptizing there was the beginning of the gospel doctrines and ordinances, and the firstfruits of them. 1st. He preached the remission of sins, which is the great gospel privilege, shewed people their need of it, that they were undone without it, and that it might be obtained. 2nd. He preached repentance in order to it; he told people that there must be a renovation of their hearts, and a reformation of their lives, that they must forsake their sins and turn to God, and upon those terms, and no other, their sins should be forgiven. "Repentance for the remission of sins" was what the apostles were commissioned to preach to all nations, Lu. xxiv. 47. 3rd. He preached Christ, and directed his hearers to expect him speedily to appear, and to expect great things from him. The preaching of Christ is pure gospel, and that was John Baptist's preaching, ver. 7, 8. Like a true gospel minister, he preacheth,

First, The great pre-eminence Christ is advanced to; so high, so great is Christ, that John, though one of the greatest that was born of woman, yet thinks himself unworthy to be employed in the meanest office about him, even to stoop down and untie his shoes. Thus industrious is he to give honour to him, and bring others to do so too. Secondly, The great power Christ is invested in. "He comes after me in time, but he is mightier than I; mightier than the mighty ones of the earth, for he is able to baptize with the Holy Ghost. He can give the Spirit of God, and by him govern the spirits of men."

Thirdly, The great promise Christ makes in his Gospel to those who have repented, and have had their sins forgiven them: they shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost, shall be purified by his graces, and refreshed by his comforts. And, lastly, All those who received his doctrine, and submitted to his institution, he baptized with water, as the manner of the Jews was to admit proselytes, in token of their cleansing themselves by repentance and reformation, which was the duty required; and of God's cleansing them both by remission and sanctification, which were the blessings promised. Now this was afterwards to be advanced into a gospel ordinance, which John's using it was a preface to.

3. In the success of John's preaching, and the disciples he admitted by baptism, there was the beginning of a gospel church. He baptized in the wilderness, and declined going to the cities, but "there went out unto him all the land of Judea, and they of Jerusalem," inhabitants both of city and country, families of them, "and were all baptized of him." They entered themselves his disciples, and bound themselves to his discipline, and in token of that they confessed their sins; he admitted them his disciples, and in token of that baptized them. Here were the stamina of the gospel church, the dew of its youth from the womb of the morning, Ps. cx. 3. Many of these afterwards became followers of Christ, and preachers of his Gospel, and this grain of mustard seed became a tree.

Baptiser in the wilderness, preaching," &c. The Syriac may be rendered, "John was in the wilderness baptising and preaching;" so the Vulgate.

i. 5. For "and they of Jerusalem, and were all baptised," weighty authorities, ancient and modern, read, "and all they of Jerusalem, and were baptised." The Syriac has, "and all the sons of Jerusalem, and he baptised them in the river Jordan." The second reading is best.

9 And it came to pass in those days, that Jesus came from Nazareth of Galilee, and was baptized of John in Jordan. 10 And straightway coming up out of the water, he saw the heavens opened, and the Spirit like a dove descending upon him: 11 And there came a voice from heaven, saying, Thou art my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased. 12 And immediately the spirit driveth him into the wilderness. 13 And he was there in the wilderness forty days, tempted of Satan; and was with the wild beasts; and the angels ministered unto him.

We have here a brief account of Christ's baptism and temptation, which were largely related, Mat. iii. and iv.

First, His baptism, which was his first public appearance, after he had long lived obscurely in Nazareth. O how much hidden worth is there, which in this world is either lost in the dust of contempt, and cannot be known, or wrapt up in the veil of humility, and will not be known. But sooner or later it shall be known, as Christ's was.

1. See how humbly he owned God, by coming to be baptized of John, and thus it became him "to fulfil all righteousness." Thus he took upon him the likeness of sinful flesh, that though he was perfectly pure and unspotted, yet he was washed, as if he had been polluted; and thus for our sakes he sanctified himself, that we also might be sanctified and be baptized with him, Jno. xvii. 19.

2. See how honourably God owned him, when he submitted to John's baptism. Those who justify God, as they are said to do who were "baptized with the baptism of John," he will glorify them, Lu. vii. 29, 30. 1st. "He saw the heavens opened." Thus he was owned to be the Lord from heaven, and had a glimpse of the glory and joy that was set before him, and secured to him as the recompence of his undertaking. Matthew saith, the "heavens were opened to him;" Mark saith, he saw them opened. Many have the heavens opened to receive them, but they do not see it. Christ had not only a clear foresight of his sufferings, but of his glory too. 2nd. He saw "the Spirit like a dove descending upon him." Note, Then we may see heaven opened to us, when we perceive the Spirit descending and working upon us. God's good work in us is the surest evidence of his good will towards us, and his preparations for us. Justin Martyr saith, that when Christ was baptized, a fire was kindled in Jordan; and it is an ancient tradition that a great light shone round the place, for the Spirit brings both light and heat. 3rd. He heard a voice which was intended for an encouragement to proceed in his undertaking, and therefore it is here expressed as directed to him, "Thou art my beloved Son." God lets him know, First, That he loved him never the less for that low and mean estate to which he had now humbled himself; though thus emptied and made of no reputation, yet "my beloved Son" still. Secondly, That he loved him much the more for that glorious and kind undertaking in which he had now engaged himself. God is well pleased in him as referee of all matters in controversy between him and man; and so well pleased in him as to be well pleased with us in him.

Secondly, His temptation. The good Spirit that descended upon him led "him into the wilderness," ver. 12. Paul mentions it as a proof that he had his doctrine from God, and not from man, that as soon as he was called he went not to Jerusalem, but went into Arabia, Gal. i. 17. Retirement from the world is an opportunity of more free converse with God, and therefore must sometimes be chosen for a while, even by those that are called to the greatest business. Mark observes this circumstance of his being in the wilderness, that he "was with the wild beasts." It was an instance of his Father's care of him, that he was preserved from being torn in pieces by the wild beasts, which encouraged him the more, that his Father would provide for him when he was hungry. Special protections are earnest of seasonable supplies. It was likewise an intimation to him of the inhumanity of the men of that generation whom he was to live among, no better than wild beasts in the wilderness, nay, abundantly worse. In that wilderness,

1. The evil spirits were busy with him: he was "tempted of Satan:" not by any inward injections,—the prince of this world had no'ing in him to fasten upon,—but by outward solicitations. Solitude often gives advantage to the tempter, therefore two is better than one. Christ himself was tempted, not only to teach us that it is no sin to be tempted, but to direct us whither to go for succour when we are tempted—even to him that suffered being tempted; that he might experimentally sympathize with us when we are tempted.

2. The good spirits were busy about him: "The angels ministered to him," supplied him with what he needed, and dutifully attended him. Note, The ministrations of the good angels about us is matter of great comfort in reference to the malicious designs of the evil angels against us; but much more doth it befriend us to have the indwelling of the Spirit in our hearts, which they that have are so born of God that, as far as they are so, the evil one toucheth them not, much less shall he triumph over them.

14 Now after that John was put in prison, Jesus came into Galilee, preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God, 15 And saying, The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand: repent ye, and believe the gospel. 16 Now as he walked by the sea of Galilee, he saw Simon and Andrew his brother casting a net into the sea: for they were fishers. 17 And Jesus said unto them, Come ye after me, and I will make you to become fishers of men. 18 And straightway they forsook their nets, and fol-

i. 9. Matthew simply states that Jesus came from Galilee, but Mark, who is often more precise in his details, notes that Jesus came from Nazareth of Galilee. This indication is interesting, as it suggests that Jesus remained at Nazareth until after John the Baptist commenced his ministry. The credulous are still taught to believe that special memorials of Christ yet exist at Nazareth, but Dr. Thomson repudiates them all, saying, "I like to feel assured that the Church of the Annunciation, the cave, the kitchen of Mary,

lowed him. 19 And when he had gone a little farther thence, he saw James the son of Zebedee, and John his brother, who also were in the ship mending their nets. 20 And straightway he called them: and they left their father Zebedee in the ship with the hired servants, and went after him. 21 And they went into Capernaum; and straightway on the sabbath day he entered into the synagogue, and taught. 22 And they were astonished at his doctrine: for he taught them as one that had authority, and not as the scribes.

Here is, First. A general account of Christ's preaching in Galilee. John gives an account of his preaching in Judæa before this, Jno. ii. and iii., which the other evangelists have omitted, who chiefly relate what occurred in Galilee, because that was least known at Jerusalem. Observe, 1. When Jesus began to preach in Galilee: "After that John was put in prison." When he had finished his testimony, then Jesus began his. Note, The silencing of Christ's ministers shall not be the suppressing of Christ's Gospel; if some be laid aside, others shall be raised up, perhaps mightier than they, to carry on the same work. 2. What he preached: "The Gospel of the kingdom of God." Christ came to set up the kingdom of God among men, that they might be brought into subjection to it, and might obtain salvation in it; and he set it up by the preaching of his Gospel, and a power going along with it. Observe,

1st. The great truths Christ preached: "The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand." This refers to the Old Testament, in which the kingdom of the Messiah was promised, and time fixed for the introducing of it; they were not so well versed in those prophecies, nor did they so well observe the signs of the times, as to understand it themselves, and therefore Christ gives them notice of it. The time prefixed is now at hand; glorious discoveries of Divine light, life, and love, are now to be made; a new dispensation, far more spiritual and heavenly than that which you have hitherto been under, is now to commence. Note, God keeps time; when "the time is fulfilled, the kingdom of God is at hand," for the vision is for an appointed time, which will be punctually observed, though it tarry past our time.

2nd. The great duties inferred from thence. Christ gave them to understand the times, that they might know what Israel ought to do: they fondly expected the Messiah to appear in external pomp and power, not only to free the Jewish nation from the Roman yoke, but to make it have dominion over all its neighbours; and therefore thought, when that kingdom of God was at hand, they must prepare for war, and for victory and preferment, and great things in the world; but Christ tells them, in the prospect of that kingdom approaching, they must "repent, and believe the Gospel." They had broken the moral law, and could not be saved by a covenant of innocence, for both Jew and Gentile are concluded under guilt. They must therefore take the benefit of a covenant of grace, must submit to a remedial law, and this is it, "Repentance towards God, and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ." They had not made use of the prescribed preservatives, and therefore must have recourse to the prescribed restoratives. By repentance we must lament and forsake our sins, and by faith we must receive the forgiveness of them. By repentance we must give glory to our Creator, whom we have offended; by faith we must give glory to our Redeemer, who came to save us from our sins. Both these must go together; we must not think either that reforming our lives will save us, without trusting in the righteousness and grace of Christ; nor that trusting in Christ will save us, without the reformation of our hearts and lives. Christ hath joined these two together, and let no man think to put them asunder. They will mutually assist and befriend each other. Repentance will quicken faith, and faith will make repentance evangelical; and the sincerity of both together must be evidenced by a diligent, conscientious obedience to all God's commandments. Thus the preaching of the Gospel began, and thus it continues; still the call is, Repent and believe, and live a life of repentance, and a life of faith.

Secondly. Christ appearing as a teacher, here is next his calling of disciples, ver. 16-20. Observe, 1. Christ will have followers. If he set up a school he will have scholars; if he set up his standard he will have soldiers; if he preach he will have hearers. He has taken an effectual course to secure this, for all that the Father has given him shall without fail come to him. 2. The instruments Christ chose to employ in setting up his kingdom were the weak and foolish things of the world, not called from the great sanhedrim, or the schools of the rabbins, but picked up from among the tarpaulins by the sea side, that the excellency of the power might appear to be wholly of God, and not at all of them. 3. Though Christ needs not the help of man, yet he is pleased to make use of it in setting up his kingdom, that he might deal with us, not in a formidable, but a familiar way, and that in his kingdom the nobles and governors may be of ourselves, Jer. xxx. 21. 4. Christ puts honour upon those who, though mean in the world, are diligent in their business, and loving to one another; so those were whom Christ called. He found them employed, and employed together. Industry and unity are good and pleasant, and there the Lord Jesus commands the blessing, even this blessing, "Follow me." 5. The business of ministers is to fish for souls, and win them to Christ. The children of men in their natural condition are lost, and wander endlessly in the great ocean of this world, and are carried down the stream of its course and way; they are unprofitable. Like leviathan in the waters, they play therein; and often, like the fishes of the sea, they devour one another. Ministers, in preaching the Gospel, cast the net into the waters, Mat. xiii. 47. Some are enclosed and brought to shore, but far the greater number escape. Fishermen take great pains, and expose themselves to great perils, so do ministers; and they have need of wisdom. If many a draught bring home nothing, yet they must go on. 6. Those whom Christ calls must leave all to follow him; and by his grace he inclines them to do so. Not that we must needs go out of the world presently, but we must sit loose to the world, and forsake every thing that is inconsistent with our duty to Christ, and which cannot be kept without prejudice to our souls. Mark takes notice of James and John, that they left not only their father, which we had in Matthew, but the hired servants, whom perhaps they loved as their own brethren, being their fellow-labourers and pleasant comrades; not only relations, but companions, must be left for Christ, and old acquaintance. Perhaps it is an intimation of their care for their father; they did not leave him without assistance, they left the hired servants with him. Grotius thinks it is mentioned as an evidence that their calling was painful to them, for it was worth while to keep servants in pay to help them in it, and their hands would be much missed, and yet they left it.

Thirdly. Here is a particular account of his preaching in Capernaum, one of the cities of Galilee; for though John Baptist chose to preach in a wilderness and did well, and did good, yet it doth not therefore follow that Jesus must do so too; the inclinations and opportunities of ministers may very much differ, and yet both be in the way of their duty, and both useful. Observe, 1. When Christ came into Capernaum, he straightway applied himself to his work there and took the first opportunity of preaching the Gospel. Those will think themselves concerned not to lose time who consider what a deal of work they have to do, and what a little time to do it in. 2. Christ religiously observed the sabbath day, though not by tying himself up to the tradition of the elders in all the niceties of the sabbath rest, yet (which was far better) by applying himself to, and abounding in, the sabbath work, in order to which the sabbath rest was instituted. 3. Sabbaths are to be sanctified in religious assemblies, if we have opportunity; it is a holy day, and must be honoured with a holy convocation: this was the good old way, Acts xiii. 27; xv. 21. On the sabbath day, τοὺς σαββάτους, "on the sabbath days;" every sabbath day, as duly as it returned, he went into the synagogue. 4. In religious assemblies on sabbath days the Gospel is to be preached, and those to be taught who are willing to learn the truth as it is in Jesus. 5. Christ was a non-such preacher; he did not preach as the scribes, who expounded the law of Moses by rote, as a schoolboy saith his lesson, but were neither acquainted with it, (Paul himself, when a Pharisee, was ignorant of the law,) nor affected by it; it came not from the heart, and therefore came not with authority. But Christ taught "as one that had authority," as one that knew the mind of God, and was commissioned to declare it. 6. There is much in the doctrine of Christ that is astonishing; the more we hear it, the more cause we shall see to admire it.

23 And there was in their synagogue a man with an unclean spirit; and he cried out, 24 Saying, Let us alone; what have we to do with thee, thou Jesus of Nazareth? art thou come to destroy us? I know thee who thou art, the Holy One of God. 25 And Jesus rebuked him, saying, Hold thy peace, and come out of him. 26 And when the unclean spirit had torn him, and cried with a loud voice, he came out of him. 27 And they were all amazed, insomuch that they questioned among themselves, saying, What thing is this? what new doctrine is this? for with authority commandeth he even the unclean spirits, and they do obey him. 28 And immediately his fame spread abroad throughout all the region round about Galilee.

As soon as Christ began to preach, he began to work miracles for the confirmation of his doctrine; and they were such as intimated the design and tendency of his doctrine, which was to conquer Satan, and cure sick souls. In these verses we have,

First. Christ's casting the devil out of a man that was possessed, in the synagogue at Capernaum. This passage was not related in Matthew, but is afterwards in Luke. Ver. 23, "There was in the synagogue a man with an unclean spirit," ἐν πνεύματι ἀκαθάρτῳ,—"in an unclean spirit;" for the spirit had the man in his possession, and led him captive at his will. So the whole world is said to lie ἐν τῷ πονηρῷ,—"in the wicked one." And some have thought it more proper to say the body is in the soul, because it is governed by it, than the soul in the body. He was in the unclean spirit, as a man is said to be in a fever, or in a frenzy, quite overcome by it. Observe, The devil is here called "an unclean spirit," because he has lost all the purity of his nature, because he acts in direct opposition to the Holy Spirit of God, and because, with his suggestions, he pollutes the spirits of men. This man "was in the synagogue;" he did not come either to be taught or to be healed, but, as some think, to confront Christ, and oppose him, and hinder people from believing on him. Now here we have,

1. The rage which the unclean spirit expressed at Christ: "He cried out," as one in agony at the presence of Christ, and afraid of being dislodged; thus "the devils believe and tremble," have a horror of Christ, but no hope in him, nor reverence for him. We are told what he said, ver. 24, where he doth not go about to capitulate with him, or make terms, so far was he from being in league or compact with him; but speaks as one that knew his doom. 1st. He calls him "Jesus of Nazareth," and, for aught appears, he was the first that called him so; and he did it with design to possess the minds of people with low thoughts of him, because no good thing was expected out of Nazareth, and with prejudices against him as a deceiver, because every body knew the Messiah must be of Bethlehem. 2. Yet a confession is extorted from him that he is "the Holy One of God," as was from the damsel that had the spirit of divination concerning the apostles, that they were "the servants of the most high God," Acts xvi. 16, 17. Those that have only a notion of Christ, that he is the Holy One of God, and have no faith in him, or love to him, go no farther than the devil doth. 3rd. He in effect acknowledgeth that Christ was too hard for him, and that he could not stand before the power of Christ: "Let us alone," for if thou take us to task we are undone, thou canst "destroy us." This is the misery of those wicked spirits, that they persist in their rebellion, and yet know it will end in their destruction. 4th. He desires to have nothing to do with Jesus Christ, for he despairs of being saved by him, and dreads being destroyed by him. "What have we to do with thee?" "If thou wilt let us alone, we will let thee alone." See whose language they speak that "say to the Almighty, Depart from us." This being an unclean spirit, therefore hated and dreaded Christ, because he knew him to be a Holy One; for "the carnal mind is enmity against God," especially against his holiness.

2. The victory which Jesus Christ obtained over the unclean spirit: "For this purpose was the Son of God manifested, that he might destroy the works of the workshop of Joseph, the dining-table of our Lord and his apostles, the synagogue where he read the prophet Isaiah, and the precipice down which his enraged fellow-villagers were determined to cast him headlong, as now shown, are all fabulous, apocryphal, and have no claims to my veneration or even respect." ("The Land and the Book," chap. 29.)

i. 11. For "in whom," which is the reading of the Alexandrian and some other MSS., the best modern editions, and the Sinaitic, Vatican, and Cambridge MSS., the Syriac Peshito, and Latin Vulgate versions, with other authorities, read "in thee." (Compare this verse with Matt. iii. 17.)

i. 13. Though shorter than the accounts of Luke and Matthew, this notice of the temptation adds the remark that Jesus was with the wild beasts. At the time referred to wild beasts of a formidable character appear to have been common in the unfrequented parts of the country. Of these the lion is no longer found, the leopard and the devil," and so he makes it to appear; nor will he be turned back from prosecuting this war, either by his flatteries, or by his menaces. It is in vain for Satan to beg and pray. "Let us alone," his power must be broken, and the poor man must be relieved; and therefore, 1st. Jesus commands. As he taught, so he healed with authority. "Jesus rebuked him;" he chid him, and threatened him, imposed silence upon him: "Hold thy peace," ἡσυχάζει,—"be muzzled." Christ has a muzzle for that unclean spirit when he fawns as well as when he barks; such acknowledgments of him as this was Christ disdains, so far is he from accepting them. Those that confess Christ to be "the Holy One of God," that, under the cloak of that profession, they may carry on malicious, mischievous designs, their confession is doubly an abomination to the Lord Jesus, as it sues in his name for a licence to sin, and shall therefore be put to silence and shame. But this is not all, he must not only hold his peace, but he must come out of the map; this was it he dreaded, his being restrained from doing farther mischief. But, 2nd. The unclean spirit yields, for there is no remedy, ver. 26. He tore him, put him into a strong convulsion, that one would have thought that he had been pulled in pieces; when he could not touch Christ, in fury at him, he grievously disturbed this poor creature. Thus when Christ by his grace delivers poor souls out of the hands of Satan, it is not without a grievous toss and tumult in the soul; for that spiteful enemy will disquiet those whom he cannot destroy. He "cried with a loud voice," to frighten the spectators, and make himself seem terrible; as if he would have thought, that though he was conquered, he was but just conquered, and that he hoped to rally again, and recover his ground.

Secondly. The impressions which this miracle made upon the minds of the people, ver. 27, 28.

1. It astonished them that saw it: "They were all amazed." It was evident beyond contradiction that the man was possessed; witness the tearing of him, and the loud voice with which the spirit cried. It was evident he was forced out by the authority of Christ; this was surprising to them, and put them upon considering with themselves, and inquiring of one another, "What is this new doctrine?" for it must certainly be of God which is thus confirmed. He hath certainly an authority to command us, who hath ability to command even the unclean spirits; and they cannot resist him, but are forced to obey him. The Jewish exorcists pretended, by charm or invocation, to drive away evil spirits; but this was quite another thing; with authority he commands them. Surely it is our interest to make him our friend who has the control of infernal spirits.

2. It raised his reputation among all that heard it: "Immediately his fame spread abroad into the whole adjacent region of Galilee," which was a third part of the land of Canaan. The story was presently got into every one's mouth, and people wrote it to their friends all the country over, together with the remark made upon it, "What new doctrine is this?" So that it was universally concluded that he was "a teacher come from God," and under that character he shone more bright than if he had appeared in all the external pomp and power which the Jews expected their Messiah to appear in; and thus he prepared his own way, now John, who was his harbinger, was clapped up; and the fame of this miracle spread the farther, because as yet the Pharisees, who envied his fame, and laboured to eclipse it, had not advanced their blasphemous suggestion that he cast out devils by compact with the prince of the devils.

29 And forthwith, when they were come out of the synagogue, they entered into the house of Simon and Andrew, with James and John. 30 But Simon's wife's mother lay sick of a fever, and anon they tell him of her. 31 And he came and took her by the hand, and lifted her up; and immediately the fever left her, and she ministered unto them. 32 And at even, when the sun did set, they brought unto him all that were diseased, and them that were possessed with devils. 33 And all the city was gathered together at the door. 34 And he healed many that were sick of divers diseases, and cast out many devils; and suffered not the devils to speak, because they knew him. 35 And in the morning, rising up a great while before day, he went out, and departed into a solitary place, and there prayed. 36 And Simon and they that were with him followed after him. 37 And when they had found him, they said unto him, All men seek for thee. 38 And he said unto them, Let us go into the next towns, that I may preach there also: for therefore came I forth. 39 And he preached in their synagogues throughout all Galilee, and cast out devils.

In these verses we have,

First. A particular account of one miracle that Christ wrought in the cure of Peter's wife's mother, that was ill of a fever. This passage we had before in Matthew. Observe, 1. When Christ had done that which spread his fame throughout all parts, he did not then sit still, as some, who think they may lie in bed when their name is up. No, he continued to do good, for that was it he aimed at, and not his own honour. Nay, those who are in reputation had need be busy, and careful to keep it up. 2. When he came out of the synagogue, where he had taught and healed with a Divine authority, yet he conversed familiarly with the poor fishermen that attended him, and did not think it below him. Let the same mind, the same lowly mind be in us, that was in him. 3. He went into Peter's house, probably invited thither to such entertainment as a poor fisherman could give him, and he accepted of it. The apostles left all for Christ, so far as that what they had should not hinder them from him, yet not so but that they might use it for him. 4. He cured his mother in law that was sick; wherever Christ comes, he comes to do good, and will be sure to pay richly for his entertainment. Observe, How complete the cure was; when the fever left her, it did not, as usual, leave her weak, but the same that healed her strengthened her, so that she was able to minister to them; the cure is in order to that, to fit for action, that we may minister to Christ, and to those that are his, for his sake.

Secondly. A general account of many cures he wrought—diseases healed, devils expelled. It was at the even of the sabbath, when the sun did set, or was set; perhaps many scrupled bringing their sick to him, till the sabbath was over, but their weakness therein was no prejudice to them in applying to Christ: though he proved it lawful to heal on the sabbath days, yet if any stumbled at it they were welcome at another time. Now observe,

1. How numerous the patients were: "All the city was gathered at the door," as beggars at a dole. That one cure in the synagogue occasioned this crowding after him. Others speeding well with Christ should quicken us in our inquiries after him. Now "the Sun of righteousness riseth with healing under his wings;" to him shall the "gathering of the people be." Observe, how Christ was flocked after in a private house, as well as in the synagogue; wherever he is, there let his servants, his patients be. And in the evening of the sabbath, when the public worship is over, we must continue our attendance upon Jesus Christ; he healed, as Paul preached, publicly, and from house to house.

2. How powerful the physician was: he healed all that were brought to him, though never so many. Nor was it some one particular disease that Christ set up for the cure of, but he healed those that were sick of divers diseases, for his word was a panpharmacœon—"a salve for every sore." And that miracle particularly which he wrought in the synagogue, he repeated in the house at night, "for he cast out many devils, and he suffered not the devils to speak," for he made them know who he was, and that silenced them. Or, he "suffered them not to say that they knew him," so it may be read; he would not permit any more of them to say as they did, ver. 24, "I know thee, who thou art."

Thirdly. His retirement to his private devotion, ver. 35: he prayed, prayed alone; to set us an example of secret prayer. Though as God he was prayed for, as man he prayed. Though he was glorifying God and doing good in his public work, yet he found time to be alone with his Father; and thus it became him to fulfil all righteousness. Now observe,

1. The time when Christ prayed: 1st. It was "in the morning," the morning after the sabbath day. Note, When a sabbath day is over and past, we must not think that we may intermit our devotion till the next sabbath; no, though we go not to the synagogue, we must go to the throne of grace every day in the week; and the morning after the sabbath particularly, that we may preserve the good impressions of the day. This morning was the morning of the first day of the week, which afterwards he sanctified, and made remarkable by another sort of rising early. 2nd. It was early: "a great while before day." When others were asleep in their beds, he was praying, as a genuine son of David who seeks God early, and "directs his prayer in the morning;" nay, and "at midnight will rise to give thanks." It has been said that "the morning is a friend to the muses"—Aurora musis amica; and it is no less so to the graces. When our spirits are most fresh and lively, then we should take time for devout exercises. He that is the first and best, ought to have the first and best.

2. The place where he prayed: He "departed into a solitary place," either out of town, or some remote garden or outbuilding. Though he was in no danger of distraction, or of temptation to vainglory, yet he retired to set us an example to his own rule, "When thou prayest enter into thy closet." Secret prayer must be made secretly. Those that have the most business in public, and of the best kind, yet must sometimes be alone with God, must retire into solitude, there to converse with God, and keep up communion with him.

Fourthly. His return to his public work: the disciples thought they were up early, but found their Master was up before them, and they inquired which way he went, followed him to his solitary place, and there found him at prayer, ver. 36, 37; and told him he was much wanted, there were a great many patients waiting for him, "All men seek for thee." They were proud that their Master was become so popular already, and would have him appear in public, yet more in that place, because it was their own city; and we are apt to be partial to the places we know, and are interested in. No, saith Christ, Capernaum must not have the monopoly of the Messiah's preaching and miracles. "Let us go into the next towns," the villages that lie about here, "that I may preach there also," and work miracles there, "for therefore came I forth," not to be constantly resident in one place, but to go "about doing good." Even the "inhabitants of the villages in Israel," shall "rehearse the righteous acts of the Lord," Jud. v. 11. Observe, Christ hath still an eye to the end wherefore he came forth, and closely pursued that; nor will he be drawn by importunity or the persuasions of his friends to decline from that; for ver. 39, he "preached in their synagogues throughout all Galilee," and to illustrate and confirm his doctrine, he "cast out devils." Note, Christ's doctrine is Satan's destruction.

40 And there came a leper to him, beseeching him, and kneeling down to him, and saying unto him, If thou wilt, thou canst make me clean. 41 And Jesus, moved with compassion, put forth his hand, and touched him, and saith unto him, I will; be thou clean. 42 And as soon as he had spoken, immediately the leprosy departed from him, and he was cleansed. 43 And he straitly charged him, and forthwith sent him away; 44 And saith unto him, See thou say nothing to any man: but go thy way, shew thyself to the priest, and offer for thy cleansing those things which Moses commanded for a testimony unto them. 45 But he went out, and began to publish it much, and to blaze abroad the matter, insomuch that Jesus could no more the bear occur only in a few remote localities, and the wolf and hyæna are not abundant.

i. 14. The word rendered "put in prison" is the one for delivered up or betrayed, but like our word "committed," it may mean committed to prison. Matthew gives additional details, but it is apparent that our Lord left the region where John baptised, and first preached in Galilee. The expression "of the kingdom" is omitted by the Sinaitic and Vatican MSS., and some modern editors, but is found in the Alexandrian and other good MSS., as well as in the Syriac and Vulgate versions. Both readings are evidently very ancient.

i. 21. Instead of "he entered into the synagogue, and taught," some good MSS. and editions read, "he taught in the synagogue."

i. 24. The words "let us alone" do not occur in the Sinaitic, Vatican, and Cambridge MSS., nor in the Syriac and Vulgate versions.

i. 27. There are several various readings in this verse at the openly enter into the city, but was without in desert places: and they came to him from every quarter.

We have here the story of Christ's cleansing of a leper, which we had before, Mat. viii. 2. And it teaches us,

I. How to apply ourselves to Christ: come as this leper did. First. With great humility; this leper came "beseeching him, and kneeling down to him," ver. 40. Whether giving Divine honour to him as God, or rather a less degree of respect as a great prophet, it teaches us, that those who would receive grace and mercy from Christ, must ascribe honour and glory to Christ, and approach him with humility and reverence. Secondly. With a firm belief of his power; "thou canst make me clean." Though Christ's outward appearance was but mean, yet he had this faith in his power, which implies his belief that he was sent of God. He believes it with application, not only in general, thou canst do every thing, as Jno. xi. 22, but "thou canst make me clean." Note, What we believe of the power of Christ, we must bring home to our particular case; thou canst do this for me. Thirdly. With submission to the will of Christ; "Lord, if thou wilt." Not as if he had any doubt of Christ's readiness in general to help the distressed, but, with the modesty that became a poor petitioner, he refers his own particular case to him.

II. What to expect from Christ: that according to our faith it shall be to us. His address is not in the form of prayer, yet Christ answered it as a request. Note, Affectionate professions of faith in Christ, and resignations to him, are the most prevailing petitions for mercy from him, and shall speed accordingly. First. Christ "was moved with compassion." This is added here in Mark, to shew that Christ's power is employed by his pity for the relief of poor souls. That his reasons are fetched from within himself, and we have nothing in us to recommend us to his favour, but our misery makes us the objects of his mercy. And what he doth for us, he doth with all possible tenderness. Secondly. He "put forth his hand, and touched him." He exerted his power, and directed it to this creature. In healing souls, Christ toucheth them, 1 Sam. xx. 26. When the queen toucheth for the evil, she saith, "I touch, God heals," but Christ toucheth and heals too. Thirdly. He said, "I will, be thou clean." Christ's power was put forth in and by a word, to signify in what way Christ would ordinarily work spiritual cures; he sends his word and heals, Ps. cvii. 20; Jno. xvii. 17; xv. 3. The poor leper put an if upon the will of Christ, "if thou wilt," but that doubt is soon put out of doubt, "I will." Christ most readily wills favours to those that most readily refer themselves to his will. He was confident of Christ's power, "thou canst make me clean," and Christ will shew how much his power is drawn out into act by the faith of his people, and therefore speaks the word as one having authority, "be thou clean." And power accompanied this word, and the cure was perfect in an instant, "immediately his leprosy" vanished, and there remained no more sign of it, ver. 42.

III. What to do when we have received mercy from Christ: We must with his favours receive his commands. When Christ had cured him, "he straitly charged him," the word here is very significant, ἐμβριμσαμενος, gravior interminatus—"prohibiting with threats." I am apt to think this refers not to the directions he gave him to conceal it, ver. 44, for those are mentioned by themselves; but that this was such a charge as he gave to the impotent man whom he cured, Jno. v. 14, "Go, sin no more, lest a worst thing come to thee;" for the leprosy was ordinarily the punishment of some particular sinners, as in Miriam's, Gehazi's, and Uzziah's case; now when Christ himself healed him, he warned him, he threatened him with the fatal consequence of it, if he should return to sin again. He also appointed him, First. To shew himself to the priest, that the priest by his own judgment of this leper, might be a witness for Christ, that he was the Messiah, Mat. xi. 5. Secondly. Until he had done that, not to say any thing of it to any man; this is an instance of the humility of Christ, and his self-denial, that he did not seek his own honour, did not strive or cry, Isa. xlii. 2; and it is an example to us not to seek our own glory, Pr. xxv. 27. He must not proclaim it, because that would much increase the crowd that followed Christ, which he thought was too great already; not as if he were unwilling to do good to all, to as many as came, but he would do it with as little noise as might be, would have no offence given to the government, no disturbance of the public peace, nor any thing done that looked like ostentation, or an affectation of popular applause. What to think of the leper's publishing it and blazing it abroad, I know not; the concealment of the good characters and good works of good men better becomes them than their friends; nor are we always bound by the modest commands of humble men. The leper ought to have observed his orders, yet no doubt it was with a good design that he proclaimed the cure, and it had no other ill effect but that it increased the multitudes that followed Christ, to that degree that he "could no more openly enter into the city;" not upon the account of persecution, there was no danger of that yet; but because the crowd was so great, that the streets would not hold them, which obliged him to go into desert places, to a mountain, ch. iii. 13; to the sea side, ch. iv. 1. This shews how expedient it was for us that Christ should go away, and send the Comforter; for his bodily presence could be but in one place at a time, and those that "came to him from every quarter" could not get near him, but by his spiritual presence, he is with his people wherever they are, and comes to them to every quarter.

CHAPTER II.

In this chapter we have, I. Christ healing a man that was sick of a palsy, ver. 1—12. II. His calling Matthew from the receipt of customs, and his eating upon that occasion with publicans and sinners, and justifying himself in so doing, ver. 13—17. III. His justifying his disciples in not fasting so much as those of the Pharisees did, ver. 18—22. IV. His justifying them in plucking the ears of corn on the sabbath day, ver. 23—28. All which passages we had before, Mat. xi. and xii.

AND again he entered into Capernaum, after some days; and it was noised that he was in the house. 2 And straightway many were gathered together, insomuch that there was no room to receive them, no, not so much as about the door: and he preached the word unto them. 3 And they come unto him, bringing one sick of the palsy, which was borne of four. 4 And when they could not come nigh unto him for the press, they uncovered the roof where he was: and when they had broken it up, they let down the bed wherein the sick of the palsy lay. 5 When Jesus saw their faith, he said unto the sick of the palsy, Son, thy sins be forgiven thee. 6 But there were certain of the scribes sitting there, and reasoning in their hearts, 7 Why doth this man thus speak blasphemies? who can forgive sins but God only? 8 And immediately when Jesus perceived in his spirit that they so reasoned within themselves, he said unto them, Why reason ye these things in your hearts? 9 Whether is it easier to say to the sick of the palsy, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Arise, and take up thy bed, and walk? 10 But that ye may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins; (he saith to the sick of the palsy,) 11 I say unto thee, Arise, and take up thy bed, and go thy way into thine house. 12 And immediately he arose, took up the bed, and went forth before them all; insomuch that they were all amazed, and glorified God, saying, We never saw it on this fashion.

Christ having been for some time preaching about in the country, here returns to Capernaum his head-quarters, and makes his appearance there, in hopes by this time the talk and crowd would be somewhat abated. Now observe,

First. The great resort there was to him. Though he was "in the house," either Peter's house, or some lodgings of his own which he had taken, yet people came to him as soon as it was noised that he was in town; they did not stay till he appeared in the synagogue, which they might be sure he would do on the sabbath day, but "straightway many were gathered together to him." Where the king is, there is the court; where Shiloh is, there "shall the gathering of the people be." In improving opportunities for our souls, we must take care not to lose time. One invited another, "Come, let us go see Jesus," so that his house could not contain his visitants. "There was no room to receive them," they were so numerous, "no, not so much as about the door." A blessed sight, to see people thus flying like a cloud to Christ's house, though it was but a poor one, and "as the doves to their windows."

Secondly. The good entertainment Christ gave them, the best his house would afford, and better than any other could, "he preached the word unto them," ver. 2. Many of them, perhaps, came only for cure, and many, perhaps, only for curiosity, to get a sight of him; but when he had them together he preached to them; though the synagogue door was open to him at proper times, he thought it not at all amiss to preach in a house on a week day, though some might reckon it both an improper place and an improper time. "Blessed are ye that sow beside all waters," Isa. xxxii. 20.

Thirdly. The presenting of a poor cripple to him to be helped by him. The patient was "one sick of the palsy," it should seem not as that, Mat. viii. 6, "grievously tormented," but perfectly disabled, so that he "was borne of four," was carried upon a bed, as if he had been upon a bier, by four persons; it was his misery that he needed to be so carried, and speaks the calamitous state of human life; it was their charity who did so carry him, and speaks the compassion that it is justly expected should be in the children of men towards their fellow-creatures in distress, because we know not how soon the distress may be our own. These kind relations or neighbours thought, if they could but carry a poor man once to Christ, they should not need to carry him any more; and therefore made hard shift to get him to him, and when they could not otherwise get to him, "they uncovered the roof where he was," ver. 4. I see no necessity to conclude, that Christ was preaching in an upper room, though in such the Jews that had stately houses had their oratories; for then to what purpose should the crowd stand before the door? as Wisdom's clients used to do, Pr. viii. 34; but I rather conjecture, that the house he was in was so little and mean (agreeable to his present state) that it had no upper room, but the ground floor was open to the roof, and these petitioners for the poor paralytic, resolving not to be balked, when they could not get through the crowd at the door, get their friend by some means or other to the roof of the house, took off some of the tiles, and so let him down upon his bed with cords, into the house where Christ was preaching. This spoke both their faith and their fervency in this address to Christ. Hereby it appeared they were in earnest, and would not go away, nor let Christ go without a blessing, Gen. xxxii. 26.

Fourthly. The kind word Christ said to this poor patient. "He saw their faith;" perhaps not so much his, for his distemper hindered him from the exercise of faith, but theirs that brought him. In curing the centurion's servant, Christ took notice of it as an instance of his faith, that he did not bring him to Christ, but believed he could cure him at a distance; he commended their faith, because they did bring their friend through so much difficulty. Note, True faith and strong faith may work variously, conquering sometimes the objections of reason, sometimes those of sense, but it shall be accepted and approved by Jesus Christ, however. Christ said, "Son, thy sins be forgiven thee." The appellation is very tender, "Son," intimating a fatherly care of him and concern for him; Christ owns true believers as his sons: a son, and yet sick of the palsy. Herein God deals with you as with sons. The cordial is words, "What thing is this? what new doctrine is this? for with authority commandeth he," &c. The Sinaitic MS. reads, "What is this? a new doctrine with authority? he commandeth even the unclean spirits," &c.

i. 29. Accompanied by James and John, our Lord entered the house of Simon and Andrew, from which we learn that they lived together.

i. 38. Dean Alford says, "Our Lord's present purpose was, not to remain in any one place, but to make the circuit of Galilee; not to work miracles, but to preach." The Syriac and Vulgate have "for for this am I come," instead of "for therefore came I forth."

i. 40. The words "and kneeling down to him" are not found in the Vatican and Cambridge MSS., but are well supported.

i. 42. The words "as soon as he had spoken" do not occur in the Sinaitic, Cambridge, and Vatican MSS., nor in the Syriac version.

i. 45. The reason why Jesus could not appear openly in the city very rich, "Thy sins be forgiven thee." Note, 1. Sin is the procuring cause of all our pains and sicknesses. This word of Christ was to take his thoughts off from the disease which was the effect, and to lead them to the sin the cause, that he might be more concerned about that, to get that pardoned. 2. God doth then graciously take away the sting and malignity of sickness when he forgives sin: recovery from sickness is then a mercy indeed, when way is made for it by the pardon of sin; see Isa. xxxviii. 17; Ps. ciii. 3. The way to remove the effect, is to take away the cause: pardon of sin strikes at the root of all diseases, and either cures them, or alters their property.

Fifthly, The cavil of the scribes at that which Christ said, and a demonstration of the unreasonableness of their cavil. They were expositors of the law, and their doctrine was true, that it is blasphemy for any creature to undertake the pardon of sin: it is God's prerogative, Isa. xliii. 25. But, as is usual with such teachers, their application was false, and was the effect of their ignorance and enmity to Christ. It is true, "none can forgive sins but God only;" but it is false, that therefore Christ cannot, who had abundantly proved himself to have a Divine power. But Christ "perceived in his spirit that they so reasoned within themselves;" this proves him to be God, and therefore confirmed what was to be proved, that he had authority to forgive sins; for he searched the heart, and knew what was in man, Rev. ii. 23. God's royalties are inseparable, and he that could know thoughts, could forgive sins. And this magnifies the grace of Christ, in pardoning sin, that he knew men's thoughts, and therefore knows more than any other can know, both of the sinfulness of their sins, and the particulars of them, and yet is ready to pardon. Now he proves his power to forgive sin, by demonstrating his power to cure the man sick of the palsy, ver. 9-11. He would not have pretended to do the one, if he could not have done the other. "That ye may know that the Son of man," the Messiah, "has power on earth to forgive sins," that I have that power, thou that art sick of the palsy, "arise, take up thy bed." Now, 1. This was a suitable argument in itself. He could not have cured the disease, which was the effect, if he could not have taken away the sin, which was the cause. And besides, his curing diseases was a figure of his pardoning sin, for sin is the disease of the soul; when it is pardoned, it is healed. He that could by a word accomplish the sign, could doubtless accomplish the thing signified. 2. It was suited to them. These carnal scribes would be more affected with such a sensible effect of a pardon, as the cure of the disease, and be sooner convinced by it, than by any other more spiritual consequences; therefore it was proper enough to appeal, "Whether is it easier, to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Arise, and walk?" The removing of the punishment as such, was the remitting of the sin; he that could go so far in the cure, no doubt could perfect it, see Isa. xxxiii. 24.

Sixthly, The cure of the sick man, and the impression it made upon the people, ver. 12. He not only arose out of his bed, perfectly well, but to shew that he had perfect strength restored to him, he "took up his bed," because it lay in the way, "and went forth before them all;" and "they were all amazed," as well they might, "and glorified God," as indeed they ought; "saying, We never saw it on this fashion;" never were such wonders as these done before in our time. Note, Christ's works were without precedent. When we see what he doth in healing souls, we must own we never saw the like.

13 And he went forth again by the sea side; and all the multitude resorted unto him, and he taught them. 14 And as he passed by, he saw Levi the son of Alphæus sitting at the receipt of custom, and said unto him, Follow me. And he arose and followed him. 15 And it came to pass, that, as Jesus sat at meat in his house, many publicans and sinners sat also together with Jesus and his disciples: for there were many, and they followed him. 16 And when the scribes and Pharisees saw him eat with publicans and sinners, they said unto his disciples, How is it that he eateth and drinketh with publicans and sinners? 17 When Jesus heard it, he saith unto them, They that are whole have no need of the physician, but they that are sick: I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance.

Here is, First, Christ's preaching "by the sea side," ver. 3, whither he went for room, because he found, upon second trial, no house or street large enough to contain his auditory; but upon the strand there might come as many as would. It should seem by this that our Lord Jesus Christ had a strong voice, and could and did speak loud; for "Wisdom crieth without, in the places of concourse." Wherever he goes, though it be to the sea side, "multitudes resort to him." Wherever the doctrine of Christ is faithfully preached, though it be driven into corners or into deserts, we must follow it.

Secondly, His calling Levi, the same with Matthew, who had a place in the custom house at Capernaum, from which he was denominated a publican; his place fixed him by the water side, and thither Christ went to meet with him, and to give him an effectual call. This Levi is here said to be son of Alphæus, or Cleophas, husband to that Mary, who was sister or near kinswoman to the Virgin Mary; and if so, he was own brother to James the Less, and Jude, and Simon the Canaanite, so that there were four brothers of them apostles. It is probable that Matthew was but a loose, extravagant young man, or else, being a Jew, he would never have been a publican. However, Christ called him to follow him. Paul, though a Pharisee, had been one of the chief of sinners, and yet was called to be an apostle. With God, through Christ, there is mercy to pardon the greatest sins, and grace to sanctify the greatest sinners. Matthew, that had been a publican, became an evangelist; the first that put pen to paper, and the fullest in writing the life of Christ. Great sin and scandal before conversion are no bar to great gifts, graces, and advancements after; nay, God may be the more glorified, Gal. i. 6. Christ prevented him with this call; in bodily cures ordinarily he was sought unto, but in these spiritual cures, he was found of them that sought him not. For this is the great evil and peril of the disease of sin, that those that are under it, desire not to be made whole.

Thirdly, His familiar converse with publicans and sinners, ver. 15. We are here told, 1. That Christ "sat at meat in Levi's house, who invited him and his disciples to the farewell feast, he made to his friends, when he left all to attend on Christ. Such a feast he made as Elisha did, 1 Kin. xix. 21, to shew not only with what cheerfulness in himself, but with what thankfulness to God, he quitted all in compliance with Christ's call. Fittingly did he make the day of his espousals to Christ a festival day. This was also to testify his respects to Christ, and the grateful sense he had of his kindness in snatching him from the receipt of custom, as a brand out of the burning. 2. That "many publicans and sinners" sat with Christ in Levi's house; "for there were many" belonging to that custom house, "and they followed him." They followed Levi, so some understand it, supposing that, like Zaccheus, he was chief among the publicans, and was rich; and for that reason, the inferior sort of them attended him for what they could get. I rather take it that they followed Jesus, because of the report they had heard of him. They did not for conscience-sake leave all to follow him, but for curiosity-sake they came to Levi's feast to see him; whatever brought them there, they were sitting with Jesus and his disciples. The publicans are here and elsewhere ranked with sinners, the worst of sinners; 1st. Because commonly they were such; so general were the corruptions in the execution of that office, oppressing, exacting, and taking bribes or fees to extortion, and accusing falsely, Lk. iii. 13-19. A faithful, fair-dealing publican was so rare, even at Rome, that one Sabinius, who kept a clean reputation in that office, was, after his death, honoured with this inscription, Kαλῶς τελευτῶσαντι,—"Here lies an honest publican." 2nd. Because the Jews had a particular antipathy to them and their office, as an affront to the liberty of their nation, and a badge of their slavery, and therefore put them into an ill name, and thought it scandalous to be seen in their company. Such as these our blessed Lord was pleased to converse with, when he appeared "in the likeness of sinful flesh."

Fourthly, The offence which the scribes and Pharisees took at this, ver. 16. They would not come to hear him preach, which they might have been convinced and edified by, but they would come themselves to see him sit with publicans and sinners, which they would be provoked by. They endeavoured to put the disciples out of conceit with their Master, as a man not of that sanctity and severe morals that became his character; and therefore put the question to them, "How is it that he eateth and drinketh with publicans and sinners?" Note, It is no new thing for that which is both well done, and well designed, to be misrepresented, and turned to the reproach of the wisest and best of men.

Fifthly, Christ's justification of himself in it, ver. 17. He stood to what he did, and would not withdraw, though the Pharisees were offended, as Peter afterwards did, Gal. ii. 12. Note, Those are too tender of their own good name who, to preserve it with some nice people, will decline a good work. Christ would not do so. They thought the publicans were to be hated. "No," saith Christ, "they are to be pitied; they are sick, and need a physician; they are sinners, and need a Saviour." They thought Christ's character should separate him from them: No, saith Christ, my commission directs me to them; "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance." If the world had been righteous, there had been no occasion for my coming, either to preach repentance, or to purchase remission. It is to a sinful world that I am sent; and therefore my business lies most with those that are the greatest sinners in it. Or thus: "I am not come to call the righteous,"—the proud Pharisees that think themselves righteous, that ask, wherein shall we return, Mat. iii. 7, of what shall we repent?—but poor publicans, that own themselves to be sinners, and are glad to be invited, and encouraged to repent. It is good dealing with those that there are hopes of; now there is "more hope of a fool," than of one that is "wise in his own conceit," Pr. xxvi. 12.

18 And the disciples of John and of the Pharisees used to fast: and they come and say unto him, Why do the disciples of John and of the Pharisees fast, but thy disciples fast not? 19 And Jesus said unto them, Can the children of the bridechamber fast, while the bridegroom is with them? as long as they have the bridegroom with them, they cannot fast. 20 But the days will come, when the bridegroom shall be taken away from them, and then shall they fast in those days. 21 No man also seweth a piece of new cloth on an old garment: else the new piece that filled it up taketh away from the old, and the rent is made worse. 22 And no man putteth new wine into old bottles: else the new wine doth burst the bottles, and the wine is spilled, and the bottles will be marred: but new wine must be put into new bottles. 23 And it came to pass, that he went through the corn fields on the sabbath day; and his disciples began, as they went, to pluck the ears of corn. 24 And the Pharisees said unto him, Behold, why do they on the sabbath day that which is not lawful? 25 And he said unto them, Have ye never read what David did, when he had need, and was an hungred, he, and they that were with him? 26 How he went into the house of God in the days of Abiathar the high priest, and did eat the shewbread, which is not lawful to eat but for the

was the inconvenience caused by the crowds which collected. That it was due to nothing more serious is clear, because when in the open country men came to him from every direction.

ii. 4. A knowledge of the structure of an Eastern house is needed in order to a correct understanding of this verse. The flat roof of such a house is much frequented, and would be easy of access. If the inner court was covered with an awning, it was only necessary to unfasten part of that in order to lower the sick man. If there was a trap-door in the roof, the breaking of that open would give access to the lower part of the house. If the roof was merely a covering of earth over reeds and rafters, it could have been easily and literally broken through. Either of these explanations is allowable, and, as Dr. Jamieson says, suffices to remove all appearance of the marvellous and the absurd from this part of the sacred story.

ii. 14. In the corresponding passage of St. Matthew the person here called "Levi the son of Alphæus" appears to be called simply priests, and gave also to them which were with him? 27 And he said unto them, The sabbath was made for man, and not man for the sabbath: 28 Therefore the Son of man is Lord also of the sabbath.

Christ had been put to justify himself in conversing with publicans and sinners; here he is put to justify his disciples; and in what they do, according to his will, he will justify them, and bear them out.

First, He justifies them in their not fasting, which was turned to their reproach by the Pharisees. "Why do the Pharisees and the disciples of John fast?" They used to fast; the Pharisees fasted twice in the week, Lu. xviii. 12; and probably the disciples of John did so too; and it should seem, this very day, when Christ and his disciples were feasting in Levi's house, was their fast day; for the word is νηστεύοντες, 'they do fast,' or 'are fasting,' which aggravated the offence. Thus apt are strict professors to make their own practice a standard, and to censure and condemn all that do not fully come up to it. They invidiously suggest, that if Christ went among sinners to do them good, as he had pleaded, yet the disciples went to indulge their appetites, for they never knew what it was to fast, or to deny themselves. Note, Ill-will always suspects the worst. Two things Christ pleads in excuse of his disciples' not fasting:

1. That these were easy days with them, and fasting was not so seasonable now as it would be hereafter, ver. 19, 20. There is a time for all things. Those that enter into the married state must expect care, and trouble in the flesh; and yet, during the nuptial solemnity, they are merry, and think it becomes them to be so; it was very absurd for Samson's bride to weep before him during the days that the feast lasted, Jud. xiv. 17. Christ and his disciples were but newly married; the bridegroom was yet with them; the nuptials were yet in the celebrating. Matthew's particularly; when the bridegroom should be removed from them to the far country about his business, then would be a proper time to sit as a widow, in solitude and fasting.

2. That these were early days with them, and they were not so able for the severe exercises of religion as hereafter they would be. The Pharisees had long accustomed themselves to such austerities; and John Baptist himself neither eating nor drinking, his disciples from the first inured themselves to hardships, and came the easier to bear strict and frequent fasting; but it was not so with Christ's disciples; their Master came eating and drinking, and had not bred them up to the difficult services of religion as yet, for it was all in good time. To put them upon such frequent fasting at first would be a discouragement to them, and perhaps drive them off from following Christ, would be of as ill consequence as putting new wine into old casks, or sewing new cloth to that which is worn thin and threadbare, ver. 21, 22. Note, God graciously considers the frame of young Christians, that are weak and tender, and so must we; nor must we expect more, but the work of the day in its day, and that day according to the strength, because it is not in our hands to give strength according to the day. Many contract an antipathy to some kind of food, otherwise good, by being surfeited with it when they are young; so many entertain prejudices against the exercises of devotion, by being burdened with them, and made to serve with an offering, at their setting out. Weak Christians must take heed of overtaking themselves, and of making the yoke of Christ otherwise than as it is, — easy, and sweet, and pleasant.

Secondly, He justifies them in plucking the ears of corn on the sabbath day, which, I will warrant you, a disciple of the Pharisees would not dare to have done, for it was contrary to an express tradition of their elders. In this instance, as in that before, they reflect upon the discipline of Christ's school, as if it were not so strict as that of theirs: so common is it for those that deny the power of godliness to be jealous for the form, and censorious of those who affect not their form. Observe,

1. What a poor breakfast Christ's disciples had on a sabbath day morning, when they were going to church, ver. 23; they plucked ears of corn, and that was the best they had. They were so intent upon spiritual dainties, that they forgot even their necessary food; and the word of Christ was to them instead of that; and their zeal for it even ate them up. The Jews made it a piece of religion to eat dainty food on sabbath days, but the disciples were content with any thing.

2. How even this was grudging them by the Pharisees, upon supposition that it was not lawful to pluck the ears of corn on the sabbath day, that that was as much a servile work as reaping, ver. 24: "Why do they on the sabbath day that which is not lawful?" Note, If Christ's disciples do that which is unlawful, Christ will be reflected upon and upbraided with it, as he was here, and dishonour will redound to his name. It is observable, that when the Pharisees thought Christ did amiss, they told the disciples, ver. 16; and now when they thought the disciples did amiss, they spoke to Christ: as make-bates, that did what they could to sow discord between Christ and his disciples, and make a breach in the family.

3. How Christ defended them in what they did.

1st. By example. They had a good precedent for it in David's eating the shewbread, when he was hungry; and there was no other bread to be had, ver. 25, 26. "Have ye never read?" Note, Many of our mistakes would be rectified, and our unjust censures of others corrected, if we would but recollect what we have read in the Scripture: appeals to that are most convincing. You have read that David, the man after God's own heart, "when he was hungry," made no difficulty of eating the shewbread, which, by the law, none might eat of but the priests and their families. Note, Ritual observances must give way to moral obligations; and that may be done in a case of necessity which otherwise may not be done. This, it is said, David did "in the days of Abiathar the high priest;" or, just before the days of Abiathar, who immediately succeeded Abimelech his father in the pontificate; and, it is probable, was at that time his father's deputy, or assistant in the office, and he it was that escaped the massacre, and brought the ephod to David.

2nd. By argument. To reconcile them to the disciples' plucking the ears of corn, let them consider,

First, Who the sabbath was made for, ver. 27. It "was made for man, and not man for the sabbath." This we had not in Matthew. The sabbath is a sacred and Divine institution, but we must receive and embrace it as a privilege and a benefit, not as a task and a drudgery. 1st. God never designed it to be an imposition upon us, and therefore we must not make it so to ourselves. "Man was not made for the sabbath," for he was made a day before the sabbath was instituted. Man was made for God, and for his honour and service, and he must rather die than deny him; but he "was not made for the sabbath," so as to be tied up by the law of it from that which is necessary to the support of life. 2nd. God did design it to be an advantage to us, and so we must make it, and improve it. He made it "for man." First, He had some regard to our bodies in the institution, that they might rest, and not be tired out with the constant business of the world, Dea. v. 14, "that thy manservant and thy maidservant may rest." Now he that intended the sabbath rest for the repose of our bodies, certainly never intended it should restrain us, in a case of necessity, from fetching in the necessary supports of the body; it must be construed so as not to contradict itself, for edification, and not for destruction. Secondly, He had much more regard to our souls: the sabbath was made a day of rest, only in order to its being a day of holy work, a day of communion with God, a day of praise and thanksgiving; and the rest from worldly business is therefore necessary that we may closely apply ourselves to this work, and spend the whole time in it, in public, private, and secret; but then time is allowed us for that which is necessary to the fitting of our bodies for the service of our souls in God's service, and the enabling of them to keep pace with them in that work. See here, 1. What a good master we serve, all whose institutions are for our own benefit, and if we be so wise as to observe them, we are wise for ourselves: it is not he, but we, that are gainers by our service. 2. What we should aim at in our sabbath work, even the good of our own souls. If the sabbath was made for man, we should then ask ourselves at night, What am I the better for this sabbath day? 3. What care we ought to take not to make those exercises of religion burthens to ourselves or others, which God ordained to be blessings; not only not by unreasonable strictness added to the command, but by not indulging those corruptions which are adverse to the command, for thereby we make those devout exercises a penance to ourselves, which otherwise would be a pleasure.

Secondly, Who the sabbath was made by, ver. 28: "The Son of man is Lord also of the sabbath;" and therefore he will not see the kind intentions of the institution frustrated by your impositions. Note, The sabbath days are "days of the Son of man;" he is the Lord of the day, and to his honour it must be observed. By him God made the worlds, and so it was by him that the sabbath was first instituted; by him God gave the law at mount Sinai, and so the fourth commandment was his law; and that little alteration that was shortly to be made by the shifting of it one day forward to the first day of the week, was to be in remembrance of his resurrection, and therefore the Christian sabbath was to be called the Lord's day, Rev. i. 10, the Lord Christ's day; and the Son of man, Christ as mediator, is always to be looked upon as Lord of the sabbath. This argument he largely insists upon in his own justification, when he was charged with having broken the sabbath, Jno. v. 16.

CHAPTER III.

In this chapter we have, I. Christ's healing the man that had a withered hand, on the sabbath day, and the combination of his enemies against him for it, ver. 1—6. II. The universal resort of people to him from all parts to be healed, and the relief they all found with him, ver. 7—12. III. His ordaining his twelve apostles to be attendants on him, and the preachers of his Gospel, ver. 13—21. IV. His answer to the blasphemous cavil of the scribes, who imputed his power to cast out devils to a confederacy with the prince of the devils, ver. 22—30. V. His owning his disciples for his nearest and dearest relations, ver. 31—35.

AND he entered again into the synagogue; and there was a man there which had a withered hand. 2 And they watched him, whether he would heal him on the sabbath day; that they might accuse him. 3 And he saith unto the man which had the withered hand, Stand forth.

4 And he saith unto them, Is it lawful to do good on the sabbath days, or to do evil? to save life, or to kill? But they held their peace. 5 And when he had looked round about on them with anger, being grieved for the hardness of their hearts, he saith unto the man, Stretch forth thine hand. And he stretched it out: and his hand was restored whole as the other. 6 And the Pharisees went forth, and straightway took counsel with the Herodians against him, how they might destroy him. 7 But Jesus withdrew himself with his disciples to the sea: and a great multitude from Galilee followed him, and from Judæa, 8 And from Jerusalem, and from Idumæa, and from beyond Jordan; and they about Tyre and Sidon, a great multitude, when they had heard what great things he did, came unto him. 9 And he spake to his disciples, that a small ship should wait on him because of the multitude, lest they should throng him. 10 For he had healed many; insomuch that they pressed upon him for to touch him, as many as had plagues. 11 And unclean spirits, when they saw him, fell down before

Matthew. By Luke he is called Levi. Since the name of Levi does not occur in the formal lists of the apostles, it has often been doubted whether this Levi is the same as Matthew. It is, however, next to impossible to see how different men can be meant in Matt. ix. 9, Mark ii. 14, and Luke v. 27. Here only is Levi, or Matthew, called "the son of Alphaeus," but we may infer from it that he was the brother of James and Judas, or Jude, all three being apostles. For this point compare the list of apostles in Luke vi. 14—16.

ii. 17. The words "to repentance" are found in some good copies, but the balance of ancient evidence is against retaining them.

ii. 18. A better reading of the first clause is, "And the disciples of John and the Pharisees were fasting," i.e., probably at that particular time. The reading of the second clause, according to our best authorities, runs thus: "Why do the disciples of John and the disciples of the Pharisees," &c.

ii. 22. This whole verse may be rendered on the best authorities, him, and cried, saying, Thou art the Son of God. 12 And he straitly charged them that they should not make him known.

Here, as before, we have our Lord Jesus busy at work, in the synagogue first, and then by the sea side, to teach us that his presence should not be confined either to the one or to the other; but wherever any are gathered together in his name, whether in the synagogue, or any where else, there is he in the midst of them. In every place where he records his name, he will meet his people and bless them: it is his will that men pray every where. Now here we have some account of what he did.

First, When "he entered again into the synagogue," he improved the opportunity he had there of doing good, and having no doubt preached a sermon there, he wrought a miracle for the confirmation of it, or at least for the confirmation of this truth, that "it is lawful to do good on the sabbath day." We had the story, Mat. xii. 9.

1. The patient's case was piteous: he "had a withered hand," by which he was disabled to work for his living, and those that are so are the most proper objects of charity; let those be helped that cannot help themselves.

2. The spectators were very unkind both to the patient and to the physician, who instead of interceding for a poor neighbour, did what they could to hinder his cure; for they intimated, that if Christ cured him now on the sabbath day, they would accuse him as a sabbath breaker. It had been very unreasonable if they should have opposed a physician or surgeon in helping any poor body in misery by ordinary methods; but much more absurd was it to oppose him that cured without any labour, but by a word's speaking.

3. Christ dealt very fairly with the spectators, and dealt with them first, if possible to prevent the offence. 1st. He laboured to convince their judgment: he bade the man "stand forth," ver. 3, that by the sight of him they might be moved with compassion towards him, and might not for shame account his cure a crime: and then he appeals to their own consciences; though the thing speaks itself, yet he is pleased to speak it, "Is it lawful to do good on the sabbath days," as I design to do, "or to do evil," as you design to do? Whether is it better "to save life or to kill?" What fairer question could he put? And yet because they saw it would turn against them, "they held their peace." Note, Those are obstinate indeed in their infidelity, who when they can say nothing against a truth, will say nothing to it; and when they cannot resist, say will not yield.

2nd. When they rebelled against the light he lamented their stubbornness, ver. 5: "He looked round about on them with anger, being grieved for the hardness of their hearts." The sin he had an eye to was, the hardness of their hearts; their insensibleness of the evidence of his miracles, and their inflexible resolution to persist in unbelief. We hear what is said amiss, and see what is done amiss, but Christ looks at the root of bitterness in the heart; the blindness and hardness of that. Observe, First. How he was provoked by the sin. He looked "round upon them," for they were so many, and had so placed themselves, that they surrounded him. And he "looked with anger;" it is likely his anger appeared in his countenance; his anger was like God's, without the least perturbation to himself, but without great provocation from us. Note, The sin of sinners is very displeasing to Jesus Christ; and the way to be angry and not to sin, is to be angry, as Christ was, at nothing but sin. Let hardhearted sinners tremble to think of the anger with which he will look round upon them shortly, when the great day of his wrath comes. Secondly, How he pitied the sinners: he was "grieved for the hardness of their hearts;" as God was grieved forty years for the hardness of the hearts of their fathers in the wilderness. Note, It is a great grief to our Lord Jesus to see sinners bent upon their own ruin, and obstinately set against the methods of their good vocation and recovery, for he would not that any should perish. This is a good reason why the hardness of our own hearts, and of the hearts of others should be a grief to us.

4. Christ dealt very kindly with the patient: he bid him stretch forth his hand, and it was immediately restored. Now, 1st. Christ has hereby taught us to go on with resolution in the way of our duty, how violent soever the opposition is that we meet with in it. We must deny ourselves sometimes in our ease, pleasure, and convenience, rather than give offence even to those who causelessly take it, but we must not deny ourselves the satisfaction of serving God and doing good, though offence may unjustly be taken at it. None could be more tender of giving offence than Christ; yet, rather than send this poor man away uncured, he would venture offering all the scribes and Pharisees that compassed him about. 2nd. He hath hereby given us a specimen of the cures wrought by his grace upon poor souls; our hands are spiritually withered; the powers of our souls weakened by sin, and disabled for that which is good. The great healing day is the sabbath, and the healing place the synagogue; the healing power is that of Christ. The gospel command is like this here; and the command as rational and just as this; though our hands are withered, and we cannot of ourselves stretch them forth, we must attempt it, must as well as we can lift them up to God in prayer, lay hold on Christ and eternal life, and employ them in good works; and if we do our endeavour, power goes along with the word of Christ, he effects the cure. Though our hands be withered, yet if we will not offer to stretch them out, it is our own fault that we are not healed; but if we do and are healed, Christ, and his power and grace, must have all the glory.

5. The enemies of Christ dealt very barbarously with him. Such a work of mercy should have engaged their love to him, and such a work of wonder their faith in him. But instead of that, the Pharisees, that pretended to be oracles in the church, and the Herodians, that pretended to be the supporters of the state, though of opposite interests one to another, yet "took counsel together against him, how they might destroy him." Note, They that suffer for doing good, do but suffer as their Master did.

Secondly, When he withdrew to the sea, he did good there. Whilst his enemies sought to destroy him, he quitted the place, to teach us in troublous times to shift for our own safety; but see here,

1. How he was followed into his retirement. When some had such an enmity to him, that they drove him out of their country, others had such a value for him, that they followed him wherever he went; and the enmity of their leaders to Christ did not cool their respects to him. Great multitudes followed him from all parts of the nation; as far north as from Galilee; as far south as from Judæa and Jerusalem; nay, and from Idumæa; as far east as from beyond Jordan; and west, as from about Tyre and Sidon, ver. 7, 8. Observe, 1st. What induced them to follow him: it was the report they had of the "great things he did" for all that applied themselves to him; some wished to see one that had done such great things, and others hoped he would do great things for them. Note, The consideration of the great things Christ has done, should engage us to come to him. 2nd. What they followed him for, ver. 10: "They pressed upon him for to touch him, as many as had plagues." Diseases are here called "plagues," μαστιγαι,—"corrections, chastisements." So they are designed to be, to make us smart for our sins, that thereby we may be made sorry for them, and may be warned not to return to them. Those that were under these scourgings came to Jesus; this is the errand on which sickness is sent, to quicken us to inquire after Christ, and apply ourselves to him as our physician. "They pressed upon him," each striving which should get nearest him, and which should be first served. They "fell down before him;" so Dr. Hammond, as petitioners for his favour; they desired leave but to touch him, having faith to be healed not only by his touching them, but by their touching him; which no doubt they had many instances of. 3rd. What provision he made to be ready to attend them; ver. 9, he "spoke to his disciples," who were fishermen, and had fisher boats at command, that a small ship should constantly wait on him, to carry him from place to place on the same coast, that when he had despatched the necessary business he had to do in one place, he might easily remove to another, where his presence was requisite, without pressing through the crowds of people that followed him from curiosity. Wise men, as much as they can, decline a crowd.

2. What abundance of good he did in his retirement; he did not withdraw to be idle, nor did he send back those who rudely crowded after him when he withdrew, but took it kindly, and gave them what they came for; for he never said to any that sought him diligently, "seek ye me" in vain. 1st. Diseases were effectually cured. He "healed many;" divers sorts of patients, ill of divers sorts of diseases, though numerous, though various, he healed them. 2nd. Devils were effectually conquered. Those whom unclean spirits had got possession of, "when they saw him," trembled at his presence, and they also "fell down before him," not to supplicate his favour, but to deprecate his wrath, and by their own terrors were compelled to own that "he was the Son of God," ver. 11. It is sad that this great truth should be denied by any of the children of men, who may have the benefit of it, when a confession of it has so often been extorted from devils, who are excluded from having benefit by it. 3rd. Christ sought not applause to himself in doing those great things, for "he straitly charged" those for whom he did them, "that they should not make him known," ver. 12; that they should not be industrious to spread the notice of his cures, as it were by advertisements in the newspapers, but let them leave his own works to praise him; and let the report of them diffuse itself, and make its own way. Let not those that were cured be forward to divulge it, lest it should feed their pride, who were so highly favoured, but let the standers by carry away the intelligence of it. When we do that which is praiseworthy, and yet covet not to be praised of men for it, then "the same mind is in us which was in Christ Jesus."

13 And he goeth up into a mountain, and calleth unto him whom he would: and they came unto him.

14 And he ordained twelve, that they should be with him, and that he might send them forth to preach,

15 And to have power to heal sicknesses, and to cast out devils: 16 And Simon he surnamed Peter;

17 And James the son of Zebedee, and John the brother of James; and he surnamed them Boanerges, which is, The sons of thunder: 18 And Andrew, and Philip, and Bartholomew, and Matthew, and Thomas, and James the son of Alphæus, and Thaddæus, and Simon the Canaanite, 19 And Judas Iscariot, which also betrayed him: and they went into an house. 20 And the multitude cometh together again, so that they could not so much as eat bread. 21 And when his friends heard of it, they went out to lay hold on him: for they said, He is beside himself.

In these verses we have,

First, The choice Christ made of the twelve apostles to be his constant followers and attendants, and to be sent abroad as there was occasion, to preach the Gospel. Observe,

1. The introduction to this call or promotion of disciples: "He goes up into a mountain," and his errand thither was to pray. Ministers must be set apart with solemn prayer, for the pouring out of the Spirit upon them; though Christ had authority to confer the gifts of the Holy Ghost, yet to set us an example, he prayed for them.

2. The rule he went by in his choice, and that was his own good pleasure: "He called unto him whom he would." Not such as we would have thought fittest to be called, looking upon the countenance and height of the stature; but such as he thought fit to call, and determined to make fit for the service to which he called them: even so, blessed Jesus, because it seemed good in thine eyes. Christ calls whom he will, for he is a free agent, and his grace is his own.

3. The efficacy of the call. He called them to separate themselves from the crowd, and stand by him, "and they came unto him;" Christ calls those who were given him, Jno. xvii. 6; and all that the Father gave him, shall come to him, Jno. vi. 37. Those whom it was his will to call, he made willing to come; his "people shall be willing in the day of his power." Perhaps they came to him readily enough, because they were in expectation of reigning with him in temporal pomp and power, but when afterwards they were undeceived in that matter, yet they had such a prospect given them of better things, that they would not say they were deceived in their Master, or repented their leaving all to be with him.

4. The end and intention of this call: he ordained them (probably by the imposition of hands, which was a ceremony used among the Jews,) "that they should be with him" constantly, to be witnesses of his doctrine, manner of life, and patience, that they might fully know it, and be able to give an account of it; and especially that they might attest the truth of his miracles; they must be with him, to receive instructions from him, that they might be qualified to give instruction to others. It would require time to fit them for that which he designed them for; for they must be sent forth to preach: not to preach till

"And no man putteth new wine into old bottles; else the wine doth burst the bottles; and the wine and the bottles perish." The words "but new wine must be put into new bottles" may be omitted altogether.

ii. 26. In some MSS. the words "in the days of Abiathar the high-priest" are omitted, perhaps to get rid of the difficulty that Ahimelech was high-priest at the time referred to (1 Sam. xxi. 1). There is some uncertainty in the Old Testament itself, Ahimelech being at one time called a son of Abiathar (2 Sam. viii. 17), and elsewhere said to have had a son called Abiathar (1 Sam. xxii. 20). We cannot offer a solution which satisfies us, but it is apparent that an error has crept into the text, and that this error must have arisen at an early date.

iii. 6. We have no distinct account of the Herodians, but it is probable that they were a party who supported the claims of the Herodian family. It is less likely that they were, as some have

They were sent, and not to be sent, till by a long and intimate acquaintance with Christ, they were fitted. Note, Christ's ministers must be much with him.

5. The power he gave them to work miracles; and hereby he put a very great honour upon them, beyond that of the great men of the earth. He ordained them "to heal sicknesses, and to cast out devils." This shewed that the power which Christ had to work these miracles was an original power; that he had it not as a servant, but as a Son in his own house, in that he could confer it upon others and invest them with it. They have a rule in the law, Deputatus non potest deputare,—"he that is only deputed himself, cannot depute another;" but our Lord Jesus had life in himself, and the Spirit without measure, for he could give this power even to the weak and foolish things of the world.

6. Their number and names: "he ordained twelve," according to the number of the twelve tribes of Israel. They are here named, not just in the same order as they were in Matthæo, nor by couples as they were there; but as there, so here, Peter is put first, and Judas last. Here Matthew is put before Thomas, it is likely, being called in that order, but in that catalogue which Matthew himself drew up, he puts himself after Thomas; so far was he from insisting upon the precedence of his consecration. But that which Mark only takes notice of in this list of the apostles is, that Christ called James and John, Boanerges, which is, "the sons of thunder;" perhaps they were remarkable for a loud, commanding voice, they were thundering preachers; or rather, it notes the zeal and fervency of their spirits, which would make them active for God above their brethren. These two (saith Dr. Hammond) were to be special, eminent ministers of the Gospel, which is called a voice shaking the earth, Heb. xii. 26; yet John, one of those sons of thunder, was full of love and tenderness, as appears by his epistles, and was the beloved disciple.

7. Their retirement with their Master, and close adherence to him, "they went into an house." Now this jury was empanelled, they stood together to hearken to their evidence. They went together into the house to settle the orders of their infant college, and now it is likely the bag was given to Judas, which pleased him, and made him easy.

Secondly. The continual crowds that attended Christ's motions, ver. 20. "The multitude cometh together again," unsent for, and unseasonably pressing upon him, some with one errand, and some with another; so that he and his disciples could not get time "so much as to eat bread," much less for a set and full meal. Yet he did not shut his doors against the petitioners, but bid them welcome, and gave to each of them an answer of peace. Note, They whose hearts are enlarged in the work of God, can easily bear with great inconveniences to themselves in the prosecution of it, and will rather lose a meal's meat at any time, than let slip an opportunity of doing good. It is happy when zealous hearers and zealous preachers thus meet, and encourage one another. Now the kingdom of God was preached, and men pressed into it, Lu. xvi. 16, this was a gale of opportunity well improving, and the disciples might well afford to adjourn their meals to lay hold on it. It is good striking while the iron is hot.

Thirdly. The care of his relations concerning him, ver. 21. "When his friends" in Capernaum heard how he was followed, and what pains he took, "they went out to lay hold on him," and fetch him home, "for they said, He is beside himself."

1. Some understand it of an absurd, preposterous care, which had more in it of reproach to him, than of respect; and so we must take it as we read it, "he is beside himself;" either they suspected it themselves, or it was suggested to them, and they gave credit to the suggestion, that he was gone distracted, and therefore his friends ought to bind him, and put him in a dark room, to bring him to his right mind again. His kindred, many of them, had mean thoughts of him, Jno. vi. 4; vii. 5, and were willing to hearken to this ill construction which some put upon his great zeal, and to conclude him crazed in his intellects, and under that pretence, to take him off from his work. The prophets were called mad fellows, 2 Kin. ix. 11.

2. Others understand it of a well meaning care, and then they read ἐξουστῶν, "he fainteth;" he has no time to eat bread, and therefore his strength will fail him; he will be stifled with the crowd of people, and will have his spirits quite exhausted with constant speaking, and the virtue that goes out of him in his miracles; and therefore let us use a friendly violence with him, and get him a little breathing time. In his preaching work, as well as his suffering work, he was attacked with, "Master, spare thyself." Note, They who go on with vigour and zeal in the work of God, must expect to meet with hindrances, both from the groundless disaffection of their enemies, and the mistaken affection of their friends, and they have need to stand upon their guard against both.

22 And the scribes which came down from Jerusalem said, He hath Beelzebub, and by the prince of the devils casteth he out devils. 23 And he called them unto him, and said unto them in parables, How can Satan cast out Satan? 24 And if a kingdom be divided against itself, that kingdom cannot stand. 25 And if a house be divided against itself, that house cannot stand. 26 And if Satan rise up against himself, and be divided, he cannot stand, but hath an end. 27 No man can enter into a strong man's house, and spoil his goods, except he will first bind the strong man; and then he will spoil his house. 28 Verily I say unto you, All sins shall be forgiven unto the sons of men, and blasphemies wherewith soever they shall blaspheme: 29 But he that shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost hath never forgiveness, but is in danger of eternal damnation: 30 Because they said, He hath an unclean spirit.

Here is, 1. The impudent, impious brand which the scribes fastened upon Christ's casting out devils, that they might evade and invalidate the conviction of it and have a poor excuse for not yielding to it. These "scribes came down from Jerusalem," ver. 22: it should seem they came this long journey on purpose to hinder the progress of the doctrine of Christ. Such pains did they take to do mischief, and coming from Jerusalem, where were the most polite and learned scribes, and where they had opportunity of consulting together "against the Lord and his anointed," they were in the greater capacity to do mischief. The reputation of scribes from Jerusalem would have an influence not only upon the country people, but upon the country scribes. They had never thought of this base suggestion concerning Christ's miracles, till the scribes from Jerusalem put it in their heads. They could not deny but that he cast out devils, which plainly spoke him sent of God, but they insinuated he had Beelzebub on his side, was in league with him, and by the prince of devils cast out devils. "There is a trick in the case: Satan is not cast out, he only goes out by consent." There was nothing in the manner of Christ's casting out devils that gave any cause to suspect this; he did it as one having authority; but so they will have it who resolve not to believe him.

II. The rational answer which Christ gave to this objection, demonstrating the absurdity of it.

First. Satan is so subtle that he will never voluntarily quit his possession. "If Satan cast out Satan, his kingdom is divided against itself, and it cannot stand," ver. 23-25. He "called them to him," as one desirous they should be convinced; he treats them with all the freedom, friendliness, and familiarity that could be; he vouchsafes to reason the case with them, "that every mouth may be stopped." It was plain that the doctrine of Christ made war upon the devil's kingdom, and had a direct tendency to break his power, and crush his interest in the souls of men; and it was as plain that the casting of him out of the bodies of people confirmed that doctrine, and gave it the setting on; and therefore it cannot be imagined that he should come into such a design: every one knows Satan is no fool, nor will act so directly against his own interest.

Secondly. Christ is so wise, that being engaged in a war with him, he will attack his forces wherever he meets them, whether in the bodies or souls of people, ver. 27. It is plain Christ's design is to "enter into the strong man's house," to take possession of the interest he has in the world, and to "spoil his goods," and convert them to his own service; and therefore it is natural to suppose that he will thus "bind the strong man,"—will forbid him to speak when he would, and to stay where he would, and thus show that he has gained a victory over him.

III. The awful warning Christ gave them to take heed how they spoke such dangerous words as these; however they might make light of them, as only conjectures and the language of free thinking, if they persisted in it, it would be of fatal consequence to them; it would be found a sin against the last remedy, and consequently unpardonable: for what could be imagined possible to bring them to repentance for their sin in blaspheming Christ, that would set aside such a strong conviction with such a weak evasion? It is true, the Gospel promiseth, because Christ hath purchased forgiveness for the greatest sins and sinners, ver. 28; those who reviled Christ on the cross, which was a blaspheming of the Son of man, aggravated to the highest degree, yet many of them found mercy, and Christ himself prayed, "Father, forgive them;" but this was blaspheming the Holy Ghost; for it was by the Holy Spirit that he cast out devils, and they said it was by the unclean spirit, ver. 30. And by this method they would outface the conviction of all the gifts of the Holy Ghost after Christ's ascension, and defeat them all, after which there remained no more proof, and therefore they should never have forgiveness, but were liable to eternal damnation. They were in imminent danger of that everlasting punishment, from which there was no redemption, and in which there was no intermission,—no remission.

31 There came then his brethren and his mother, and, standing without, sent unto him, calling him. 32 And the multitude sat about him, and they said unto him, Behold, thy mother and thy brethren without seek for thee. 33 And he answered them, saying, Who is my mother, or my brethren? 34 And he looked round about on them which sat about him, and said, Behold my mother and my brethren! 35 For whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, and my sister, and mother.

Here is, I. The disrespect which Christ's "kindred according to the flesh" shewed to him when he was preaching (and they knew very well that he was then in his element); they not only stood without, having no desire to come in and hear him, but they sent in a message to call him out to them, ver. 31, 32; as if he must leave his work to hearken to their importunities. It is likely they had no business with him, only sent for him on purpose to oblige him to break off, lest he should kill himself. He knew how far his strength would go, and preferred the salvation of souls before his own life, and soon after made it appear with a witness. It was therefore an idle thing for them, under pretence of his sparing himself, to interrupt him; and it was worse, if they really had business with him, when they knew he preferred his business as a Saviour so much before any other business.

II. The respect which Christ shewed to his spiritual kindred upon this occasion. Now, as at other times, he put a comparative neglect upon his mother, which seemed purposely designed to obviate and prevent the extravagant respect which men in after times would be apt to pay her. Our respects ought to be guided and governed by Christ's. Now the Virgin Mary, or Christ's mother, is not equalled with, but postponed to, ordinary believers, on whom Christ here puts a superlative honour. He looked upon those who sat about him, and pronounced those of them that not only heard but did the will of God to be to him as his brother and sister and mother; as much esteemed, loved, and cared for as his nearest relations, ver. 33-35. This is a good reason why we should honour those that fear the Lord, and choose them for our people; why we should be not hearers of the word only, but doers of the work, that we may share with the saints in this honour. Surely it is good to be akin to those who are thus nearly allied to Christ, and to have fellowship with those that have fellowship with Christ; and woe to those who hate and persecute Christ's kindred, that are his bone and his flesh, every one resembling the children of a king. See Jud. viii. 18, 19, for he will with jealousy plead their cause, and avenge their blood.

thought, fanatics who regarded Herod as the Messiah. At a later period mention is made of a sect called Herodians, but their origin and tenets are altogether obscure.

iii. 7, 8. The enumeration of places from which men came to Jesus is not found in the other Gospels. Idumea or Edom was the cradle of the Herodian family. In the time of Christ it formed a small kingdom, which the Romans called Arabia Petrea, and which they finally subdued in A.D. 105. Under the Roman occupation it became again important, as is apparent from history and existing ruins.

iii. 15. The words "to heal sicknesses, and" are omitted by the Vatican and Sinaitic MSS., and by some editors, as Tregelles and Tischendorf.

iii. 18. Here, for "Simon the Canaanite" the Greek reads, "Simon the Cananean." The word is Syriac, and means the same as Zelotes, or enthusiastic.

CHAPTER IV.

In this chapter we have, I. The parable of the seed, and the four sorts of ground, ver. 1-9; with the exposition of it, ver. 10-20: and the application of it, ver. 21-25. II. The parable of the seed growing gradually, but insensibly, 26-29. III. The parable of the grain of mustard seed, and a general account of Christ's parables, ver. 30-34. IV. The miracle of Christ's sudden stilling a storm at sea, ver. 35-41.

AND he began again to teach by the sea side: and there was gathered unto him a great multitude, so that he entered into a ship, and sat in the sea; and the whole multitude was by the sea on the land. 2 And he taught them many things by parables, and said unto them in his doctrine, 3 Hearken; Behold, there went out a sower to sow: 4 And it came to pass, as he sowed, some fell by the way side, and the fowls of the air came and devoured it up. 5 And some fell on stony ground, where it had not much earth; and immediately it sprang up, because it had no depth of earth: 6 But when the sun was up, it was scorched; and because it had no root, it withered away. 7 And some fell among thorns, and the thorns grew up, and choked it, and it yielded no fruit. 8 And other fell on good ground, and did yield fruit that sprang up and increased; and brought forth, some thirty, and some sixty, and some an hundred. 9 And he said unto them, He that hath ears to hear, let him hear. 10 And when he was alone, they that were about him with the twelve asked of him the parable. 11 And he said unto them, Unto you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of God: but unto them that are without, all these things are done in parables: 12 That seeing they may see, and not perceive; and hearing they may hear, and not understand; lest at any time they should be converted, and their sins should be forgiven them. 13 And he said unto them, Know ye not this parable? and how then will ye know all parables? 14 The sower soweth the word. 15 And these are they by the way side, where the word is sown; but when they have heard, Satan cometh immediately, and taketh away the word that was sown in their hearts. 16 And these are they likewise which are sown on stony ground; who, when they have heard the word, immediately receive it with gladness; 17 And have no root in themselves, and so endure but for a time: afterward, when affliction or persecution ariseth for the word's sake, immediately they are offended. 18 And these are they which are sown among thorns; such as hear the word, 19 And the cares of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, and the lusts of other things entering in, choke the word, and it becometh unfruitful. 20 And these are they which are sown on good ground; such as hear the word, and receive it,

The foregoing chapter began with Christ's entering "again into the synagogue," ver. 1, this chapter begins with Christ's teaching again "by the sea side." Thus he changed his method, that, if possible, all might be reached and wrought upon. To gratify the nice and more genteel sort of people that had seats, "chief seats in the synagogue," and did not care for hearing a sermon any where else, he did not preach always by the sea side, but having liberty went often into the synagogue, and taught there; yet to gratify the poor, the mob, that could not get room in the synagogue, he did not always preach there, but "began again to teach by the sea side," where they could come within hearing. Thus are we "debtors both to the wise and to the unwise," Rom. i. 14.

Here seems to be a new convenience found out, which had not been used before, though he had before preached by the sea side, ch. ii. 13, and that was his standing in a ship, while his hearers stood upon the land; and that inland sea of Tiberias having no tide, there was no ebbing and flowing of the waters to disturb them. Methinks Christ's carrying his doctrine into a ship, and preaching it thence, was a presage of his sending of the Gospel to the isles of the Gentiles, and the shipping off of the kingdom of God (that rich cargo) from the Jewish nation, to be sent to a people that would bring forth more of the fruits of it. Now observe here,

I. The way of teaching that Christ used with the multitude: ver. 2. "He taught them many things," but it was "by parables," or similitudes, which would tempt them to hear, for people love to be spoken to in their own language, and careless hearers will catch at a plain comparison, borrowed from common things, and will retain and repeat that, when they have lost, and perhaps never took, the truth which it was designed to explain and illustrate. But unless they would take pains to search into it, it would but amuse them, seeing they would see and not perceive, ver. 12, and so while it gratified their curiosity, it was the punishment of their stupidity; they wilfully shut their eyes against the light, and therefore justly did Christ put it into the dark-lantern of a parable, which had a bright side towards those who applied it to themselves, and were willing to be guided by it; but to those who were only willing for a season to play with it, it only gave a flash of light now and then, but sent them away in the dark. It is just with God to say of those that will not see, that they shall not see; and to hide from their eyes who only look about them with a great deal of carelessness, and never look before them with any concern upon the things that belong to their peace.

II. The way of expounding that he used with his disciples. "When he was alone," by himself, not only the twelve, but others "that were about him with the twelve," took the opportunity to ask him the meaning of the parables, ver. 10. They found it good to be about Christ; the nearer him the better; good to be with the twelve, to be conversant with those that are intimate with him. And he told them what a distinguishing favour it was to them, that they were made acquainted with "the mystery of the kingdom of God," ver. 11. "The secret of the Lord" was with them; that instructed them which others were only amused with; and they were made to increase in knowledge by every parable, and understood more of the way and method in which Christ designed to set up his kingdom in the world, while others were dismissed never the wiser. Note, Those who know "the mystery of the kingdom of heaven" must acknowledge that it is given to them; they receive both the light and the sight from Jesus Christ, who, after his resurrection, both opened the Scriptures, and opened the understanding, Lu. xxiv. 27-45. In particular, we have here,

First. The parable of the sower, as we had it, Mat. xiii. 3, &c. He begins (ver. 3) with "Hearken," and concludes (ver. 9) with "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear." Note, The words of Christ demand attention, and those who speak from him may command it, and should stir it up; even that which as yet we do not thoroughly understand, or not rightly, yet we must carefully attend to it, believing it to be both intelligible and weighty, that at length we may understand it; we shall find more in Christ's sayings than at first there seemed to be.

Secondly. The exposition of it to the disciples. Here is a question Christ put to them before he expounded it, which we had not in Matthew; ver. 13. "Know ye not this parable?" know ye not the meaning of it? "How then will ye know all parables?" 1. If ye know not this, which is so plain, how will you understand other parables that will be more dark and obscure? If you are gruelled and run aground with this, which speaks so plainly the different success of the word preached upon those that hear it, which you yourselves may see easily, how will you understand the parables which hereafter will speak of the rejection of the Jews, and the calling of the Gentiles, which is a thing you have yet no idea of? Note, This should quicken us both to prayer and pains, that we may get knowledge; that there are a great many things we are concerned to know, and if we understand not the plain truths of the Gospel, how shall we master those that are more difficult? Vita brevis, ars longa.—life is short, art is long. "If we have run with the footmen, and they have wearied us," and run us down, then "how shall we contend with horses?" Jer. xii. 5. 2. If you know not this, which is intended for your direction in hearing the word, that ye may profit by it, how shall ye profit by what ye are farther to hear? This parable is to teach you to be attentive to the word, and affected with it, that you may understand it. If you receive not this, you will not know how to use the key by which you must be let into all the rest. If we understand not the rules we are to observe in order to our profiting by the word, how shall we profit by any other rules? Observe, Before Christ expounds the parable, 1st. He shews them how sad their case was who were not let into the meaning of the doctrine of Christ: "To you it is given, but not to them." Note, It will help us to put a value upon the privileges we enjoy as disciples of Christ, to consider the deplorable state of those who want such privileges, especially that they are out of the ordinary way of conversion, "lest they should be converted, and their sins should be forgiven them," ver. 12. Those only who are converted have their sins forgiven them; and it is the misery of unconverted souls that they lie under unpardonable guilt. 2nd. He shews them what a shame it was that they needed such particular explanations of the word they heard, and did not apprehend it at first. Those that would improve in knowledge must be made sensible of their ignorance.

Having thus prepared them for it, he gives them the reddition of the parable of the sower, as we had it before in Matthew. Let us only observe here,

First. That in the great field of the church the word of God is dispensed to all promiscuously. "The sower soweth the word," ver. 14; sows it at a venture, "beside all waters," upon all sorts of ground, Isa. xxii. 20; not knowing where it will light, or what fruit it will bring forth. He scatters it in order to the increase of it. Christ was a while sowing himself, when he went about teaching and preaching; now he sends his ministers, and sows by their hand: ministers are sowers; they have need of the skill and discretion of the husbandmen, Isa. xxviii. 24-26. They must not observe winds and clouds, Ecc. xi. 4-6, and must look up to God, who gives seed to the sower, 2 Cor. ix. 10.

iii. 29. Instead of the common reading and rendering, modern editors generally read and translate "is guilty of eternal sin." Beza observes that this reading, "eternal sin," occurs in Cyprian, and explains "never to be blotted out." The same reading is found in the Vatican and Sinaitic MSS., and in the Latin Vulgate. Kuinoel thinks sin is here put for the punishment of sin, and notes that the word punishment, or chastisement, is actually put for it in some copies. Beza's idea seems most correct.

iii. 32. After the word "brethren" some copies of importance add "and thy sisters." This reading, which is favoured by Scholtz, Lachmann, Tischendorf, and Alford, occurs in the Alexandrian, Cambridge, and other MSS., and in some ancient versions.

iv. 1. "The sea-side" is the shore of the sea of Galilee. The ship was no doubt one of the fishing-boats then floating on the lake.

iv. 3. In his "New Testament for English Readers" Alford very properly suggests the rendering, "Behold, the sower went out to sow."

Secondly. That of the many that hear the word of the Gospel, and read it, and are conversant with it, there are, comparatively, but few that receive it so as to bring forth the fruits of it; here is but one in four that comes to good. It is sad to think, how much of the precious seed of the Word of God is lost, and sown in vain; but there is a day coming when lost sermons must be accounted for: many that have heard Christ himself preach in their streets yet will hereafter be bidden to depart from him; those therefore who place all their religion in hearing, as if that alone would save them, do but deceive themselves, and build their hope upon the sand, Jas. i. 22.

Thirdly. Many are much affected with the word for the present, that yet receive no abiding benefit by it. The motions of soul they have answerable to what they hear are but a mere flash, like the crackling of thorns under a pot. We read of hypocrites that delight to know God's ways, Isa. lviii. 2; of Herod, that he heard John gladly, ch. vi. 20; and of others, that they rejoiced in his light, Jno. v. 35; and of those to whom Ezekiel was a lovely song, Eze. xxxii. 32; and those represented here by the stony ground received the word with gladness, and yet came to nothing.

Fourthly. The reason why the word doth not leave commanding, abiding impressions upon the minds of the people is, because their hearts are not duly disposed and prepared to receive it. The fault is in themselves, not in the word: some are careless, forgetful hearers, and these get no good at all by the word—it comes in at one ear and goes out at the other; others have their convictions overpowered by their corruptions, and they lose the good impressions the word has made upon them, so that they get no abiding good by it.

Fifthly. The devil is very busy about loose, careless hearers, as the fowls of the air go about the seed that lies above ground; when the heart, like the highway, is unploughed, unhummed, when it lies common, to be trodden on by every passenger, as theirs that are great company-keepers, then the devil is like the fowls, he comes swiftly and carries away the word ere we are aware. When therefore these fowls come down upon the sacrifices, we should take care, as Abram did, to drive them away, Gen. xv. 21; that though we cannot keep them from hovering over our heads, we may not let them nestle in our hearts.

Sixthly. Many that are not openly scandalized, so as to throw off their profession, as they on the stony ground did, yet have the efficacy of it secretly choked and stifled, so that it comes to nothing; they continue in a barren, hypocritical profession, which brings nothing to pass, and so go down as certainly, though more plausibly, to hell.

Seventhly. Impressions that are not deep, will not be durable, but will wear off in suffering, trying times. Like footsteps on the sand of the sea, which are gone the next high tide of persecution; when that iniquity doth abound, the love of many to the ways of God waxeth cold; many that keep their profession in fair days, lose it in a storm, and do as those that go to sea only for pleasure, come back again when the wind rises. It is the ruin of hypocrites that they have no root; they do not act from a living fixed principle; they do not mind heart-work, and without that, religion is nothing, for he is the Christian that is one inwardly.

Eighthly. Many are hindered from profiting by the word of God, by their abundance of the world. Many a good lesson of humility, charity, self-denial, and heavenly-mindedness is choked and lost by that prevailing complacency in the world, which they are apt to have on whom it smiles. Thus many professors, that otherwise might have come to something, prove like Pharaoh's lean kine and thin ears.

Ninthly. Those that are not encumbered with the cares of the world, and the deceitfulness of riches, yet may lose the benefit of their profession by "the lust of other things;" this is added here in Mark; "by the desires which are about other things;" so Dr. Hammond. An inordinate appetite towards things that are pleasing to sense, or to the fancy. Those that have but little of the world, may yet be ruined by an indulgence of the body.

Tenthly. Fruit is the thing that God expects and requires from those that enjoy the Gospel: fruit according to the seed; a temper of mind, and a course of life agreeable to the Gospel; Christian graces daily exercised, Christian duties duly performed. This is fruit, and it will abound to our account.

Lastly. No good fruit is to be expected but from good seed. If the seed be sown on good ground, if the heart be humble, and holy, and heavenly, there will be good fruit, and it will abound; sometimes even to an hundredfold, such a crop as Isaac reaped, Gen. xxi. 12.

21 And he said unto them, Is a candle brought

iv. 4. For "fowls of the air" many ancient authorities simply read "fowls," or birds. The words "of the air" are omitted by most modern editors.

iv. 9. The words "unto them" are absent from the Alexandrian, Vatican, Cambridge, and Sinaitic MSS., and others.

iv. 10. Instead of "the parable," which seems at first the better reading, the weight of evidence favours the plural, "the parables."

iv. 11. The reading of this verse adopted by Tischendorf and to be put under a bushel, or under a bed? and not to be set on a candlestick? 22 For there is nothing hid, which shall not be manifested; neither was any thing kept secret, but that it should come abroad. 23 If any man have ears to hear, let him hear. 24 And he said unto them, Take heed what ye hear: with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you: and unto you that hear shall more be given. 25 For he that hath, to him shall be given: and he that hath not, from him shall be taken even that which he hath. 26 And he said, So is the kingdom of God, as if a man should cast seed into the ground; 27 And should sleep, and rise night and day, and the seed should spring and grow up, he knoweth not how. 28 For the earth bringeth forth fruit of herself; first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear. 29 But when the fruit is brought forth, immediately he putteth in the sickle, because the harvest is come. 30 And he said, Whereunto shall we liken the kingdom of God? or with what comparison shall we compare it? 31 It is like a grain of mustard seed, which, when it is sown in the earth, is less than all the seeds that be in the earth: 32 But when it is sown, it groweth up, and becometh greater than all herbs, and shooteth out great branches; so that the fowls of the air may lodge under the shadow of it. 33 And with many such parables spake he the word unto them, as they were able to hear it. 34 But without a parable spake he not unto them: and when they were alone, he expounded all things to his disciples.

The lessons which our Saviour designs to teach us here, by parables and figurative expressions, are these,—

First. That those that are good, ought to consider the obligations they are under to do good; that is, as in the parable before, to bring forth fruit. God expects a grateful return of his gifts to us, and a useful improvement of his gifts in us; for ver. 21. "Is a candle brought to be put under a bushel, or under a bed?" No, but that it may "be set on a candlestick." The apostles were ordained to receive the Gospel, not for themselves only, but for the good of others, to communicate it to them. All Christians, as they have received the gift, must minister the same. Note,

1. Gifts and graces make a man as a candle; the candle of the Lord, Pr. xx. 27, lighted by the Father of lights: the most eminent are but candles, poor lights, compared with the Sun of righteousness. A candle gives light but a little while, and but a little while, and is easily blown out, and continually burning down and wasting.

2. Many that are lighted as candles, put themselves "under a bed, or under a bushel." They do not manifest grace themselves, nor minister grace to others; they have estates, and do no good with them; have their limbs and senses, wit and learning, perhaps, but nobody is the better for them. They have spiritual gifts, but do not use them; like a taper in an urn, they burn to themselves.

3. Those that are lighted as candles, should set themselves "on a candlestick;" that is, should improve all opportunities of doing good, as those that were made for the glory of God, and the service of the communities they are members of; we are not born for ourselves.

And the reason given for this, is, because "there is nothing hid which shall not be manifested," which should not be made manifest, so it might better be read, ver. 22. There is no treasure of gifts and graces lodged in any but with design to be communicated; nor was the Gospel made a secret to the apostles to be concealed, but that it should come abroad, and be divulged to all the world. Though Christ expounded the parables to his disciples privately, yet it was with design to make them the more publicly useful; they were taught that they might teach; and it is a general rule, that "the ministration of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal," not himself only, but others also.

Secondly. It concerns those who hear the word of the Gospel, to mark what they hear and to make a good use of it, because their weal or woe depends upon it; what he had said before, he saith again, "If any man hath ears to hear, let him hear," ver. 23. Let him give the Gospel of Christ a fair hearing; but that is not enough; it is added, ver. 24. "Take heed what you hear," and give a due regard to that which you do hear—"consider what you hear," so Dr. Hammond reads it. Note, What we hear doth us no good, unless we consider it; those especially that are to teach others, must themselves be very observant of the things of God; must take notice of the message they are to deliver, that they may be exact. We must likewise take heed what we hear, by proving all things that we may hold fast that which is good. We must be cautious other modern editors is, "Unto you is given the mystery of the kingdom of God," &c. This reading is found in the Alexandrian, Vatican, and Sinaitic MSS., the Syriac-Peshito version, and other important ancient authorities.

iv. 12. For "and their sins should be forgiven them" some MSS., as the Vatican and Sinaitic, have "and it should be forgiven them."

iv. 15. For "sown in their hearts" some of the best ancient MSS., and modern editors read "sown in them."

and stand upon our guard, lest we be imposed upon. To enforce this caution, consider,

1. As we deal with God, God will deal with us. So Dr. Hammond explains these words, "With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you." If you be faithful servants to him, he will be a faithful Master to you: "With the upright he will shew himself upright."

2. As we improve the talents we are intrusted with, we shall increase them; if we make use of the knowledge we have for the glory of God, and the benefit of others, it shall sensibly grow, as stock in trade doth by being turned, "Unto you that hear, shall more be given; to you that have, it shall be given," ver. 25. If the disciples deliver that to the church which they have received of the Lord, they shall be led more into the secret of the Lord. Gifts and graces multiply by being exercised; and God has promised to bless the hand of the diligent.

3. If we do not use, we lose what we have: for "from him that hath not," that doth no good with what he has, and so has it in vain, as if he had it not, "shall be taken even that he has." Burying a talent is the betraying of a trust, and amounts to a forfeiture; and gifts and graces rust for want of wearing.

Thirdly. The good seed of the Gospel sown in the world, and sown in the heart, doth by degrees produce wonderful effects, but without noise, ver. 26, &c.: "So is the kingdom of God;" so is the Gospel, when it is sown, and received as seed in good ground.

1. It will come up; though it seem lost and buried under the clods, it will find or make its way through them. The seed cast into the ground will spring. Let but the word of Christ have the place it ought to have in a soul, and it will shew itself, as the wisdom from above doth, in a good conversation. After a field is sown with corn, how soon is the surface of it altered; how gay and pleasant doth it look when it is covered with green!

2. The husbandman cannot describe how it comes up; it is one of the mysteries of nature; it "springs and grows up he knows not how," ver. 27. He sees it has grown, but he cannot tell in what manner it grew, or what was the cause and method of its growth. Thus we know not how the Spirit by the word makes a change in the heart, no more than we can account for the blowing of the wind, which we hear the sound of, but cannot tell whence it comes, or whether it goes. Without controversy, great is the mystery of godliness, how God manifested in the flesh came to be believed on in the world, 1 Tim. iii. 16.

3. The husbandman, when he hath sown the seed, doth nothing towards the springing of it up. "He sleeps and rises night and day," goes to sleep at night, gets up in the morning, and perhaps never so much as thinks of the corn he hath sown, or ever looks upon it, but follows his pleasures or other business; and yet "the earth brings forth fruit of itself," according to the ordinary course of nature, and by the concurring power of the God of nature. Thus the word of grace, when it is received in faith, is in the heart a work of grace, and the preachers contribute nothing to it. The Spirit of God is carrying it on when they sleep, and can do no business, Job xxxiii. 15, 16; or when they rise to go about other business. The prophets do not live for ever, but the word which they preached is doing its work, when they are in their graves, Zec. i. 5, 6. The dew by which the seed is brought up "tarrieth not for man, nor waiteth for the sons of men," Mic. v. 7.

4. It grows gradually: "first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear," ver. 28; when it is sprung up, it will go forward, nature will have its course, and so will grace; Christ's interest, both in the world and in the heart, is and will be a growing interest; and though "the beginning be small, the latter end will greatly increase." "Though thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain, yet God will give to every seed its own body;" though at first it is but a tender blade, which the frost may nip, or the foot may crush, yet it will increase to the ear, to the full corn in the ear. Natura nil facit per saltum.—"Nature does nothing abruptly." God carries on his work insensibly and without noise, but insuperably and without fail.

5. It comes to perfection at last, ver. 29: "When the fruit is brought forth," that is, when it is ripe, and ready to be delivered into the owner's hand, then he puts in the sickle. This intimates, 1st. That Christ now accepts the services which are done to him by an honest heart from a good principle; from the fruit of the Gospel taking place and working in the soul, Christ gathers in a harvest of honour to himself; see Jno. iv. 35. 2nd. That he will reward them in eternal life. When those that receive the Gospel aright, have finished their course, the harvest comes, when they shall be gathered as wheat into God's barn, Mat. xiii. 30, as a shock of corn in his season.

Fourthly. The work of grace is small in its beginnings, but comes to be great and considerable at last, ver. 30-32: "Whereunto shall I liken the kingdom of God," as now to be set up by the Messiah? "How shall I make you to understand the designed method of it?" Christ speaks as one considering, and consulting with himself, how to illustrate it with an apt similitude. "With what comparison shall we compare it?" Shall we fetch it from the motions of the sun, or the revolutions of the moon? No, the comparison is borrowed from this earth, "it is like a grain of mustard seed;" he had compared it before to seed sown, here to that seed, intending thereby to shew,

1. That the beginnings of the gospel kingdom would be very small, like that which is "one of the least of all seeds." When a Christian church was sown in the earth for God, it was all contained in one room, and the number of the names was but one hundred and twenty, Acts i. 15; as the children of Israel when they went down into Egypt were but seventy souls. The work of grace in the soul is at first but the "day of small things;" "a cloud no bigger than a man's hand." Never were there such great things undertaken by such an inconsiderable handful, as that of the discipling of the nations by the ministry of the apostles; nor a work that was to end in such great glory as the work of grace, raised from such weak and unlikely beginnings: "Who hath begotten me these?"

2. That the perfection of it will be very great. "When it grows up, it becomes greater than all herbs." The gospel kingdom in the world shall increase, and spread to the remotest nations of the earth, and shall continue to the latest ages of time. The church hath shot out great branches, strong ones, spreading far, and fruitful. The work of grace in the soul has mighty products, now while it is in its growth. But what will it be, when it is perfected in heaven! The difference between a grain of mustard seed and a great tree, is nothing to that between a young convert on earth, and a glorified saint in heaven: see Jno. xii. 24.

After these parables thus instanced in, the historian concludes with this general account of Christ's preaching, that "with many such parables he spake the word unto them," ver. 33; probably designing to refer us to the larger account of the parables of this kind, which we had before, Mat. xiii. He spake in parables, "as they were able to hear them:" he fetched his comparisons from those things that were familiar to them, and level to their capacity; and delivered them in plain expressions, in condescension to their capacity. Though he did not let them into the mystery of the parables, yet his manner of expression was easy, and such as they might hereafter recollect to their edification. But for the present, "without a parable spake he not unto them," ver. 34. The glory of the Lord was covered with a cloud, and God speaks to us in the language of the sons of men, that, though not at first, yet by degrees we may understand his meaning; the disciples themselves understood those sayings of Christ afterwards, which at first they did not rightly take the sense of; but these parables he "expounded to them when they were alone." We cannot but wish we had had that exposition, as we had of the parable of the sower; but it was not so needful, because when the church should be enlarged, that would expound these parables to us without any more ado.

35 And the same day, when the even was come, he saith unto them, Let us pass over unto the other side. 36 And when they had sent away the multitude, they took him even as he was in the ship. And there were also with him other little ships. 37 And there arose a great storm of wind, and the waves beat into the ship, so that it was now full. 38 And he was in the hinder part of the ship, asleep on a pillow: and they awake him, and say unto him, Master, carest thou not that we perish? 39 And he arose, and rebuked the wind, and said unto the sea, Peace, be still. And the wind ceased, and there was a great calm. 40 And he said unto them, Why are ye so fearful? how is it that ye have no faith? 41 And they feared exceedingly, and said one to another, What manner of man is this, that even the wind and the sea obey him?

This miracle which Christ wrought for the relief of his disciples in stilling the storm, we had before, Mat. viii. 23, &c.; but it is here more fully related. Observe,

I. It was "the same day" that he had preached out of a ship, "when the even was come," ver. 35. When he had been labouring in the word and doctrine all day, instead of reposing himself, he exposeth himself; to teach us not to think of a constant remaining rest, till we come to heaven. The end of a toil may perhaps be but the beginning of a toss. But observe, the ship that Christ made his pulpit, is taken under his special protection, and though in danger, cannot sink. What is used for Christ, he will take particular care of.

II. He himself proposed putting to sea at night, because he would lose no time. "Let us pass over to the other side," for we shall find in the next chapter he has work to do there. Christ went about doing good, and no difficulties in his way could hinder him; thus industrious we should be in serving him and our generation, according to his will.

III. They did not put to sea till "they had sent away the multitude," that is, had given to each of them that which they came for, and answered all their requests; for he sent none home complaining that they had attended him in vain. Or, they sent them away with a solemn blessing, for Christ came into the world not only to pronounce, but to command and to give the blessing.

IV. They took him "even as he was," that is, in the same dress that he was in when he preached, without any cloak to throw over him, which he ought to have had to keep him warm, when he went to sea at night, especially after preaching. We must not from hence infer, that we may be careless of our health, but we may learn hence not to be over nice and solicitous about the body.

V. The storm was so great, that the ship was full of water, ver. 37; not by springing a leak, but perhaps partly with the shower, for the word here used signifies a tempest of wind with rain; however, the ship being little, the waves beat into it, so that it was full. Note, It is no new thing for that ship to be greatly hurried and endangered in which Christ and his disciples, Christ and his name and Gospel, are embarked.

VI. There were "with him other little ships," who no doubt shared in the distress and danger. Probably those little ships carried those who were desirous to go along with Christ, for the benefit of his preaching and miracles on the other side. The multitude went away when he put to sea, but some there were that would venture upon the water with him. Those follow the Lamb aright, that follow him wherever he goes. And those that hope for a happiness in Christ, must be willing to take their lot with him, and run the same risks that he runs. One may boldly and cheerfully put to sea in Christ's company, yea, though we foresee a storm.

VII. Christ was asleep in this storm; and here we are told that it was "in the hinder part of the ship," the pilot's place, he lay at the helm, to intimate that, as Mr. George Herbert expresseth it,—

When wind and waves assault my keel,
He doth preserve it, he doth steer,
Even when the boat seems most to reel.
Storms are the triumph of his art;
Though he may close his eyes, yet not his heart.

He had a pillow there, such a one as a fisherman's ship would furnish him with. And he slept, to try the faith of his disciples, and to stir up prayer; and upon trial, their faith appeared weak, and their prayers strong. Note, Sometimes when the church is in a storm, Christ seems as if he were asleep, unconcerned in the troubles of his people, and regardless of their prayers, and doth not presently appear for their relief. "Verily he is a God that hideth himself," Isa. xl. 15. But as when he carries, he doth not tarry, Hab. ii. 3; so when he sleeps, he doth not sleep; "the Keeper of Israel doth not" so much as "slumber," Ps. cxxi. 3, 4; he slept, but his heart was awake, as the spouse, Cant. v. 2. VIII. His disciples encouraged themselves with their having his presence, and thought it the best way to improve that, and appeal to that, and ply the oar of prayer, rather than their other oars. Their confidence lay in this, that they had their Master with them; and the ship that has Christ in it, though it may be tost, it cannot sink; the bush that has God in it, though it may burn

iv. 22. Here also there is some uncertainty as to the reading of the words rendered "which shall not be manifested." The Sinaitic and Vatican MSS. have "except that it should be manifested." For "should come abroad" render "should come to light."

iv. 24. Instead of "and unto you that hear shall more be given" there is another and better-supported reading: "and more shall be given unto you." This reading is adopted by Griesbach and later editors, and is found in the Sinaitic and other MSS.

iv. 26-29. This parable is only found in Mark. Alford says, "By commentators of the Straussian school it is strangely supposed to be the same as the parable of the tares, with the tares left out." The idea is certainly a strange one, for the parable of the tares illustrates the work of Satan and of evil, while this illustrates the operations of God and his grace.

iv. 35. The words "the same day, when the even was come," precisely indicate the occasion on which the preceding and following shall not consume. Caesar encouraged the master of the ship that had him on board with this, Cæsarem vehis et fortunam Cæsaris.—Thou hast Cæsar on board, and Cæsar's fortune. They awoke Christ. Had not the necessity of the case called for it, they would not have stirred up or awoke their Master till he had pleased, Cant. ii. 7. But they knew he would forgive them this wrong. When Christ seems as if he slept in a storm, he is awaked by the prayers of his people; when we know not what to do, our eye must be to him, 2 Chr. xx. 12; at our wit's end, but not at our faith's end, while we have such a Saviour to go to. Their address to Christ is here expressed very emphatically, "Master, carest thou not that we perish?" I confess this sounds somewhat harsh, rather like chiding him for sleeping, than begging him to awake. I know no excuse for it, but the great familiarity which he was pleased to admit them into and the freedom he allowed them, and the present distress they were in, which put them into such a fright, that they knew not what they said. They do Christ a deal of wrong, who suspect him to be careless of his people in distress. The matter is not so; he is not willing that any should perish, much less any of his little ones. Mat. xviii. 14.

IX. The word of command with which Christ rebuked the storm, we have here, and had not in Matthew. Ver. 39, he says, "Peace, be still," εἰπά, πεφίμωτο,—"be silent, be dumb." Let not the wind any longer roar, nor the sea rage. Thus he stills the noise of the sea, the noise of her waves; a particular emphasis is laid upon the noisiness of them, Ps. lxxv. 7; xcii. 3, 4. The noise is threatening and terrifying; let us hear no more of it. This is, 1. A word of command to us, when our wicked hearts are like the troubled sea, which cannot rest, Isa. lvii. 20. When our passions are up, and are unruly, think we hear the law of Christ saying, "Be silent, be dumb." Think not confusedly, speak not unadvisedly; but "be still." 2. A word of comfort to us, that be the storm of trouble never so loud, never so strong, Jesus Christ can lay it with a word's speaking. When without are fightings, and within are fears, and the spirits are in a tumult, Christ can "create the fruit of the lips, peace." If he say, "Peace, be still," there is "a great calm" presently. It is spoken of as God's prerogative to command the seas, Isa. lvii. 15; Jer. xxxi. 35. By this therefore Christ proves himself to be God. He that made the seas, can make them quiet.

X. The reproof Christ gave them for their fears is here carried farther than in Matthew; there it is, "Why are ye fearful?" here, "Why are ye so fearful?" Though there may be cause for some fear, yet not for fear to such a degree as this. There it is, "O ye of little faith;" here it is, "How is it that ye have no faith?" Not that the disciples were without faith. No; they believed that "Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God;" but at this time their fears prevailed so, that they seemed to have no faith at all; it was out of the way when they had occasion for it, and so it was as if they had not had it. "How is it, that in this matter you have no faith? That you think I would not come in with seasonable and effectual relief?" Those may suspect their faith, who can entertain such a thought as that Christ careth not though his people perish; and Christ justly takes it ill.

Lastly, The impression this miracle made upon the disciples is here differently expressed. In Matthew it is said, "the men marvelled;" here it is said, "they feared greatly." They "feared a great fear," so the original reads it. Now their fear was rectified by their faith. When they feared the winds and the sea, it was for want of the reverence they ought to have for Christ; but now they saw a demonstration of his power over them, they feared them less, and him more. They feared lest they had offended Christ by their unbelieving fears, and therefore studied now to give him honour. They had feared the power and wrath of the Creator in the storm, and that fear had torment and amazement in it; but now they feared the power and grace of the Redeemer in the calm, they "feared the Lord and his goodness," and it had pleasure and satisfaction in it, and by it they gave glory to Christ; as Jonah's mariners, who, when the "sea ceased from her raging, feared the Lord exceedingly, and offered a sacrifice unto the Lord," Jonah i. 16. This sacrifice they offered to the honour of Christ, they said, "What manner of man is this?" surely more than a man, "for even the wind and the sea obey him."

CHAPTER V.

In this chapter we have, I. Christ casting the legion of devils out of the man possessed, and suffering them to enter into the swine, ver. 1—20. II. Christ's healing the woman with the bloody issue in the way, as he was going to raise Jairus' daughter to life, ver. 21—43. These three miracles we had the story of before, Mat. viii. 28, &c., and Mat. ix. 18, &c., but more fully related here.

AND they came over unto the other side of the sea into the country of the Gadarenes. 2 And when he was come out of the ship, immediately there met him out of the tombs a man with an unclean spirit, 3 Who had his dwelling among the tombs; and no man could bind him, no, not with chains: 4 Because that he had been often bound with fetters and chains, and the chains had been plucked asunder by him, and the fetters broken in pieces: neither could any man tame him. 5 And always, night and day, he was in the mountains, and in the tombs, crying, and cutting himself with stones. 6 But when he saw Jesus afar off, he ran and worshipped him, 7 And cried with a loud voice, and said, What have I to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of the most high God? I adjure thee by God, that thou torment me not. 8 For he said unto him, Come out of the man, thou unclean spirit. 9 And he asked him, What is thy name? And he answered, saying, My name is Legion: for we are many. 10 And he besought him much that he would not send them away out of the country. 11 Now there was there nigh unto the mountains a great herd of swine feeding. 12 And all the devils besought him, saying, Send us into the swine, that we may enter into them. 13 And forthwith Jesus gave them leave. And the unclean spirits went out, and entered into the swine: and the herd ran violently down a steep place into the sea, (they were about two thousand;) and were choked in the sea. 14 And they that fed the swine fled, and told it in the city, and in the country. And they went out to see what it was that was done. 15 And they come to Jesus, and see him that was possessed with the devil, and had the legion, sitting, and clothed, and in his right mind: and they were afraid. 16 And they that saw it told them how it befell to him that was possessed with the devil, and also concerning the swine. 17 And they began to pray him to depart out of their coasts. 18 And when he was come into the ship, he that had been possessed with the devil prayed him that he might be with him. 19 Howbeit Jesus suffered him not, but saith unto him, Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee, and hath had compassion on thee. 20 And he departed, and began to publish in Decapolis how great things Jesus had done for him: and all men did marvel.

DWELLERS AMONGST THE TOMBS.—VER. 3.

We have here an instance of Christ's dispossessing the strong man armed, and disposing of him as he pleased, to make it appear he was "stronger than he." This he did when he was come "to the other side," whither he went through a storm; and his business there was to rescue this poor creature out of the hands of Satan; and when he had done that, he returned. Thus he came from heaven to earth, and returned in a storm, to redeem a remnant of mankind out of the hands of the devil, though but a little remnant, and did not think his pains ill bestowed. In Matthew they were said to be two possessed with devils; here it is said to be a man possessed with an unclean spirit. If there were two, there was one, and Mark doth not say there was but one; so that this difference cannot give us any just offence; it is likely one of them was incidents occurred. They are, however, separated by Matthew, who records the parable of the mustard-seed in chap. xiii. 31—35, and the storm upon the lake in chap. viii. 18, 23—27. From this and other indications it is apparent that the evangelists do not always follow the exact order of time. This remark applies to Luke in the present case, inasmuch as he inserts the parable of the mustard-seed at chap. xiii. 18, 19, and the storm at chap. viii. 22—25.

iv. 38. Calvin says, "Though Christ's sleep was natural, yet it availed to the same use, that the disciples should the better know their own infirmity. I will not say as many do, that Christ feigned himself to be asleep, that he might try them; I do rather judge that he slept as the condition and necessity of human nature did require. Yet his Godhead did watch, so that the apostles ought not to have feared but that they should presently have been comforted, help being prepared for them from heaven."

iv. 38. "The hinder part of the ship" was the place allotted to much more remarkable than the other, and said what was said. Now observe here.

First. The miserable condition that this poor creature was in. He was under the power of "an unclean spirit," the devil got possession of him, and the effect of it was not, as in many, a silent melancholy, but a raging frenzy; he was raving mad; his condition seems to have been worse than any of those that were possessed that were Christ's patients.

1. He "had his dwelling among the tombs," among the graves of dead people. Their tombs were out of the cities, in "desolate places," Job iii. 14, which gave the devil great advantage; for woe to him that is alone. Perhaps the devil drove him to the tombs, to make people fancy that the souls of the dead were turned into demons, and did what mischief was done, so to excuse themselves from it. The touch of a grave was polluting, Nim. xix. 16. The unclean spirit drives people into that company that is defiling, and so keeps possession of them. Christ, by rescuing souls out of Satan's power, saves the living from among the dead.

2. He was very strong and ungovernable. "No man could bind him," as it is requisite, both for their own good, and for the safety of others, that those who are distracted should be. Not only cords would not hold him, but chains and fetters of iron would not, ver. 3, 4. The case of such is very deplorable, that need to be thus bound, and of all miserable people in this world they are most to be pitied; but his case was worst of all; to whom the devil was so strong that he could not be bound. This sets forth the sad condition of those souls in which the devil has dominion; those children of disobedience, in whom that unclean spirit works. Some notoriously wilful sinners are like this madman; all are herein like the horse and the mule, that they need to be held in with bit and bridle; but some are like the wild ass, that will not be so held. The commands and curses of the law are as chains and fetters to restrain sinners from their wicked courses, but they break those bands in sunder, and it is an evidence of the power of the devil in them.

3. He was a terror and torment to himself, and to all about him, ver. 5. The devil is a cruel master to those that are led captive by him, a perfect tyrant. This wretched creature was "night and day in the mountains, and in the tombs, crying, and cutting himself with stones," either bemoaning his own deplorable case, or in rage and indignation against Heaven. Men, in frenzies, often wound and destroy themselves. What is a man, when reason is de-throned, and Satan enthroned? The worshippers of Baal, in their fury, cut themselves, like this madman in his. The voice of God is, "Do thyself no harm;" the voice of Satan is, "Do thyself all the harm thou canst;" yet God's word is despised, and Satan's regarded. Perhaps his "cutting himself with stones," was only cutting his feet with the sharp stones he ran barefoot upon.

Secondly. His application to Christ, ver. 6. "When he saw Jesus afar off," coming ashore, "he ran and worshipped him." He usually ran upon others with rage, but he ran to Christ with reverence. That was done by an invisible hand of Christ, which could not be done with chains and fetters, his fury was all on a sudden curbed; even the devil in this poor creature was forced to tremble before Christ, and bow to him; or rather, the poor man came and worshipped Christ, in a sense of the need he had of his help, the power of Satan in and over him being for this instant suspended.

Thirdly. The word of command Christ gave to the unclean spirit to quit his possession, ver. 8. "Come out of him, thou unclean spirit." He made the man desirous to be relieved, when he enabled him to run and worship him, and then put forth his power for his relief. If Christ work in us heartily to pray for a deliverance from Satan, he will work for us that deliverance. Here is an instance of that power and authority with which Christ "commanded the unclean spirits, and they obeyed him," ch. i. 27: he said, "Come out of the man." The design of Christ's Gospel is to expel unclean spirits out of the souls of people. "Come out of the man, thou unclean spirit," that the Holy Spirit may enter, may take possession of the heart, and have dominion in it.

Fourthly. The dread which the devil had of Christ. The man ran and worshipped Christ; but it was the devil in the man that "cried with a loud voice," (making use of the poor man's tongue.) "What have I to do with thee?" ver. 7; just as that other unclean spirit, ch. i. 24. 1. He calls God "the most high God," above all other gods. By the name Eliou, the "most high," God was known among the Phœnicians, and other the nations that bordered upon Israel, and by that name the devil calls him. 2. He owns Jesus to be the Son of God. Note, It is no strange thing to hear the best words drop from the worst mouths. There is such a way of saying this as none can attain to but by the Holy Ghost, 1 Cor. xii. 3; yet it may be said after a sort by the unclean spirit. There is no judging of men by their loose sayings, but "by their fruits ye shall know them." Piety from the teeth outward is an easy thing. The most fair-spoken hypocrite cannot say better than to call Jesus the Son of God, and yet that the devil did. 3. He disowns any design against Christ; "What have I to do with thee?" 4. I have no need of thee, I pretend to none; I desire to have nothing to do with thee; I cannot stand before thee, and would not fall.

4. He deprecates his wrath. "I adjure thee," that is, "I earnestly beseech thee by all that is sacred, I beg of thee for God's sake, by whose permission I have got possession of this man, that though thou drive me out hence, yet that thou torment me not, that thou do not restrain me from doing mischief somewhere else; though I know I am sentenced, yet let me not be sent to the chains of darkness, or hindered from going to and fro to devour." Fifthly. The account Christ took from this unclean spirit of his name. This we had not in Matthew. Christ asked him, "what is thy name?" not but that Christ could call all the fallen stars, as well as by might be affected with their names; but he demands this, that the standers by might be affected with the vast numbers and powers of those malignant, infernal spirits. As they had reason to be, when the answer was, "My name is Legion, for we are many." A legion of soldiers among the Romans consisted, some say, of six thousand men, others, of twelve thousand and five hundred; but the number of a legion with them, no more than of a regiment with us, was not always the same. Now this intimates that the devils, the infernal powers, are, 1. Military powers; a legion is a number of soldiers in arms. The devils war against God and his glory, Christ and his Gospel, men and their holiness and happiness. They are such as we are to resist and wrestle against, Eph. vi. 12. 2. That they are numerous; he owns, or rather he boasts, that "we are many;" as if he hoped to be too many for Christ himself to deal with. What multitudes of apostate spirits were there, and all enemies to God and man, when here were a legion posted to keep garrison in one poor wretched creature, against Christ. Many there be that rise up against us. 3. That they are unanimous; they are many devils, and yet but one legion, engaged in the same wicked cause; and therefore that cavil of the Pharisees, which supposed Satan to cast out Satan, and to be divided against himself, was altogether groundless. It was not one of this legion that betrayed the rest, for they all said as one man, "What have I to do with thee?" 4. That they are very powerful. Who can stand before a legion? We are not a match for our spiritual enemies in our own strength; but "in the Lord, and in the power of his might," we shall be able to stand against them, though there are legions of them. 5. That there is order among them, as there is in a legion; there are "principalities and powers, and rulers of the darkness of this world;" which supposeth there are those of a lower rank,—the devil and his angels, the dragon and his; the prince of the devils and his subjects; which makes those enemies the more formidable.

Sixthly. The request of this legion, that Christ would suffer them to go into a herd of swine, that was feeding nigh unto the mountains, ver. 11, those mountains which the demoniacs haunted, ver. 5. Their request was, 1. That he would not send them away out of the country, ver. 10. Not only that he would not commit them, or confine them to their infernal prison, and so torment them before the time; but that he would not banish them that country, as justly he might, because in this poor man they had been such a terror to it, and done so much mischief. They seem to have had a particular affection for that country, or rather, a particular spite to it; and to have liberty to walk to and fro through the rest of the earth will not serve, (Job i. 7,) unless the range of those mountains be allowed them for their pasture, Job xxxix. 8. But why would they abide in that country? Grotius saith, 'Because in that country there were many apostate Jews, who had thrown themselves out of the covenant of God, and had thereby given Satan power over them.' And some suggest, that having, by experience, got the knowledge of the dispositions and manners of the people of that country, they could the more effectually do them mischief by their temptations. 2. That he would suffer them to enter into the swine, by destroying which they hoped to do more mischief to the souls of all the people of the country, than they could by entering into the body of any particular person, which therefore they did not ask leave to do, for they knew Christ would not grant it.

Seventhly. The permission Christ gave them to enter into the swine, and their immediate destruction thereby. "He gave them leave," ver. 13; he did not forbid or restrain them; let them do as they had a mind. Thus he would let the Gadarenes see what powerful, spiteful enemies devils are, that they might thereby be induced to make him their friend, who alone was able to control and conquer them, and had made it appear he was so. Immediately the unclean spirits entered into the swine," which, by the law, were unclean creatures, and naturally love to wallow in the mire, and therefore the fittest place for them. Those that, like the swine, delight in the mire of sensual lusts, are fit habitations for Satan, and are, like Babylon, the "hold of every foul spirit," and a "cage of every unclean and hateful bird," Rev. xviii. 2, as pure souls are habitations of the Holy Spirit. The consequent of the devils' entering into the swine was, that they all ran mad presently, and ran headlong into the adjoining sea, where they were all drowned, to the number of two thousand. The man they possessed did only cut himself, for God had said, "He is in your hands, only save his life;" but thereby it appeared that, if he had not been so restrained, the poor man would have drowned himself. See how much we are indebted to the providence of God, and the ministration of good angels, for our preservation from malignant spirits.

Eighthly. The report of all this dispersed through the country immediately. They that fed the swine hastened to the owners to give an account of their charge, ver. 14. This drew the people together to see what was done. And, 1. When they saw how wonderfully the poor man was cured, they from thence conceived a veneration for Christ, ver. 15. They saw him that was "possessed with the devil," and knew him well enough, by the same token that they had many a time been frightened at the sight of him, and were now as much surprised to see him "sitting, clothed, and in his right mind;" when Satan was cast out, he came to himself, and was his own man presently. Note, Those who are grave and sober, and live by rule, and with consideration, thereby make it appear that, by the power of Christ, the devil's power is broken in their souls. The sight of this made them afraid, that is, it astonished them, and forced them to own the power of Christ, and that he is worthy to be feared. But, 2. When they found that their swine were lost, they thence conceived a dislike of Christ, and wished to have rather his room than his company; they prayed "him to depart out of their coasts," for they think not any good he can do them sufficient to make them amends for the loss of so many swine, fat swine it may be, and ready for the market. Now the devils had what they would have; for by no handle do those evil spirits more effectually manage sinful souls, than by that of the love of the world. They were afraid of some farther punishment, if Christ should tarry among them; whereas, if they would but part with their sins, he had life and happiness for them; but being loath to quit either their sins, or their swine, they chose rather to abandon their Saviour. Thus they do, who rather than let go a base lust, will throw away their interest in Christ, and their expectations from him. They should rather have argued, "If he has such power as this over devils, and all creatures, it is good having him our friend; if the devils have leave to tarry in our country," (ver. 10,) let us intreat him to tarry in it too, who alone can control them." But, instead of this, they wished him farther off; such strange misconstructions do carnal hearts make of the just judgments of God; instead of being by them driven to him, as they ought, they set him at so much a greater distance; though he hath said, "Provoke me not, and I will do you no hurt," Jer. xxv. 6.

Ninthly. An account of the carriage of the poor man that was delivered, after his deliverance. 1. He desired that he might go along with Christ, ver. 18; perhaps for fear, lest the evil spirit should again seize him, or rather, that he might receive instruction from him, being unwilling to way among those heathenish people that desired him to depart. Those that are freed from the evil spirit, cannot but covet acquaintance and fellowship with Christ. 2. Christ "would not suffer him" to go with him, lest it should savour of ostentation, and to let him know that he could both protect and instruct him at a distance. And besides, he had other work for him to do, he must go home to his friends, and tell them what "great things the Lord had done for him," the Lord Jesus had done, that Christ might be honoured, and his neighbours and friends might be edified, and invited to believe in Christ. He must take particular notice, rather of Christ's pity than of his power; for that is it which especially he glories in; he must tell them what compassion the Lord had had on him in his misery. 3. The man, in a transport of joy, proclaimed it all the country over, what "great things Jesus had done for him," ver. 20. This is a debt we owe both to Christ and to our brethren, that he may be glorified, and they edified. And see what was the effect of it, "all men did marvel," but few went any farther. Many, that cannot choose but wonder at the works of Christ, yet do not, as they ought, wonder after him.

21 And when Jesus was passed over again by ship unto the other side, much people gathered unto him: and he was nigh unto the sea. 22 And, behold, there cometh one of the rulers of the synagogue, Jairus by name; and when he saw him, he fell at the steersman. Dr. Kitto correctly observes that the Greek is better rendered "the pillow," the article having a peculiar force in referring to a particular part of the ship's furniture called "the pillow." "Some regard it as denoting a piece of wood framed at the stern; but others prefer to consider it as a leather stuffed cushion. The word, in its ordinary acceptation, denotes not only a pillow for the head, but a cushion on which one might lie or sit down." In the New Testament it is only found here.

v. 1. The received text here and in Luke viii. 26 has Gadarenes, while Matt. viii. 28 has Gergesenes. The manuscripts and versions, however, offer other variations, and Tischendorf in his New Testament adopts Gadarenes for Matthew, and Gerasenes for Mark and Luke. Differences are known to have existed as early as the time of Origen, who has a special note upon them, and says correct copies had Gergesenes. This, he says, is from Gergesa, a town of that region, whereas Gadara and Gerasa do not occur in the locality his feet, 23 And besought him greatly, saying, My little daughter lieth at the point of death: I pray thee, come and lay thy hands on her, that she may be healed; and she shall live. 24 And Jesus went with him; and much people followed him, and thronged him. 25 And a certain woman, which had an issue of blood twelve years, 26 And had suffered many things of many physicians, and had spent all that she had, and was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse, 27 When she had heard of Jesus, came in the press behind, and touched his garment. 28 For she said, If I may touch but his clothes, I shall be whole. 29 And straightway the fountain of her blood was dried up; and she felt in her body that she was healed of that plague. 30 And Jesus, immediately knowing in himself that virtue had gone out of him, turned him about in the press, and said, Who touched my clothes? 31 And his disciples said unto him, Thou seest the multitude thronging thee, and sayest thou, Who touched me? 32 And he looked round about to see her that had done this thing. 33 But the woman fearing and trembling, knowing what was done in her, came and fell down before him, and told him all the truth. 34 And he said unto her, Daughter, thy faith hath made thee whole; go in peace, and be whole of thy plague.

The Gadarenes having desired Christ to leave their country, he did not stay to trouble them long, but presently went by water, as he came, back "to the other side," ver. 21; and there "much people gathered to him." Note, If there be some that reject Christ, yet there are others that receive him, and bid him welcome. A despised Gospel will cross the water, and go where it will have better entertainment. Now, among the many that applied themselves to him,

First. Here is one that comes openly to beg a cure for a sick child; and it is no less a person than one of the rulers of the synagogue, one that presided in the synagogue worship, or, as some think, one of the judges of the consistory court, which was in every city, consisting of twenty-three. He was not named in Matthew; he is here, Jairus, or Jair, Jud. x. 3. He addressed himself to Christ, though a ruler, with great humility and reverence; "when he saw him, he fell at his feet," giving honour to him, as one really greater than he appeared to be; and with great importunity, he "besought him greatly;" as one in earnest, as one that not only valued the mercy he came for, but that knew he could obtain it no where else. The case is this: He has a "little daughter," about twelve years old, the darling of the family, and she lies a dying; but he believes if Christ will but come and lay his hands upon her, she will return even from the gates of the grave. He said at first, when he came, she "lies a dying;" so Mark; but afterwards, upon fresh information sent him, he saith, "she is even now dead;" so Matthew; but still prosecutes his suit: see Lu. viii. 42, 49. Christ readily agreed, and went with him, ver. 24.

Secondly. Here is another that comes clandestinely to steal a cure (if I may so say) for herself; and she got the relief she came for. This cure was wrought by the way, as he was going to raise the ruler's daughter, and was followed by a crowd. See how Christ improved his time, and lost none of the precious moments of it. Many of his discourses, and some of his miracles, are dated by the wayside: we should be doing good, not only when we sit in the house, but when we walk by the way, Deu. vi. 7. Now observe,

1. The piteous case of this poor woman: she had a constant issue of blood upon her for twelve years, which had thrown her, no doubt, into great weakness, had embittered the comfort of her life, and threatened to be her death in a little time. She had had the best advice of physicians she could get, and had made use of the many medicines and methods they prescribed: as long as she had any thing to give them, they had kept her in hopes they could cure her; but now she had spent all she had among them, they gave her up as incurable. See here, 1st. That skin for skin, and all that a man has, will give for life and health; she spent all she had upon physicians. 2nd. It is ill with those patients whose physicians are their worst disease; that suffer by their physicians, instead of being relieved by them. 3rd. Those that are not bettered by medicines commonly grow worse, and the disease gets the more ground. 4th. It is usual that people do not apply themselves to Christ till they have tried in vain all other helpers, and find them, as certainly they will, physicians of no value. And he will be found a sure refuge, even to those who make him their last refuge.

2. The strong faith that she had in the power of Christ to heal her. She said within herself,—"though it doth not appear she was encouraged by any preceding instance to say it,—"If I may but touch his clothes, I shall be whole," ver. 28. She believed he cured not as a prophet, by virtue derived from God, but as the Son of God, by a virtue inherent in himself. Her case was such as she could not in modesty tell him publicly, as others did their grievances; and therefore a private cure was what she wished for, and her faith was suited to her case.

3. The wonderful effect produced by it. "She came in the crowd behind him," and with much ado got to touch his garment, and immediately she felt the cure wrought, ver. 29. The flux of blood was dried up, and she felt herself perfectly well all over her, as well as ever she was in her life, in an instant. By this it appears that the cure was altogether miraculous; for those that, in such cases, are cured by natural means, recover their strength slowly, and gradually, and not per saltum,—"at one jump;" but, "as for God, his work is perfect." Note, Those whom Christ heals of the disease of sin, that bloody issue, cannot but experience in themselves an universal change for the better.

4. Christ's inquiry after his concealed patient, and the encouragement he gave her, upon the discovery of her. Christ knew "in himself that virtue had gone out of him," ver. 30. He knew it, not by any deficiency of spirits, through the exhausting of this virtue; but rather by an agility of spirits, in the exerting of it, and the innate and inseparable pleasure he had in doing good; and being desirous to see his patient, he asked, not in displeasure, as one affronted, but in tenderness, as one concerned, "Who touched my clothes?" The disciples, not without a show of rudeness and indecency, almost ridiculed his question, ver. 31: "The multitude throng thee, and sayest thou, Who touched me?" as if it had been an improper question. Christ passed by the affront, and looks round "to see her that had done this thing;" not that he might blame her for her presumption, but that he might commend and encourage her faith; and by his own act and deed might warrant and confirm the cure, and ratify to her that which she had surreptitiously obtained. He needed not that any should inform him, for he had presently his eye upon her. Note, As secret acts of sin, so secret acts of faith are known to the Lord Jesus, and are under his eye. If believers derive virtue from Christ never so closely, he knows it and is pleased with it. The poor woman hereupon presented herself to the Lord Jesus, ver. 33, "fearing and trembling," not knowing how he would take it. Note, Christ's patients are often trembling, when they have reason to be triumphing. She might have come boldly, "knowing what was done in her," yet knowing that, she fears and trembles. It was a surprise, and was not yet, as it should have been, a pleasing surprise. However she "fell down before him." Note, There is nothing better for those that fear and tremble than to throw themselves at the feet of the Lord Jesus; to humble themselves before him, and refer themselves to him. And she "told him all the truth." Note, We must not be ashamed to own the secret transactions between Christ and our souls, but when called to it, mention to his praise, and others' encouragement, what he has done for our souls, and the experience we have had of healing virtue derived from him. And the consideration of this, that nothing can be hid from Christ, should engage us to confess all to him. And see what an encouraging word he gave her, ver. 34, "Daughter, thy faith hath made thee whole." Note, Christ puts honour upon faith, because faith gives honour to Christ. But see how what is done by faith on earth is ratified in heaven; Christ saith, "Be whole of thy disease." Note, If our faith sets the seal of its amen to the power and promise of God, saying, so it is, and so let it be to me, God's grace will set the seal of its amen to the prayers and hopes of faith, saying, so be it, and so it shall be to thee. And, therefore, "Go in peace;" be well satisfied that thy cure is honestly come by, is effectually wrought, and take the comfort of it. Note, They that by faith are healed of their spiritual diseases, have reason to go in peace.

35 While he yet spake, there came from the ruler of the synagogue's house certain which said, Thy daughter is dead: why troublest thou the Master any further? 36 As soon as Jesus heard the word that was spoken, he saith unto the ruler of the synagogue, Be not afraid, only believe. 37 And he suffered no man to follow him, save Peter, and required. The Syriac version has Gadarenes in our text, and so have numerous other authorities, including the Alexandrian MS. The Sinaitic, Vatican, and Cambridge MSS. have Gerasenes. Alford thinks Gergesenes most likely, but we think Gerasenes has most witness in its favour.

v. 20. Upon the word Decapolis a well-known infidel writer, who cites it to prove the falsehood of Gospel geography, says the name was not so much as known before the reign of the Emperor Nero.

Even were it true that the name was unknown, it would prove no falsehood, but only that Matthew and Mark wrote no earlier than Nero's reign, and called a certain region by its accepted name. The name Decapolis originated at an unknown date, and being Greek, probably arose before the Roman supremacy, but during the prevalence of Grecian influences. Josephus, Pliny the elder, and other early writers speak of it, but no author states when the name was introduced; it is, therefore, mere audacity to say it was not known

James, and John the brother of James. 38 And he cometh to the house of the ruler of the synagogue, and seeth the tumult, and them that wept and wailed greatly. 39 And when he was come in, he saith unto them, Why make ye this ado, and weep? the damsel is not dead, but sleepeth. 40 And they laughed him to scorn. But when he had put them all out, he taketh the father and the mother of the damsel, and them that were with him, and entereth in where the damsel was lying. 41 And he took the damsel by the hand, and said unto her, Talitha cumi; which is, being interpreted, Damsel, I say unto thee, arise. 42 And straightway the damsel arose, and walked; for she was of the age of twelve years. And they were astonished with a great astonishment. 43 And he charged them straitly that no man should know it; and commanded that something should be given her to eat.

Diseases and deaths came into the world by the sin and disobedience of the first Adam, but by the grace of the second Adam both are conquered. Christ having healed an incurable disease, here goes on to triumph over death, as in the beginning of the chapter he had triumphed over an outrageous devil.

First. The melancholy news is brought to Jairus that his daughter is dead, and therefore if Christ be as other physicians, he comes too late; while there is life there is hope, and room for the use of means, but when life is gone it is past recall: "Why troublest thou the Master any farther?" ver. 35. Ordinarily, the proper thought in this case is, The matter is determined, the will of God is done; and I submit, I acquiesce. "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away. While the child was alive, I fasted and wept; for I said, Who can tell but God will yet be gracious to me, and the child shall live; but now it is dead, wherefore should I fast? I shall go to it, but it shall not return to me." And with such words we should quiet ourselves at such a time, that our souls may be "as a child that is weaned from his mother." But here the case was extraordinary; the death of the child doth not, as usual, put an end to the narrative.

Secondly. Christ encourageth the afflicted father yet to hope that his application to Christ on behalf of his child should not be in vain. Christ had stayed to work a cure by the way, but he shall be no sufferer by that, nor loser by others' gain. "Be not afraid, only believe." We may suppose Jairus at a pause whether he should ask Christ to go on or no. But have we not as much occasion for the grace of God, and his consolations, and consequently of the prayers of our ministers and Christian friends, when death is in the house, as when sickness is? Christ therefore soon determines this matter, "Be not afraid that my coming will be to no purpose, only believe that I will make it turn to a good account." Note. 1. We must not despair concerning our relations that are dead, nor sorrow for them as those that have no hope. See what is said to Rachel, that refused to be comforted concerning her children, upon presumption that they were not: "Refrain thy voice from weeping, and thine eyes from tears, for there is hope in thine end that thy children shall come again." Jer. xxxi. 16, 17. Therefore fear not, faint not. 2. Faith is the only remedy against disquieting grief and fear at such a time; let that silence them, "only believe." Keep a confidence in Christ, and a dependence upon him, and he will do what is for the best. Believe the resurrection, and then be not afraid.

Thirdly. He went with a select company to the house where the dead child was. He had, by the crowd that attended him, given advantage to the poor woman he last healed, and having done that, now he shook off the crowd, and "suffered no man to follow him," to "follow with him," so the word is, but his three bosom disciples, Peter, and James, and John, a competent number to be witnesses of the miracle, but not such a number as that his taking them with him might look like vainglory.

Fourthly. He raised the dead child to life. The circumstances of the narrative here are much the same as we had them in Matthew; only here we may observe,

1. That the child was extremely well beloved, for the relations and neighbours "wept and wailed greatly." It is very afflictive when that which is come forth like a flower is so soon cut down, and withereth before it is grown up; when that grieves us of which we said, "This same shall comfort us."

2. That it was evident beyond dispute that the child was really and truly dead. Their laughing Christ to scorn for saying, "She is not dead, but sleepeth," though an ill thing, serves for the proof of this.

3. That Christ put those out as unworthy to be witnesses of the miracle who were noisy in their sorrow, and were so ignorant in the things of God as not to understand him when he spoke of death as a sleep, or so scornful as to ridicule him for it.

4. That he took the parents of the child to be witnesses of the miracle, because in it he had an eye to their faith, and designed it for their comfort who were the true, for they were the silent mourners.

5. That Christ raised the child to life by a word of power, which is recorded here, and recorded in Syriac, the language in which Christ spoke, for the greater certainty of the thing: Talitha cumi,—"Damsel, I say unto thee, arise." Dr. Lightfoot saith, it was customary with the Jews when they gave physic to one that was sick, they said, "Arise from thy disease," meaning, we wish thou mayest arise; but to one that was dead Christ said, "Arise from the dead," meaning, "I command that thou arise;" nay, there is more in it, the dead have not power to arise, therefore power goes along with this word to make it effectual. Da quod jubes, et jube quod vis,—"Give what thou commandest, and command what thou wilt." Christ works while he pleaseth, even the dead to arise. Such is the gospel call to those that are by nature dead in trespasses and sins, and can no more rise from that death by their own power than this child could; and yet that word, "Awake, and arise from the dead," is neither vain, nor in vain, when it follows immediately, "Christ shall give thee life," Eph. v. 14. It is by the word of Christ that spiritual life is given, "I said unto thee, live," Eze. xvi. 6.

6. That the damsel, as soon as life returned, "arose and walked," ver. 42. Spiritual life will appear by our rising from the bed of sloth and carelessness, and our walking in a religious conversation; our walking up and down in Christ's name and strength. Even from those that are "of the age of twelve years," it may be expected that they should should walk as those whom Christ has raised to life, otherwise than in the native vanity of their minds.

7. That all who saw it and heard of it admired the miracle, and him that wrought it; "they were astonished with a great astonishment." They could not but acknowledge that there was something in it extraordinary and very great, and yet they knew not what to make of it, or to infer from it. Their wonder should have worked forward to a lively faith, but it rested in a stupor or astonishment.

8. That Christ endeavoured to conceal it: "He charged them straitly that no man should know it;" it was sufficiently known to a competent number, but he would not have it as yet proclaimed any farther, because his own resurrection was to be the great instance of his power over death, and therefore the divulging of other instances must be reserved till that great proof was given; let one part of the evidence be kept private till the other part, on which the main stress lies, be made ready.

9. That Christ took care "something should be given her to eat." By this it appeared that she was raised not only to life, but to a good state of health, that she had an appetite to her meat; even the new born babes in Christ's house desire the sincere milk, 1 Pet. ii. 1, 2. And it is observable, that as Christ, when at first he had made man, presently provided food for him, and food out of the earth of which he was made, Gen. i. 29; so now, when he had given a new life, he took care that something should be given to eat; for if he have given life, he may be trusted to give livelihood, because "the life is more than meat," Mat. vi. 25. Where Christ hath given spiritual life, he will provide food for the support and nourishment of it unto life eternal, for he will never forsake or be wanting to the work of his own hands.

CHAPTER VI.

A great variety of observable passages we have in this chapter concerning our Lord Jesus, the substance of all which we had before in Matthew, but divers circumstances we have which we did not there meet with. Here is, I. Christ contemned by his countrymen, because he was one of them, and they knew, or thought they knew, his original, ver. 1-6. II. The just power he gave his apostles over unclean spirits, and an account given of their negotiation, ver. 7-13. III. A strange notion which Herod and others had of Christ, upon which occasion we have the story of the martyrdom of John Baptist, ver. 14-29. IV. Christ's retirement into a desert place with his disciples; the crowds that followed him thither to receive instruction from him, and his feeding five thousand of them with five loaves and two fishes, ver. 30-44. V. Christ's walking upon the sea to his disciples, and the abundance of cures he wrought on the other side the water, ver. 45-56.

AND he went out from thence, and came into his own country; and his disciples follow him. 2 And when the sabbath day was come, he began to teach in the synagogue: and many hearing him were astonished, saying, From whence hath this man these things? and what wisdom is this which is given unto him, that even such mighty works are wrought by his hands? 3 Is not this the carpenter, the son of Mary, the brother of James, and Joses, and of Juda, and Simon? and are not his sisters here with us? And they were offended at him. 4 But Jesus said unto them, A prophet is not without honour, but in his own country, and among his own kin, and in his own house. 5 And he could there do no mighty work, save that he laid his hands upon a few sick folk, and healed them. 6 And he marvelled because of their unbelief. And he went round about the villages, teaching.

Here, First, Christ makes a visit to his own country, the place, not of his birth, but of his education, that was Nazareth, where his relations were. He had been in danger of his life among them, Lu. iv. 29, and yet he came among them again; so strangely doth he wait to be gracious, and seek the salvation of his enemies: whither he went, though it was into danger, "his disciples followed him," ver. 1, for they had left all to follow him whithersoever he went.

Secondly. There he preached in their synagogue on the sabbath day, ver. 2. It seems there was not such flocking to him there as in other places, so that he had no opportunity of preaching till they came together on the sabbath day; and then he expounded a portion of Scripture with great clearness. In religious assemblies on sabbath days the word of God is to be preached, according to Christ's example: we give glory to God by receiving instruction from him.

Thirdly. They could not but own that which was very honourable concerning him. 1. That he spoke with great wisdom, and that wisdom was given to before the reign of Nero. The lists of the ten cities from which Decapolis took its name vary in ancient writers, and it is not unlikely that the boundaries were changed from time to time, but so changed as to allow the old name to be retained. With one exception the cities of Decapolis appear to have been on the east of the Jordan, and hence perhaps we may gather why Josephus calls it Decapolis of Syria.

v. 41. The occurrence of the Aramaic phrase, "Talitha cumi," signifying, "Damsel, arise," indicates the popular use of that dialect. It is maintained by some that Syro-Chaldaic, or a similar form of language, was commonly employed by our Lord and the Jewish people of that day. Others, however, argue that the ordinary language of the nation was the Greek. There is no doubt that both were used, but it is not easy to decide which predominated among the population at large. Dr. Roberts, who has written most copiously on this subject, is of opinion that our Lord and his disciples did, for him, for they knew he had no learned education. 2. That he did mighty works, did them with his own hands, for the confirming of the doctrine he taught; they acknowledged the two great proofs of the Divine original of his Gospel, the Divine wisdom that appears in the contrivance of it, and the Divine power that was exerted for the ratifying and recommending of it; and yet, though they could not deny the premises, they would not admit the conclusion.

Fourthly. They studied to disparage him, and to raise prejudices in the minds of people against him, notwithstanding. All this wisdom, and all these mighty works, shall be of no account, because he had had a home education, had never travelled, nor been at any university, or bred up at the feet of any of their doctors, ver. 3: "Is not this the carpenter?" In Matthew they upbraid him with being the carpenter's son, his supposed father Joseph being of that trade. But it seems they could say farther, "Is not this the carpenter?" Our Lord Jesus, it is probable, employing himself in that business with his father before he entered upon his public ministry, at least, sometimes in journey-work. 1. He would thus humble himself, and make himself of no reputation, as one that had taken upon him the form of a servant, and came to minister. This is low did our Redeemer stoop, when he came to redeem us out of our low estate. 2. He would thus teach us to abhor idleness, and to find ourselves something to do in this world, and rather to take up with mean and laborious employments, and such as no more is to be got by but a bare livelihood, than indulge ourselves in sloth. Nothing is more pernicious for young people than to get a habit of sauntering. The Jews had a good rule for this, that their young men who were designed for scholars, yet were bred up to some trade, as Paul was a tent-maker, that they might have some business to fill up their time with, and if need were, to get their bread with. He would put an honour upon despised mechanics, and encourage those who eat the labour of their hands, though great men look upon them with contempt.

Another thing they upbraided him with was the meanness of his relations; he is "the son of Mary, his brethren and sisters are here with us, we know his family and kindred," and, therefore, though they were astonished at his doctrine, ver. 2, yet they were offended at his person, ver. 3; were prejudiced against him, and looked upon him with contempt, and for that reason would not receive his doctrine, though never so well recommended. May we think that, if they had not known his pedigree, but he had dropped among them from the clouds, without father, without mother, and without descent, they would have entertained him with any more respect? Truly, no; for in Judæa, where this was not known, that was made an objection against him, Jno. ix. 29, "As for this fellow, we know not from whence he is." Obstinate unbelief will never want excuses.

Fifthly. Let us see how Christ bore this contempt.

1. He partly excused it, as a common thing, and what might be expected, though not reasonably or justly, ver. 4: "A prophet is not despised anywhere but in his own country." Some exceptions there may be to this rule; doubtless many have got over this prejudice, but ordinarily it holds good, that ministers are seldom so acceptable and successful in their own country as among strangers; familiarity in the younger years breeds a contempt, and the advancement of one that was an inferior, begets envy, and men will hardly set those among the guides of their souls whose fathers they were ready to set with the dogs of their flock; in such a case therefore it must not be thought hard; it is common treatment, it was Christ's, and wisdom is profitable to direct to other soil.

2. He did some good among them, notwithstanding the slights they put upon him, for he is kind even to the evil and unthankful; he "laid his hands upon a few sick folks and healed them," ver. 13. Note, it is generous, and becoming the followers of Christ, to content themselves with the pleasure and satisfaction of doing good, though they be unjustly denied the praise of it.

3. Yet he could there do no such mighty works, at least not so many, as in other places, because of the unbelief that prevailed among the people, by reason of the prejudices which their leaders instilled into them against Christ, ver. 5. It is a strange expression, as if unbelief tied the hands of Omnipotence itself; he would have done as many miracles there as he had done elsewhere, but he could not, because people would not make application to him, nor sue for his favours; he could have wrought them, but they forfeited the honour of having them wrought for them. Note, By unbelief and contempt of Christ, men stop the current of his favours to them, and put a bar in their own door.

4. He "marvelled because of their unbelief," ver. 6. We never find Christ wondering but at the faith of the Gentiles, that were strangers, as the centurion, Mat. viii. 10, and the woman of Canaan, and at the unbelief of Jews, that were his own countrymen. Note, The unbelief of those that enjoy the means of grace is a most amazing thing.

5. He "weiround about the villages teaching." If we cannot do good where we would, we must do it where we can, and be glad if we may have any opportunity, though but in the villages, of serving Christ and souls. Sometimes the Gospel of Christ finds better entertainment in the country villages, where there is less wealth, and pomp, and mirth, and subtlety, than in the populous cities.

7 And he called unto him the twelve, and began to send them forth by two and two; and gave them power over unclean spirits; 8 And commanded them that they should take nothing for their journey, save a staff only; no scrip, no bread, no money in their purse: 9 But be shod with sandals; and not put on two coats. 10 And he said unto them, In what place soever ye enter into an house, there abide till ye depart from that place. 11 And whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear you, when ye depart thence, shake off the dust under your feet for a testimony against them. Verily I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment, than for that city. 12 And they went out, and preached that men should repent.

Here is, 1. The commission given to the twelve apostles, to go preach and work miracles; it is the same which we had more largely, Mat. x. Mark doth not name them here, as Matthew doth, because he had named them before, when they were first called into fellowship with him, ch. iii. 16. Hitherto they had been conversant with Christ, and had sat at his feet, had heard his doctrine, and seen his miracles; and now he determines to make some use of them; they received that they might give, had learned that they might teach, and therefore now he "began to send them forth." They must not always be studying in the academy to get knowledge, but they must go preach in the country, to do good with the knowledge they have got. Though they were not as yet so well accomplished as they will be hereafter, yet according to their present ability and capacity, they must be set to work, and make farther improvements afterwards. Now observe here,

First. That Christ sent "them forth by two and two;" this, Mark takes notice of: they went two and two to a place, that out of the mouth of two witnesses every word might be established; and that they might be company for one another when they were among strangers, and might strengthen the hands and encourage the hearts one of another; might help one another if any thing should be amiss, and keep one another in countenance; every common soldier has his comrade; and it is an approved maxim, "Two is better than one." Christ would thus teach his ministers to associate, and both lend and borrow help.

Secondly. That he "gave them power over unclean spirits." He commissioned them to attack the devil's kingdom, and empowered them, as a specimen of their breaking his interest in the souls of men by their doctrine, to cast him out of the bodies of those that were possessed. Dr. Lightfoot suggests, that they cured diseases and cast out devils by the Spirit, but preached that only which they had learned from the mouth of Christ.

Thirdly. That he commanded them not to take provisions along with them, neither victuals nor money, that they might appear wherever they came to be poor men, men not of this world, and therefore might with the better grace call people off from it to another world. When afterwards he bade them take purse and scrip, Luk. xxii. 36, that did not intimate (as Dr. Lightfoot observes) that his care of them was abated to what it had been; but that they should meet with worse times and worse entertainment than they met with at their first mission. In Matthew and Luke, they are forbidden to take staves with them, that is, fighting staves; but here, in Mark, they are bid to take nothing save a staff only, that is, a walking-staff, such as pilgrims carried. They must not put on shoes, but sandals only, which were only the soles of shoes tied under their feet, or like pumps or slippers; they must go in the readiest, plainest dress they could, and must not so much as have two coats; for their stay abroad would be short, they must return before winter; and what they wanted, those they preached to would cheerfully accommodate them with.

Fourthly. He directed them, whatever city they came to, to make that house their head quarters which happened to be their first quarters, ver. 10, "there abide till ye depart from that place." And since you know you come on an errand sufficient to make you welcome, have that charity for your friends that first invited you, as to believe they do not think you burdensome.

Fifthly. He pronounceth a very heavy doom upon those that rejected the Gospel they preached, ver. 11, "Whosoever shall not receive you," or will not so much as "hear you, depart thence,"—if one will not, another will—and "shake off the dust under your feet for a testimony against them." Let them know that they have had a fair offer of life and happiness made them, witness that dust; but that since they have refused it, they cannot expect ever to have another; let them take up with their own dust, for so shall their doom be. That dust, like the dust of Egypt, Ex. ix. 9, shall turn into a plague to them; and their condemnation in the great day will be more intolerable than that of Sodom; for the angels were sent to Sodom, and were abused there, yet that would not bring on so great a guilt and so great a ruin as the contempt and abuse of the apostles of Christ, that bring with them the offers of gospel grace.

II. The apostles' acting in pursuance of their commission: though they were conscious to themselves of great weakness, and expected no secular advantage by it, yet in obedience to their Master's order, and in dependence upon his strength, they went out, as Abraham, not knowing whither they went. Observe here,

First. The doctrine they preached; they preached "that men should repent," ver. 12; that they should change their minds and reform their lives, in consideration of the near approach of the kingdom of the Messiah. Note, The great design of gospel-preachers, and the great tendency of gospel-preaching should be to bring people to repentance, to a new heart and a new way. They did not amuse people with curious speculations, but told them they must repent of their sins, and turn to God.

Secondly. The miracles they wrought: the power Christ gave them "over unclean spirits," was not ineffectual, nor did they receive it in vain, but used it, for they "cast out many devils," ver. 13. And they "anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them." Some think that this oil was used medicinally, according to the custom of the Jews; but I rather think it was used as a sign of miraculous healing by the appointment of Christ, though not mentioned; and it was afterwards used by those elders of the church to whom by the Spirit was given the gift of healing, Jas. v. 14. It is certain here, and therefore probable there, that anointing the sick with oil is appropriated to that extraordinary power which is long ceased, and therefore that sign must cease with it.

14 And king Herod heard of him; (for his name was spread abroad:) and he said, That John the Baptist was risen from the dead, and therefore mighty works do shew forth themselves in him. 15 Others said, That it is Elias. And others said, That it is a prophet, or as one of the prophets. 16 But when Herod heard thereof, he said, It is John, whom I beheaded: he is risen from the dead. 17 For Herod himself had sent forth and laid hold upon John, and bound him in prison for Herodias' the most part, make use of the Greek language. This view is supported by many ingenious arguments, and justifies the occasional use of the Syro-Chaldaic.

v. 43. Grotius is of opinion that our Lord did not yet wish the world to know his empire over death. He nevertheless manifested it to a few by some tokens, preparing their minds for the full assertion of the fact by his own resurrection.

vi. 1. With regard to the words, "and he went out from thence,"

and came into his own country," the sense must be, "and he went away from Capernaum and came to Nazareth." That it is so is shown by reference to Luke iv. 16, 23, in the first of which verses Nazareth is named, and in the second it is called our Lord's own country, as contrasted with Capernaum. Nazareth is also called his own country in Matt. xiii. 54. Hence, the Greek word is explained to mean not only one's native land, but also one's native place, one's own city, and one's home.

sake, his brother Philip's wife: for he had married her. 18 For John had said unto Herod, It is not lawful for thee to have thy brother's wife. 19 Therefore Herodias had a quarrel against him, and would have killed him; but she could not: 20 For Herod feared John, knowing that he was a just man and an holy, and observed him; and when he heard him, he did many things, and heard him gladly. 21 And when a convenient day was come, that Herod on his birthday made a supper to his lords, high captains, and chief estates of Galilee; 22 And when the daughter of the said Herodias came in, and danced, and pleased Herod and them that sat with him, the king said unto the damsel, Ask of me whatsoever thou wilt, and I will give it thee. 23 And he sware unto her, Whatsoever thou shalt ask of me, I will give it thee, unto the half of my kingdom. 24 And she went forth, and said unto her mother, What shall I ask? And she said, The head of John the Baptist. 25 And she came in straightway with haste unto the king, and asked, saying, I will that thou give me by and by in a charger the head of John the Baptist. 26 And the king was exceeding sorry; yet for his oath's sake, and for their sakes which sat with him, he would not reject her. 27 And immediately the king sent an executioner, and commanded his head to be brought: and he went and beheaded him in the prison, 28 And brought his head in a charger, and gave it to the damsel: and the damsel gave it to her mother. 29 And when his disciples heard of it, they came and took up his corpse, and laid it in a tomb.

Here is, I. The wild notions that the people had concerning our Lord Jesus, ver. 15. His own countrymen could believe nothing great concerning him, because they knew his poor kindred; but others, that were not under the power of that prejudice against him, yet were willing to believe any thing rather than the truth, that he was the Son of God, and the true Messiah, they said, "He is Elias" whom they expected, or "He is a prophet," one of the Old Testament prophets raised to life and returned to this world; or, "as one of the prophets," a prophet now newly raised up, equal to those under the Old Testament.

II. The opinion of Herod concerning him; he heard of his name and fame, of what he said and what he did; and he said, It is certainly John Baptist, ver. 14; as sure as we are here, "it is John, whom I beheaded," ver. 16, "he is risen from the dead;" and though while he was with us he did no miracle, yet having removed for a while to another world, he is come again with greater power, and now "mighty works do shew forth themselves in him."

Note, 1. Where there is an idle faith, there is commonly a working fancy. The people said, it is a prophet risen from the dead; Herod said, it is "John Baptist risen from the dead." It seems by this, that the rising of a prophet from the dead, to do mighty works, was a thing expected, and was thought neither impossible nor improbable, and it was now readily suspected, when it was not true; but afterwards, when it was true concerning Christ, and a truth undeniably evidenced, yet then it was obstinately gainsaid and denied. Those who most wilfully disbelieve the truth are commonly most credulous of errors and fancies.

2. They who fight against the cause of God will find themselves baffled, even when they think themselves conquerors; they cannot gain their point, for the word of the Lord endures for ever. They who rejoiced when the witnesses were slain, fretted as much when in three or four days they rose again in their successors, Rev. xi. 10, 11. The impenitent, unreformed sinner, that escapeth the sword of Jehu, shall Elisha slay.

3. A guilty conscience needs no accuser or tormentor but itself. Herod charges himself with the murder of John, which perhaps no one else durst charge him with, "I beheaded him;" and the terror of it made him imagine that Christ was John risen. He feared John while he lived, and now he thought he had got clear of him, fears him ten times worse when he is dead. One had as good be haunted with ghosts and furies, as with the horrors of an accusing conscience; those therefore who would keep an undisturbed peace, must keep an undefiled conscience, Acts xxiv. 16.

4. There may be the terrors of strong conviction, where there is not the truth of a saving conversion. This Herod, that had this notion concerning Christ, afterwards sought to kill him, Lu. xiii. 31; and did set him at nought, Lu. xxiii. 11; so that he will not be persuaded, though it be by one risen from the dead; no, not by a John the Baptist risen from the dead.

III. A narrative of Herod's putting John Baptist to death, which is brought in upon this occasion, as it was in Matthew. And here we may observe,

First. The great value and veneration which Herod had sometimes had for John Baptist, which is related only by this evangelist, ver. 20; where we see what a great way a man may go towards grace and glory, and yet come short of both, and perish eternally. 1. He "feared John, knowing that he was a just man, and a holy." It is possible that a man may have a great reverence for good men, and especially for good ministers; yea, and for that in them that is good, and yet himself be an ill man. Observe, 1st. John was a just man, and a holy; to make a complete good man there is necessary both justice and holiness; holiness towards God, and justice towards men. John was mortified to this world, and that is a good friend both to justice and holiness. 2nd. Herod knew this, not only by common fame, but by personal acquaintance with him. Those that have but little justice and holiness themselves, may yet discern it with respect in others. And 3rd. He therefore feared him, he honoured him. Holiness and justice command veneration, and many that are not good themselves, yet have respect for those that are. 2. He "observed him;" he sheltered him from the malice of his enemies, so some understand it; or rather, he had a regard to his exemplary conversation, and took notice of that in him that was praiseworthy, and commended it in the hearing of those about him; he made it appear that he observed what John said and did. 3. "He heard him" preach: which was great condescension, considering how mean John's appearance was. To hear Christ himself preach in our streets will be but a poor plea in the great day, Lu. xiii. 26. 4. He "did many" of those "things" which John in his preaching taught him; he was not only a hearer of the word, but in part a doer of the work. Some sins which John in his preaching reproved he forsook, and some duties he bound himself to; but it will not suffice to do many things, unless we have respect to all the commandments. 5. He "heard him gladly," he did not hear him with terror, as Felix heard Paul, but heard him with pleasure. There is a flashy joy, which an hypocrite may have in hearing the word; Ezekiel was to his hearers a lovely song, Eze. xxxiii. 32; and the stony ground received the word with joy, Lu. viii. 13.

Secondly. John's faithfulness to Herod, in telling him of his faults. Herod had married his brother Philip's wife, ver. 17. All the country no doubt cried shame on him for it, and reproached him for it, but John reproved him, told him plainly, "It is not lawful for thee to have thy brother's wife." This was Herod's own iniquity which he could not leave, when he did many things that John taught him; and therefore John tells him of this particularly. Though he were a king, he would not spare him, no more than Elijah did Ahab when he said, "Hast thou killed, and also taken possession?" Though John had an interest in him, and he might fear this plain dealing would lose him his interest, yet he reproved him; for "faithful are the wounds of a friend," Pr. xxvii. 6; and though there are some swine that will turn again and rend those that cast pearls before them, yet ordinarily "he that rebuketh a man," (if the person reproved has any thing of the understanding of a man,) "afterwards shall find more favour, than he that flattereth with his tongue," Pr. xxviii. 23. Though it was dangerous to offend Herod, and much more to offend Herodias, yet John would run the hazard, rather than be wanting in his duty. Note, Those ministers that would be found faithful in the work of God, must not be afraid of the face of man. If we seek to please men, farther than is for their spiritual good, we are not the servants of Christ.

Thirdly. The malice which Herodias bore to John for this, ver. 19. She "had a quarrel with him, and would have killed him;" but when she could not obtain that, she got him committed to prison, ver. 17. Herod respected him, till he touched him in his Herodias. Many that pretend to honour prophesying, are for smooth things only, and love good preaching, if it keeps far enough from their beloved sin; but if that be touched, they cannot bear it. No marvel if the world hate those who testify of it that its works are evil. But ministers had better that sinners should persecute them now for their faithfulness, than curse them eternally for their unfaithfulness.

Fourthly. The plot laid to take off John's head; and I am apt to think Herod was himself in the plot, notwithstanding his pretences to be displeased and surprised, and that the thing was concerted between him and Herodias, for it is said to be, "when a convenient day was come," ver. 21, fit for such a purpose.

1. There must be a ball at court upon the king's birthday, and a supper prepared, for "his lords, high captains, and chief estates of Galilee." 2. To grace the solemnity, the daughter of Herodias must dance publicly, and Herod must take on him to be wonderfully charmed with her dancing; and if he be, they that sit with him cannot but, in compliment to him, be so too. 3. The king hereupon must make her an extravagant promise, to give her whatever she would ask, even to the half of the kingdom; and yet that, if rightly understood, would not have reached the end designed, for John Baptist's head was worth more than his whole kingdom. This promise is bound with an oath, that no room might be left to fly off from it; "he swore to her, Whatsoever thou shalt ask, I will give." I can scarce think he would have made such an unlimited promise, but that he knew what she would ask. 4. She being instructed by Herodias her mother, asked "the head of John Baptist;" and she must have it brought her "in a charger," as a pretty thing for her to play with, ver. 24, 25. And there must be no delay, no time lost, she must have it "by and by." 5. Herod granted it, and the execution was done immediately, while the company were together; which we can scarce think the king would have done, if he had not determined the matter before. But he takes on him,

1st. To be very backward to it, and that he would not for all the world have done it, if he had not been surprised into such a promise: "The king was exceeding sorry;" that is, he seemed to be so, he said he was so, he looked as if he had been so; but it was all sham and grimace; he was really pleased that he had found a pretence to get John out of the way: Qui nescit dissimulare nescit regnare.—"The man who cannot dissemble knows not how to reign." And yet he was not without sorrow for it; he could not do it but with great regret and reluctance; natural conscience will not suffer men to sin easily; the very commission of it is vexatious; what then will the reflection upon it be? 2nd. He takes on him to be very sensible of the obligation of his oath; whereas if the damsel had asked but a fourth part of his kingdom, I doubt not but he would have found out a way to evade his oath. The promise was rashly made, and could not bind him to do an unrighteous thing. Sinful oaths must be repented of, and therefore not performed, for repentance is the undoing of what we have done amiss, as far as is in our power. When Theodosius the emperor was urged by a suitor with a promise, he answered, "I said it, but did not promise it, if it be unjust." If we may suppose that Herod knew nothing of the design when he made that rash promise, it is likely he was hurried into the doing of it by those about him, only to carry on the humour; for he did it "for their sakes who sat with him," whose company he was proud of, and therefore would do any thing to gratify them. Thus do princes make themselves slaves to those whose respects they covet, and both value and secure themselves by. None of Herod's subjects stood in more awe of him, than he did of "his lords, high captains, and chief estates." The king sent an executioner, a soldier of his guard. Bloody tyrants have executioners ready to obey their most cruel and unrighteous decrees. Thus Saul has a Doeg at hand, to "fall upon the priests of the Lord," when his own footmen declined it.

Fifthly. The effect of this is, 1. That Herod's wicked court is all in triumphs

vi. 5. The parallel passage in Matt. xiii. 58 reads, "and he did not many mighty works there, because of their unbelief." Modern sceptics assert that here we have a confession of a want of power in Jesus. Only an ignorant or a perverse criticism will take this view. Bengel says, mighty works could not be done, because the people were unable to receive them. Calvin says, "Unbelievers do, as much as in them lieth, hold back the hand of God by their obstinacy; not that God is overcome as an inferior, but because they permit him not to show his power." Grotius, with his usual acumen, says, that by "could not" here he thinks is meant that disposition in Christ which prevented him from doing many miracles at Nazareth. Christ, who had full power of working miracles, was hindered from exercising it here, not through hatred of men, but of most pertinacious incredulity. It may be noted, also, that in other languages "cannot" is applied to moral inability and resolves.

vi. 13 On the words "anointed with oil" Grotius says, "After because this prophet tormented them; the head is made a present of to the damsel, and by her to her mother, ver. 28. 2. That John Baptist's sacred college is all in tears; the disciples of John little thought of this, but when they "heard of it, they came and took up the" neglected "corpse, and laid it in a tomb;" where Herod, if he had pleased, might have found it, when he frightened himself with the fancy, that John Baptist was "risen from the dead."

30 And the apostles gathered themselves together unto Jesus, and told him all things, both what they had done, and what they had taught. 31 And he said unto them, Come ye yourselves apart into a desert place, and rest a while: for there were many coming and going, and they had no leisure so much as to eat. 32 And they departed into a desert place by ship privately. 33 And the people saw them departing, and many knew him, and ran afoot thither out of all cities, and outwent them, and came together unto him. 34 And Jesus, when he came out, saw much people, and was moved with compassion toward them, because they were as sheep not having a shepherd: and he began to teach them many things. 35 And when the day was now far spent, his disciples came unto him, and said, This is a desert place, and now the time is far passed: 36 Send them away, that they may go into the country round about, and into the villages, and buy themselves bread: for they have nothing to eat. 37 He answered and said unto them, Give ye them to eat. And they say unto him, Shall we go and buy two hundred pennyworth of bread, and give them to eat? 38 He saith unto them, How many loaves have ye? go and see.

EASTERN LOAVES.

And when they knew, they say, Five, and two fishes. 39 And he commanded them to make all sit down by companies upon the green grass. 40 And they sat down in ranks, by hundreds, and by fifties. 41 And when he had taken the five loaves and the two fishes, he looked up to heaven, and blessed, and brake the loaves, and gave them to his disciples to set before them; and the two fishes divided he among them all. 42 And they did all eat, and were filled. 43 And they took up twelve baskets full of the fragments, and of the fishes. 44 And they that did eat of the loaves were about five thousand men.

In these verses we have,

1. The return of the apostles to Christ, whom he had sent forth, ver. 7, to preach and work miracles. They had dispersed themselves into several quarters of the country for some time; but when they had made good their several appointments, by consent they "gathered themselves together" to compare notes, and came to Jesus, the centre of their unity, to give him an account of what they had done pursuant to their commission, as the servant that was sent to invite to the feast, and had received answers from the guests, came and "shewed his lord all these things;" so did the apostles here, they "told him all things, both what they had done, and what they had taught." Ministers are accountable, both for what they do, and for what they teach; and must both watch over their own souls, and watch for the souls of others, as those that must give account, Heb. xiii. 17. Let them not either do any thing, or teach any thing, but what they are willing should be related and repeated to the Lord Jesus. It is a comfort to faithful ministers, when they can appeal to Christ concerning their doctrine and manner of life, both which perhaps have been misrepresented by men; and he gives them leave to be free with him, and to lay open their case before him, to tell him all things, what treatment they have met with, what success, and what disappointment.

II. The tender care Christ took for their repose, after the fatigue they had had, ver. 31: "He said unto them," perceiving them to be almost spent, and out of breath, "Come ye yourselves apart, into a desert place, and rest a while." It should seem that John's disciples came to Christ with the mournful tidings of their master's death, much about the same time that his own disciples came to him with the report of their negotiation. Note, Christ takes cognizance of the frights of some, and the toils of others of his disciples, and provides suitable relief for both; rest for those that are tired, and refuge for those that are terrified. With what kindness and compassion doth Christ say to them, "Come and rest." Note, The most active servants of Christ cannot be always upon the stretch of business, but have bodies that require some relaxation, some breathing time; we shall not be able to serve God without ceasing, day and night, till we come to heaven, where they never rest from praising him, Rev. iv. 8. And the Lord is for the body; considers its frame, and not only allows it time for rest, but puts it in mind of resting: "Come, my people, enter thou into thy chambers." "Return to thy rest." And those that work diligently and faithfully may cheerfully retire to rest. "The sleep of the labouring man is sweet." But observe, 1. Christ calls them to come themselves apart; for if they had any body with them, they would have something to say, or something to do, for their good; if they must rest, they must be alone. 2. He invites them, not to some pleasant country seat, where there were fine buildings, and fine gardens, but "into a desert place," where the accommodations were very poor, and which was fitted by nature only, not by art, for quietness and rest. But it was of a piece with all the other circumstances he was in; no wonder that he, who had but a ship for his preaching-place, had but a desert for his resting-place. 3. He calls them only to rest a while; they must not expect to rest long, only to get breath, and then go to work again. There is no remaining rest for the people of God, till they come to heaven. 4. The reason given for this, is not so much because they had been in constant work, but because they now were in a constant hurry; so that they had not their work in any order, "for there were many coming and going, and they had no leisure so much as to eat." Let but proper time be set and kept for every thing, and a great deal of work may be done with a great deal of ease; but if people are continually "coming and going," and no rule or method be observed, a little work will not be done without a deal of trouble. 5. They withdrew accordingly by ship, not crossing the water, but making a coasting voyage to the desert of Bethsaida, ver. 32. Going by water was much less toilsome than going by land would have been. They went away privately, that they might be by themselves. The most public persons cannot but wish to be private sometimes.

III. The diligence of the people to follow him. It was rude to do so, when he and his disciples were desirous for such good reason to retire; and yet they are not blamed for it, nor bid to go back, but bid welcome. Note, A failure in good manners will easily be excused in those who follow Christ, if it be but made up in a fulness of good affections. They followed him of their own accord, without being called upon. Here is no time set, no meeting appointed, no bell tolled, yet they thus "fly like a cloud, and as doves to their windows." They followed him "out of the cities," quitted their houses and shops, their callings and affairs, to hear him preach. They followed him "afoot," though he was gone by sea; and so to try them, seemed to put a slight upon them, and to endeavour to shake them off, yet they stuck to him. They "ran afoot," and made such haste, as that they "outwent" the disciples, "and came together to him," with an appetite to the Word of God. Nay, they followed him, though it were into a desert place, despicable, and inconvenient. The presence of Christ will turn a wilderness into a paradise.

IV. The entertainment Christ gave them, ver. 34: "When he saw much people," instead of being moved with displeasure, because they disturbed him when he desired to be private, as many a man, many a good man, would have been, he "was moved with compassion towards them," and looked upon them with concern, "because they were as sheep having no shepherd;" they seemed to be well inclined, and manageable as sheep, and willing to be taught, but they had "no shepherd;" none to lead and guide them in the right way, none to feed them with good doctrine; and therefore, in compassion to them, he not only "healed their sick," as it is in Matthew, but he taught "them many things," and we may be sure they were all true and good, and fit for them to learn.

V. The provision he made for them all. All his hearers he generously made his guests, and treated them at a splendid entertainment; so it might truly be called, because a miraculous one.

1. The disciples moved that they should be sent home. "When the day was now far spent," and night drew on, they said, "This is a desert place, and much time is now passed, send them away to buy bread," ver. 35, 36. This the disciples suggested to Christ, but we do not find that the multitude themselves did. They did not say, "Send us away;" no, not though they could not but be hungry, for they "esteemed the words of Christ's mouth more than their necessary food," and forgot themselves when they were hearing him; but the disciples thought it would be a kindness to them to dismiss them. Note, Willing minds will do more, and hold out longer, in that which is good, than one would expect from them.

2. Christ ordered that they should all be fed, ver. 37: "Give ye them to eat." Though their crowding after him and his disciples hindered them from eating, ver. 31, yet he would not therefore, to be even with them, send them away fasting; but, to teach us to be kind to those who are rude to us, he ordered provision to be made for them; that bread which Christ and his disciples took with them into the desert, that they might make a quiet meal of it for themselves, he will have them to partake of. Thus was he "given to hospitality." They attended on the spiritual food of his word, and then he took care they should not want corporal food. The way of duty, as it is the way of safety, so it is the way to supply. Let God alone to fill the pools with rain from heaven, and so to make a well even in the valley of Baca, for those that are going Sionwards, from strength to strength, Psa. lxxix. 6, 7. Providence not tempted, but duly trusted, never yet failed any of God's faithful servants, but has refreshed many with seasonable and surprising relief. It has often been seen in "the mount of the Lord, Jehovah-jireh," that "the Lord will provide" for those that wait on him.

3. The disciples objected against it as impracticable; "Shall we go and buy two hundred pennyworth of bread, and give them to eat?" Thus, through the weakness of faith, instead of waiting for directions from Christ, they perplex the cause with projects of their own. It was a question whether they had two hundred pence with them, and whether the country would of a sudden afford so much bread if they had, and whether that would suffice so great a the ancient manner of the Hebrews, who, as they were accustomed to add the imposition of hands to prayers offered for any one, so they anointed with oil the sick for whom they prayed, in hope of obtaining from God alleviation and happiness, which the oil signified." It was, therefore, an emblematic action.

vi. 16. "John, whom I beheaded, is risen from the dead," is the reading of several ancient authorities, and adopted by Tischendorf and others.

vi. 20. For "observed him," we may adopt Alford's suggestion, and render "kept him safe," imprisoned him in order to protect him.

vi. 21. "Convenient" is a fair rendering of the Greek, but convenient for whom or what? It may be convenient or opportune for Herodias, who contemplated revenge. This view is taken by some older as well as more recent critics, and is probably correct. For "chief estates of Galilee," read "chief men of Galilee." Why they were specially invited is mere matter of conjecture. Herod had a residence company; but thus Moses objected, Num. xi. 22, "Shall the flocks or herds be slain for them?" Christ would let them see their folly in forecasting for themselves, that they might put the greater value upon his provision for them.

4. Christ effected it to universal satisfaction. They had brought with them five loaves, for the victualling of their ship, and two fishes, perhaps they had caught as they came along, and that is the bill of fare. This was but a little for Christ and his disciples, and yet this they must give away, as the widow her two mites, and the churches of Macedonia's deep poverty abounded to the riches of their liberality. We often find Christ entertained at other people's tables, dining with one friend, and supping with another, but here we have him supping a great many at his own charge, which shews, that when others ministered to him of their substance, it was not because he could not supply himself otherwise. If he were hungry, he needed not tell them, but it was a piece of humiliation he was pleased to submit to; nor was it agreeable to the intention of miracles that he should work them for himself. Observe,

1st. The provision was ordinary. Here were no rarities, no varieties, though Christ, if he had pleased, could have furnished his table with them. But thus he would teach us to be content with food convenient for us, and not be desirous of dainties. If we have for necessity, it is no matter though we have not for delicacy and curiosity. God in love gives meat for our hunger, but in wrath gives meat for our lusts, Ps. lxxviii. 18. The promise to them that fear the Lord is, that verily they shall be fed: he doth not say they shall be feasted. If Christ and his disciples took up with mean things, sure we may. 2nd. The guests were orderly; for they "sat down by companies upon the green grass," ver. 39; they "sat down in ranks by hundreds and by fifties," ver. 40; that the provision might the more easily and regularly be distributed among them; for God is the God of order, and not of confusion. Thus care was taken that every one should have enough, and none be overlooked, nor any have more than was fitting. 3rd. A blessing was craved upon the meat: "He looked up to heaven, and blessed." Christ did not call one of his disciples to crave a blessing, but did it himself, ver. 41; and by virtue of this blessing the bread strangely multiplied, and so did the fishes, for "they did all eat and were filled," though they were to the number of five thousand, ver. 42, 44. This miracle was significant, and shews that Christ came into the world to be the great feeder, as well as the great healer; not only to restore, but to preserve and nourish spiritual life; and in him there is enough for all that come to him, enough to fill the soul, to fill the treasures; none are sent empty away from Christ, but those that come to him full of themselves. 4th. Care was taken of the fragments that remained, with which they filled twelve baskets. Though Christ had bread enough at command; he would hereby teach us not to make waste of any of God's good creatures, remembering how many there are that do want, and that we know not, but we may some time or other want such fragments as we throw away.

45 And straightway he constrained his disciples to get into the ship, and to go to the other side before unto Bethsaida, while he sent away the people. 46 And when he had sent them away, he departed into a mountain to pray. 47 And when even was come, the ship was in the midst of the sea, and he alone on the land. 48 And he saw them toiling in rowing; for the wind was contrary unto them: and about the fourth watch of the night he cometh unto them, walking upon the sea, and would have passed by them. 49 But when they saw him walking upon the sea, they supposed it had been a spirit, and cried out: 50 For they all saw him, and were troubled. And immediately he talked with them, and saith unto them, Be of good cheer: it is I; be not afraid. 51 And he went up unto them into the ship; and the wind ceased: and they were sore amazed in themselves beyond measure, and wondered. 52 For they considered not the miracle of the loaves: for their heart was hardened. 53 And when they had passed over, they came into the land of Gennesaret, and drew to the shore. 54 And when they were come out of the ship, straightway they knew him, 55 And ran through that whole region round about, and began to carry about in beds those that were sick, where they heard he was. 56 And whithersoever he entered, into villages, or cities, or country, they laid the sick in the streets, and besought him that they might touch if it were but the border of his garment: and as many as touched him were made whole.

This passage of story we had, Mat. xiv. 22, &c., only what was there related concerning Peter is omitted. Here we have,

First. The dispersing of the assembly. Christ "constrained his disciples" to go before by ship to Bethsaida, intending to follow them, as they supposed by land. The people were loath to scatter, so that it cost him some time and pains to send them away. For now they had got a good supper, they were in no haste to leave him. But as long as we are here in this world, we have no continuing city, no, not in communion with Christ. The everlasting feast is reserved for the future state.

Secondly. Christ "departed into a mountain to pray." Observe, 1. He prayed; though he had so much preaching work upon his hands, yet he was much in prayer; he prayed often, and prayed long, which is an encouragement to us to depend upon that intercession he is making for us at the right hand of the Father, that continual intercession. 2. He went alone to pray; though he needed not to retire for the avoiding either of distraction or of ostentation; yet, to set us an example, and to encourage us in our secret addresses to God, he prayed alone; and for want of a closet, went up into a mountain to pray. A good man is never less alone than when alone with God.

Thirdly. The disciples were in distress at sea; "the wind was contrary," ver. 48; so that they toiled in rowing, and could not get forward. This was a specimen of the hardships they were to expect, when hereafter he should send them abroad to preach the Gospel; it would be like sending them to sea at this time, with the wind in their teeth: they must expect to toil in rowing, they must work hard to strive against so strong a stream; they must likewise expect to be tossed with waves, to be persecuted by their enemies; and by exposing them now, he intended to train them up for such difficulties, that they might learn to endure hardness. The church is often like a ship at sea, tossed with tempests, and not comforted; we may have Christ for us, and yet wind and tide against us; but it is a comfort to Christ's disciples in a storm, that their Master is in the heavenly mount interceding for them.

Fourthly. Christ made them a kind visit upon the water. He could have checked the winds where he was, or have sent an angel to their relief; but he chose to help them in the most endearing manner possible, and therefore came to them himself.

1. He did not come till the "fourth watch of the night," not till after three o'clock in the morning; but then he came. Note, If Christ's visits of his people be deferred long, yet at length he will come; and their extremity is his opportunity to appear for them so much the more seasonably. Though the salvation tarry, yet we must wait for it; at the end it shall speak, in the fourth watch of the night, and not lie.

2. He came walking upon the waters. The sea was now tossed with waves, and yet Christ came walking upon it; for though the "floods lift up their voice," the Lord on high is mightier, Ps. xciii. 3, 4. No difficulties can obstruct Christ's gracious appearances for his people, when the set time is come. He will either find or force a way through the most tempestuous sea for their deliverance, Ps. xlii. 7, 8.

3. He "would have passed by them," that is, he set his face, and steered his course, as if he would have gone farther, and took no notice of them; this he did to awaken them to call to him. Note, Providence, when it is acting designedly and directly for the succour of God's people, yet sometimes seems as if it were giving them the go-by, and regarded not their case. They thought he would, but we may be sure he would not have passed by them.

4. They were frightened at the sight of him, supposing him to have been an apparition: "they all saw him, and were troubled," ver. 50, thinking it had been some demon, or evil genius, that haunted them, and raised this storm. We often perplex and frighten ourselves with phantasms, the creatures of our own fancy and imagination.

5. He encouraged them, and silenced their fears, by making himself known to them; he talked familiarly with them, saying, "Be of good cheer: it is I; be not afraid." Note, 1st. We know not Christ till he is pleased to reveal himself to us. "It is I; I, your Master; I, your friend; I, your Redeemer and Saviour. It is I, that came to a troublesome earth, and now to a tempestuous sea, to look after you." 2nd. The knowledge of Christ as he is in himself, and near to us, is enough to make the disciples of Christ cheerful even in a storm, and no longer fearful. "If it be so, why am I thus?" If it is Christ that is with thee, "be of good cheer, be not afraid." Our fears are soon satisfied if our mistakes be but rectified, especially our mistakes concerning Christ: see Gen. xxi. 19; 2 Kin. vi. 15-17. Christ's presence with us in a stormy day is enough to make us of good cheer, though clouds and darkness be round about us. He said, "It is I." He doth not tell them who he was, that needed not; they knew his voice, as the sheep know the voice of their own shepherd, Jno. x. 4. How readily doth the spouse say and again, "It is the voice of my beloved," Cant. ii. 8; v. 2. He said, εγώ εἰμι, "I am he;" or, "I am;" it is God's name when he comes to deliver Israel, Ex. iii. 14; so it is Christ's, now he comes to deliver his disciples. When Christ said to those that came to apprehend him by force, "I am he," they were struck down by it, Jno. xviii. 6. When he saith to those that come to apprehend him by faith, "I am he," they are raised up by it, and comforted.

6. "He went up to them into the ship," embarked in the same bottom with them, and so made them perfectly easy. Let them but have their Master with them, and all is well. And as soon as he was come into the ship, "the wind ceased." In the former storm that they were in, it is said, "He arose, and rebuked the winds, and said to the sea, Peace, be still," ch. iv. 39; but here we read of no such formal command given, only the wind ceased all of a sudden. Note, Our Lord Jesus will be sure to do his own work always effectually, though not always alike solemnly, and with observation. Though we hear not the command given, yet if thus the wind cease, and we have the comfort of a calm, say it is because Christ is in the ship, and his decree is gone forth or ever we are aware, Cant. vi. 12. When we come with Christ to heaven the wind ceaseth presently; there are no storms in the upper region.

7. They were more surprised and astonished at this miracle than did become them, and there was that at the bottom of their astonishment which was really culpable. "They were sore amazed in themselves," were in a perfect ecstasy, as if it were a new and unaccountable thing, as if Christ had never done the like before, and they had no reason to expect he should do it now. They ought to admire the power of Christ, and to be confirmed hereby in their belief of his being the Son of God; but what needed all this confusion about it? It was because "they considered not the miracle of the loaves;" had they given that its due weight, they would not have been so much surprised at this; for his multiplying the bread was as great an instance of his power as his walking on the water. They were strangely stupid and unthinking, and "their heart was hardened," or else they would not have thought it a thing incredible that Christ should command a calm. It is for want of a right understanding of Christ's former works that we are transported at the thought of his present works, as if there never were the like before.

Fifthly. When they came to the land of Gennesaret, which lay between Bethsaida and Capernaum, the people bid them very welcome. The men of that place presently knew Jesus, ver. 54, and knew what mighty works he did wherever he came, what an universal healer he was; they knew likewise that he used to stay but a little while at a place, and therefore they were concerned to improve the opportunity of this kind visit he made them: "they ran through that whole region round about," with all possible expedition, and at Tiberias, but the death of John is rightly placed at Machærus, east of the Jordan, and recently identified.

vi. 30-44. This narrative is one which is repeated in all the four Gospels, but with characteristic differences. Professor Bleek thought Mark wrote after the Gospel of John was written and published, and relies on verse 37 of this passage for one of his proofs. Both John and Mark mention the two hundred pennyworth of bread, it is true, but the fact proves nothing for Dr. Bleek.

vi. 33. For "afoot," render "on land." The words "and came together unto him" are omitted by some of the best ancient MSS.

vi. 34. For "and Jesus, when he came out, saw," some good MSS. read, "and when he came out, he saw."

vi. 36. Instead of "buy themselves bread: for they have nothing to eat," we may read, "buy themselves something to eat."

vi. 44. Ancient copies omit the word "about."

vi. 46. For "a mountain," read "the mountain."

"began to carry about in beds those that were sick," and not able to go themselves; there was no danger of their getting cold when they hoped to get a cure, ver. 55. Let him go where he would, he was crowded with patients. In the towns, in the cities, in the villages about the cities, "they laid the sick in the streets," to be in his way, and begged leave for them to "touch, if it were but the border of his garment," as the woman with the bloody issue did, by whom it should seem this method of application was first brought in, "and as many as touched were made whole." We do not find that they were desirous to be taught by him, only to be healed. If ministers could now cure people's bodily diseases, what multitudes would attend them! but it is sad to think how much more concerned the most of men are about their bodies than about their souls.

CHAPTER VII.

In this chapter we have, I. Christ's dispute with the scribes and Pharisees about eating meat with unwashen hands, ver. 1—13; and the needful instructions he gave to the people upon that occasion, and farther explained to his disciples, ver. 14—23. II. His curing the woman of Canaan's daughter that was possessed, ver. 24—30. III. The relief of a man that was deaf, and had an impediment in his speech, ver. 31—37.

HEN came together unto him the Pharisees, and certain of the scribes, which came from Jerusalem. 2 And when they saw some of his disciples eat bread with defiled, that is to say, with unwashen, hands, they found fault. 3 For the Pharisees, and all the Jews, except they wash their hands oft, eat not, holding the tradition of the elders. 4 And when they come from the market, except they wash, they eat not. And many other things there be, which they have received to hold, as the washing of cups, and pots, brassen vessels, and of tables. 5 Then the Pharisees and scribes asked him, Why walk not thy disciples according to the tradition of the elders, but eat bread with unwashen hands? 6 He answered and said unto them, Well hath Esaias prophesied of you hypocrites, as it is written, This people honoureth me with their lips, but their heart is far from me. 7 Howbeit in vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men. 8 For laying aside the commandment of God, ye hold the tradition of men, as the washing of pots and cups: and many other such like things ye do. 9 And he said unto them, Full well ye reject the commandment of God, that ye may keep your own tradition. 10 For Moses said, Honour thy father and thy mother; and, Whoso curseth father or mother, let him die the death: 11 But ye say, If a man shall say to his father or mother, It is Corban, that is to say, a gift, by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me; he shall be free. 12 And ye suffer him no more to do ought for his father or his mother; 13 Making the word of God of none effect through your tradition, which ye have delivered: and many such like things do ye. 14 And when he had called all the people unto him, he said unto them, Hearken unto me every one of you, and understand: 15 There is nothing from without a man, that entering into him can defile him: but the things which come out of him, those are they that defile the man. 16 If any man have ears to hear, let him hear. 17 And when he was entered into the house from the people, his disciples asked him concerning the parable. 18 And he saith unto them, Are ye so without understanding also? Do ye not perceive, that whatsoever thing from without entereth into the man, it cannot defile him; 19 Because it entereth not into his heart, but into the belly, and goeth out into the draught, purging all meats? 20 And he said, That which cometh out of the man, that defileth the man. 21 For from within, out of the heart of men, proceed evil thoughts, adulteries, fornications, murders, 22 Thefts, covetousness, wickedness, deceit, lasciviousness, an evil eye, blasphemy, pride, foolishness: 23 All these evil things come from within, and defile the man.

One great design of Christ's coming was to set aside the ceremonial law which God made, and to put an end to it; to make way for which he begins with the ceremonial law which men had made, and added to the law of God's making, and dischargeth his disciples from the obligation of that; which here he doth fully upon occasion of the offence which the Pharisees took at them for the violation of it. These Pharisees and scribes with whom he had this argument are said to come from Jerusalem down to Galilee, fourscore or a hundred miles, to pick quarrels with our Saviour there, where they supposed him to have the greatest interest and reputation. Had they come so far to be taught by him, their zeal had been commendable, but to come so far to oppose him, and to check the progress of his Gospel, was great wickedness. It should seem that the scribes and Pharisees at Jerusalem pretended not only to a pre-eminence above, but to an authority over, the country clergy; and therefore kept up their visitations, and sent inquisitors among them, as they did to John when he appeared, Jno. i. 19. Now in this passage we may observe,

First. What the tradition of the elders was. By it all were enjoined to "wash their hands" before meat, a cleanly custom, and no harm in it; and yet, as such, to be over nice in it discovers too great a care about the body, which is of the earth; but they placed religion in it, and would not leave it indifferent, as it was in its own nature: people were at their liberty to do it or not to do it; but they interposed their authority, and commanded all to do it on pain of excommunication. This they kept up as a tradition of the elders. The Papists pretend a zeal for the authority and antiquity of the church and its canons, and talk much of councils and fathers, when really it is nothing but a zeal for their own wealth, interest, and dominion that governs them; and so it was with the Pharisees.

We have here an account of the practice of the Pharisees and all the Jews, ver. 3, 4. 1. They washed their hands often; they washed them, πλυνον. The critics find a great deal of work about that word, some making it to note the frequency of their washing, so we render it; others think it signifies the pains they took in washing their hands; they washed with great care, they washed their hands to their wrists, so some: they lifted up their hands when they were wet, that the water might run to their elbows. 2. They particularly washed before they ate bread, that is, before they sat down to a solemn meal; for that was the rule: they must be sure to wash before they ate the bread on which they begged a blessing. 'Whosoever eats the bread over which they recite the benediction, Blessed be He that produceth bread, must wash his hands before and after,' or else he was thought to be defiled. 3. They took special care, when they came in from the markets, to wash their hands; from the judgment halls, so some: it signifies any place of concourse, where there were people of all sorts, and it might be supposed some heathen, or Jews under a ceremonial pollution, by coming near to whom they thought themselves polluted, saying, 'Stand by thyself, come not near me, I am holier than thou,' Isa. lxxv. 5. They say the rule of the rabbins was, that if they washed their hands well in the morning the first thing they did, that would serve for all day, provided they kept alone; but if they went into company, they must not at their return either eat or pray till they had washed their hands. Thus the elders gained a reputation among the people for sanctity, and thus they exercised and kept up an authority over their consciences. 4. They added to this the washing of cups, and pots, and brassen vessels, which they suspected had been made use of by heathens, or persons polluted; nay, and the very tables on which they ate their meat. There were many cases in which, by the law of Moses, washings were appointed, but they added to them, and enforced the observation of their own impositions as much as of God's institutions.

Secondly. What the practice of Christ's disciples was. They knew what the law was, and the common usage; but they understood themselves so well that they would not be bound up by it. They ate bread with defiled, that is, with unwashen hands, ver. 2. Eating with unwashen hands, they called eating with defiled hands; thus men keep up their superstitious vanities, by putting every thing into an ill name that contradicts them. The disciples knew (it is probable) that the Pharisees had their eye upon them, and yet they would not humour them by a compliance with their traditions, but took their liberty, as at other times, and ate bread with unwashen hands; and herein their righteousness, however it might seem to come short, did really exceed that of the scribes and Pharisees, Mat. v. 20.

Thirdly. The offence which the Pharisees took at this; "they found fault," ver. 2; they censured them as profane, and men of a loose conversation, or rather as men that would not submit to the power of the church to decree rites and ceremonies, and were therefore rebellious, factious, and schismatical. They brought a complaint against them to their Master, expecting that he should check them, and order them to conform; for they that are fond of their own inventions and impositions are commonly ready to appeal to Christ, as if he should countenance them, and as if his authority must interpose for the enforcing of them, and the rebuking of those that do not comply with them. They do not ask, 'Why do not thy disciples do as we do?' though that was it they meant, coveting to make themselves the standard; but, 'Why do not they walk according to the tradition of the elders?' ver. 5. To which it was easy to answer, that by receiving the doctrine of Christ they had "more understanding than all their teachers, yea, more than the ancients," Psa. cxix. 99, 100.

Fourthly. Christ's vindication of them; in which,

vi. 49. The Greek word for "spirit" is phantasma, which signifies much the same as our word "apparition."

vi. 51. The words "and wondered" occur in many MSS., but are omitted by some of the principal MSS. and editions.

vi. 52. "They considered not the miracle of the loaves" is an inexact rendering; "they did not understand about the loaves." The expression, "their heart was hardened," denotes that their sensibilities were slumbering and their perceptions unawakened

vi. 56. "The streets" here should be "the market-places." "The border" was rather the customary "fringe" attached to a Jewish dress.

vii. 2. The words "they found fault" are omitted by various important MSS. and editions. If this reading is adopted, the third and fourth verses are treated as a parenthesis, so that verse 2 ends with a comma, and its "when" answers to "then" of verse 5.

viii. 3. The word "oft" may mean "again and again," as though

1. He argues with the Pharisees concerning the authority by which this ceremony was imposed; and they were the fittest to be discoursed with concerning that, who were the great sticklers for it. But this he did not speak of publicly to the multitude, (as appears by his calling the people to him, ver. 14,) lest he should have seemed to stir them up to faction and discontent at their governors; but addressed it as a reproof to the persons concerned, for the rule is, sum cuique,—"let every one have his own."

1st. He reproves them for their hypocrisy, in pretending to honour God, when really they had no such design, in their religious observances, ver. 6, 7: "They honour me with their lips," they pretend it is for the glory of God that they impose those things, to distinguish themselves from the heathen, but really their heart is far from God, and is governed by nothing but ambition and covetousness. They would be thought hereby to appropriate themselves as a holy people to the Lord their God, when really it is the farthest thing in their thought. They rested in the outside of all their religious exercises, and their hearts were not right with God in them; and this was worshipping God in vain, for neither was he pleased with such sham devotions, nor were they profited by them.

2nd. He reproves them for placing religion in the inventions and injunctions of their elders and rulers. They taught "for doctrines the traditions of men;" when they should have been pressing upon people the great principles of religion, they were enforcing the canons of their church, and judged of people's being Jews, or not, according as they did or did not conform to them, without any consideration had whether they lived in obedience in God's laws or not. It was true there were divers washings imposed by the law of Moses, Heb. ix. 10, which were intended to signify that inward purification of the heart from worldly, fleshly lusts, which God requires as absolutely necessary to our communion with him; but instead of providing the substance, they presumptuously added to the ceremony, and were very nice in "washing pots and cups;" and observe, he adds, "many other such like things ye do," ver. 8. Note, Superstition is an endless thing. If one human invention and institution be admitted, though seemingly never so innocent, as this of washing hands, "behold, a troop comes," a door is opened for "many other such like things."

3rd. He reproves them for "laying aside the commandment of God," and overlooking that, not urging that in their preaching, and in their discipline conniving at the violation of that, as if that were no longer of force, ver. 8. Note, It is the mischief of impositions that too often they who are zealous for them have little zeal for the essential duties of religion, but can contentedly see them laid aside. Nay, they rejected "the commandment of God," ver. 9. You do fairly dissuade and abolish the commandment of God; and even by your traditions make "the Word of God of none effect," ver. 13. God's statutes shall not only lie forgotten, as antiquated, obsolete laws, but they shall in effect stand repealed, that their traditions may take place. They were intrusted to expound the law, and to enforce it; and, under pretence of using that power, they violated the law, and dissolved the bonds of it—destroying the text with the comment.

This he gives them a particular instance of, and a flagrant one: God commanded children to honour their parents, not only by the law of Moses, but antecedent to that, by the law of nature; and whoso revileth, or speaketh evil of father or mother, "let him die the death," ver. 4. From whence it is easy to infer that it is the duty of children, if their parents be poor, to relieve them according to their ability; and if those children are worthy to die that curse their parents, much more those that starve them. But if a man will but conform himself in all points to the tradition of the elders, they will find him out an expedient by which he may be discharged from this obligation, ver. 11. If his parents be in want, and he has wherewithal to help them, but has no mind to do it, let him swear by the corban, that is, by the gold of the temple, and the gift upon the altar, that his parents shall not be profited by him, that he will not relieve them; and if they ask any thing of him let him tell them this, and it is enough; as if by the obligation of this wicked vow, he had discharged himself from the obligation of God's holy law; thus Dr. Hammond understands it. And it is said to be an ancient canon of the rabbins, 'that vows take place in things commanded by the law, as well as in things indifferent;' so that if a man makes a vow which cannot be ratified without breaking a commandment, the vow must be ratified, and the commandment violated; so Dr. Whitby. Such doctrine as this the papists teach, discharging children from all obligation to their parents by their monastical vows, and their entrance into religion, as they call it. He concludes, and "many such like things do ye." Where will men stop when once they have made the Word of God give way to their tradition? These eager imposers of such ceremonies, at first only made light of God's commandments, in comparison with their traditions, but afterwards made void God's commandments, if they stood in competition with them. And all this, in effect, Isaiah prophesied of them; what he said of the hypocrites of his own day, was applicable to the scribes and Pharisees, ver. 6. Note, When we see and complain of the wickedness of the present times, yet we do not inquire wisely of that matter, if we say that all the former days were better than these, Ecc. vii. 10. The worst of hypocrites and evil doers have had their predecessors.

2. He instructs the people concerning the principles upon which this ceremony was grounded; and it was requisite that this part of his discourse should be public, for it related to daily practice, and was designed to rectify a great mistake which the people were led into by their elders; he therefore "called the people unto him," ver. 14, and bade them "hear and understand." Note, It is not enough for the common people to hear, but they must understand what they hear. When Christ would run down the tradition of the Pharisees about washing before meat, he strikes at the opinion which was the root of it. Note, Corrupt customs are best cured by rectifying corrupt notions. Now that which he goes about to set them right in is, what the pollution is which we are in danger of being damaged by, ver. 15. 1st. Not by the meat we eat, though it be eaten with unwashed hands, that is but from without, and goes through a man. But, 2nd. It is by the breaking out of the corruption that is in our hearts; the mind and conscience is defiled, guilt is contracted, and we become odious in the sight of God by that which comes out of us; our wicked thoughts and affections, words and actions, these defile us, and these only; our care must therefore be to wash our hearts from wickedness.

3. He gives his disciples, in private, an explication of the instructions he gave the people. They asked him when they had him by himself "concerning the parable," ver. 17; for to them it seems it was a parable. Now, in answer to their inquiry, 1st. He reproves their dullness: "Are ye so without understanding also?" Are you dull also; as dull as the people that cannot understand, as dull as the Pharisees that will not? Are ye so dull? He doth not expect they should understand every thing; but, Are ye so weak as not to understand this? 2nd. He explains this truth to them, that they might perceive it, and then they would believe it, for it carried its own evidence along with it. Some truths prove themselves, if they be but rightly explained and apprehended. If we understand the spiritual nature of God, and of his law, and what it is that is offensive to him, and disfits us for communion with him, we shall soon perceive, First. That that which we eat and drink cannot defile us so as to call for any religious washing; it goes into the stomach, and passeth the several digestions and secretions that nature has appointed, and what there may be in it that is defiling, it is voided and gone. "Meats for the belly, and the belly for meats; but God shall destroy both it and them." But, Secondly. It is that which comes out from the heart, the corrupt heart, that defiles us; as by the ceremonial law, whatsoever (almost) comes out of a man, defiles him, Lev. xv. 2; Deut. xxiii. 13; so what comes out from the mind of a man, is that which defiles him before God, and calls for a religious washing, ver. 21. "From within, out of the heart of men," which they boast of the goodness of, and think is the best part of them, thence that which defiles doth proceed, thence comes all the mischief; as a corrupt fountain sends forth corrupt streams, so doth a corrupt heart send forth corrupt reasonings, corrupt appetites and passions, and all those wicked words and actions which are produced by them. Divers particulars are instanced in, as in Matthew; we had one there which is not here, and that is false witness-bearing; but here are seven mentioned here, to be added to those we had there. 1st. "Covetousnesses," for it is plural; μακροψυχία, "immoderate desires" of more of the wealth of the world, and the gratifications of sense, and still more, still crying, Give, give. Hence we read of a heart "exercised with covetous practices," 2 Pet. ii. 14. 2nd. "Wickedness," πονηρία, malice, and hatred, and ill-will, a desire to do mischief, and a delight in mischief done. 3rd. "Deceit," which is wickedness covered and disguised, that it may be the more securely and effectually committed. 4th. "Lasciviousness," that fittiness and all wanton dalliances. 5th. The "evil eye," that is, the envious eye, and the covetous eye, grudging others the good we give them, or do for them, Pr. xxiii. 6; or grieving at the good they do or enjoy. 6th. "Pride," βρογγυαία, exalting ourselves in our own conceit above others, and looking down with scorn and contempt upon others. 7th. "Foolishness," ἀπαισιμία, imprudence, inconsideration; some understand it especially of vain-glorious boasting, which St. Paul calls foolishness, 2 Cor. xi. 19, because it is here joined with pride. I rather take it for that rashness in speaking and acting which is the cause of so much evil. Ill thinking is put first, as that which is the spring of all our commissions; and unthinking put last, as that which is the spring of all our omissions. Of all these he concludes, ver. 23. First. That they "come from within," from the corrupt nature, the carnal mind, the evil treasure in the heart. Justly it is said that the "inward part is very wickedness," it must needs be so, when all this comes from within. Secondly. That "they defile the man;" they render a man unfit for communion with God; they bring a stain upon the conscience; and, if not mortified and rooted out, will shut men out of the new Jerusalem, into which no unclean thing shall enter.

24 And from thence he arose, and went into the borders of Tyre and Sidon, and entered into an house, and would have no man know it: but he could not be hid. 25 For a certain woman, whose young daughter had an unclean spirit, heard of him, and came and fell at his feet: 26 The woman was a Greek, a Syrophenician by nation; and she besought him that he would cast forth the devil out of her daughter. 27 But Jesus said unto her, Let the children first be filled: for it is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it unto the dogs. 28 And she answered and said unto him, Yes, Lord: yet the dogs under the table eat of the children's crumbs. 29 And he said unto her, For this saying go thy way; the devil is gone out of thy daughter. 30 And when she was come to her house, she found the devil gone out, and her daughter laid upon the bed.

See here, I. How humbly Christ was pleased to conceal himself. Never man was so cried up as he was in Galilee; and therefore to teach us, though not to decline any opportunity of doing good, yet not to be fond of popular applause, "he arose from thence and went into the borders of Tyre and Sidon," where he was little known, and there he entered, not into a synagogue, or place of concourse, but into a private house, and he "would have no man know it," because it was foretold concerning him, "he shall not strive nor cry, neither shall his voice be heard in the streets." Not but that he was willing to preach and heal here as well as in other places, but for this he would be sought unto. Note, As there is a time to appear, so there is a time to retire; or, he would not be known, because he was upon the borders of Tyre and Sidon, among Gentiles, to whom he would not be so forward to shew himself, as to the tribes of Israel, whose glory he was to be.

II. How graciously he was pleased to manifest himself notwithstanding. Though he would not carry a harvest of miraculous cures into those parts, yet it should seem he came on purpose to drop a handful, to let fall this one which we have here an account of. "He could not be hid;" for though a candle may be put under a bushel, the sun cannot. Christ was too well known to be long incognito,—"unknown," any where; the oil of gladness which he was anointed with, like the ointment of the right hand, would betray itself, and fill the house with its odours. Those that had only heard his fame, could not converse with him but they would soon say, This must be Jesus. Now observe,

First. The application made to him by a poor woman in distress and trouble. She was a Gentile, a Greek, a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel, an alien to the covenant of promise; she was, by extraction, a Syrophenician, and not in any degree proselyted to the Jewish religion; she had a daughter, a young daughter, that was possessed with the devil. How many and grievous are the calamities that young children are subject to! Her address was, 1. Very humble, pressing, and importunate; she "heard of him, and came and fell at his feet." Note, Those that would obtain mercy from Christ, must throw themselves at his feet, that is, must refer themselves to him, humble themselves before him, and give up themselves to be ruled by him. Christ never put any from him that fell at his feet, which a poor trembling soul may one splash of water would not satisfy them. Others explain the word to mean "diligently," "rubbing them with the fist," "as far as the elbow," &c. The English version is the same as the Vulgate.

vii. 4. The Greek words for "wash" and "washing" in this verse are "baptise" and "baptisms," but they are rightly translated. The allusion is to the numerous lustrations or purifications which the ceremonialism of the Pharisees required. According to Lightfoot, these purifications could be effected in different ways.

vii. 8. Some early copies and other authorities omit the words rendered "as the washing of pots and cups; and many other such like things ye do;" so the Sinaitic, Vatican, &c. The words appear in the Alexandrian and Cambridge MSS., the clauses of the verse being inverted in the latter.

vii. 11. The sense of the latter clause is, "whatever thou mightest have been profited by from me is Corban," i.e., "a gift or oblation." The man who did not wish to render aid to his parents had only to do that has not boldness and confidence to throw itself into his arms. 2. It was very particular; she tells him what she wanted; Christ gave poor supplicants leave to be thus free with him; "she besought him that he would cast forth the devil out of her daughter," ver. 26. Note. The greatest blessing we can ask of Christ for our children is, that he would break the power of Satan, that is, the power of sin, in their souls; and particularly, that he would cast forth the unclean spirit, that they may be temples of the Holy Ghost, and he may dwell in them.

Secondly. The discouragement he gave to this address, ver. 27. He said unto her, "Let the children first be filled." Let the Jews have all the miracles wrought for them that they have occasion for, who are in a particular manner God's chosen people; and let not that which was intended for them be thrown to those who are not of God's family, and who have not that knowledge of him, and interest in him, which they have, and who are as dogs in comparison of them, vile and profane; and who are as dogs to them, snarling at them, spiteful towards them, and ready to worry them. Note, Where Christ knows the faith of poor supplicants to be strong, he sometimes delights to try it, and put it to the stretch. But his saying, "Let the children first be filled," intimates that there was mercy in reserve for the Gentiles, and not far off; for the Jews began already to be surfeited with the Gospel of Christ, and some of them had desired him to depart out of their coasts. The children begin to play with their meat, and their leavings, their loathings, would be a feast for the Gentiles. The apostles went by this rule, "Let the children first be filled;" let the Jews have the first offer, and if their full souls loathe this honeycomb, "I, o, we turn to the Gentiles."

Thirdly. The turn she gave to this word of Christ, which made against her, and her improvement of it to make for her, ver. 28. She said, "Yes, Lord," "I own it is true that the children's bread ought not to be cast to the dogs, but they were never denied the crumbs of that bread; nay, it belongs to them, and they are allowed a place under the table, that they may be ready to receive them. I ask not for a loaf, no, nor for a morsel, only for a crumb; do not refuse me that." This she speaks, not as undervaluing the mercy, or making light of it in itself, but magnifying the abundance of miraculous cures with which she heard the Jews were feasted, in comparison with which a single cure was but as a crumb. "Gentiles do not come in crowds, as the Jews do; I come alone." Perhaps she had heard of Christ's feeding five thousand lately at once, after which, even when they had gathered up the fragments, there could not but be some crumbs left for the dogs.

Fourthly. The grant Christ thereupon made of her request: Is she thus humble, thus earnest? "For this saying go thy way," thou shalt have what thou camest for, "the devil is gone out of thy daughter," ver. 29. This encourageth us to pray, and not to faint; to continue instant in prayer, not doubting but to prevail at last; the vision at the end shall speak and not lie. Christ's saying it was done did it effectually, as at other times his saying, "Let it be done;" for, ver. 30, she came to her house, depending upon the word of Christ that her daughter was healed; and so she found it; the devil was gone out. Note, Christ can conquer Satan at a distance; and it was not only when the demons saw him that they yielded to his power, as ch. iii. 11, but when they saw him not; for the Spirit of the Lord is not bound or bounded. She found her daughter, not in any toss or agitation, but very quietly laid on the bed, and reposing herself, waiting for her mother's return to rejoice with her, that she was so finely well.

31 And again, departing from the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, he came unto the sea of Galilee, through the midst of the coasts of Decapolis. 32 And they bring unto him one that was deaf, and had an impediment in his speech; and they beseech him to put his hand upon him. 33 And he took him aside from the multitude, and put his fingers into his ears, and he spit, and touched his tongue; 34 And looking up to heaven, he sighed, and saith unto him, Ephphatha, that is, Be opened. 35 And straightway his ears were opened, and the string of his tongue was loosed, and he spake plain. 36 And he charged them that they should tell no man: but the more he charged them, so much the more a great deal they published it; 37 And were beyond measure astonished, saying, He hath done all things well: he maketh both the deaf to hear, and the dumb to speak.

Our Lord Jesus seldom stayed long in a place, for he knew where his work lay, and attended the changes of it. When he had cured the woman of Canaan's daughter, he had done what he had to do in that place, and therefore presently left those parts, and returned "to the sea of Galilee," whereabout his usual residence was; yet did not come directly thither, but fetched a compass "through the midst of the coasts of Decapolis," which lay mostly on the other side Jordan: such long walks did our Lord Jesus take, when he "went about doing good." Now here we have the story of a cure that Christ wrought, which is not recorded by any other of the evangelists; it is of one that was deaf and dumb.

I. His case was sad, ver. 32. There were those that brought "to him one that was deaf," some think born deaf, and then he must be dumb of course; others think by some distemper, or disaster, he was become deaf, or at least thick of hearing; and he "had an impediment in his speech." He was μωγίλας; some think he was quite dumb, others that he could not speak but with great difficulty to himself, and so as scarcely to be understood by those that heard him; he was tongue-tied, so that he was perfectly unfit for conversation, and deprived both of the pleasure and of the profit of it; he had not the satisfaction either of hearing other people talk, or of telling his own mind. Let us take occasion from hence to give thanks to God for preserving to us the sense of hearing, especially that we may be capable of hearing the word of God; and the faculty of speech, especially that we may be capable of speaking God's praises; and let us look with compassion upon those that are deaf or dumb, and treat them with great tenderness. They that brought this poor man to Christ, besought him that he would "put his hand upon him," as the prophets did upon those whom they blessed in the name of the Lord. It is not said they besought him to cure him, but "to put his hand upon him," to take cognizance of his case, and put forth his power to do to him as he pleased.

II. His cure was solemn, and some of the circumstances of it were singular. First, Christ "took him aside from the multitude," ver. 33. Ordinarily he wrought his miracles publicly before all the people, to shew that they would bear the strictest scrutiny and inspection; but this he did privately, to shew that he did not seek his own glory, and to teach us to avoid every thing that savours of ostentation. Let us learn of Christ to be humble, and to do good where no eye sees but his that is all eye.

Secondly, He used more significant actions in the doing of this cure than usual. 1. He "put his fingers into his ears," as if he would syringe them, and fetch out that which stopped them up. 2. He spit upon his own finger, and then "touched his tongue," as if he would moisten his mouth, and so loosen that with which his tongue was tied; these were no causes that could in the least contribute to his cure, but only signs of the exerting of that power which Christ had in himself to cure him, for the encouraging his faith, and theirs that brought him. The application was all from himself, it was his own fingers that he put into his ears, and his own spittle that he put upon his tongue; for he alone heals.

Thirdly, He looked up to heaven, to give his Father the praise of what he did; for he sought his praise, and did his will, and, as Mediator, acted in dependence on him, and with an eye to him. Thus he signified that it was by a Divine power, a power he had as the Lord from heaven, and brought with him thence, that he did this; for the hearing ear, and the seeing eye, the Lord has made, and can remake, even both of them. He also hereby directed his patient, who could see, though he could not hear, to look up to heaven for relief. Moses, with his stammering tongue, is directed to look that way, Ex. iv. 11. "Who hath made man's mouth? or who maketh the dumb, or deaf, or the seeing, or blind? Have not I the Lord?"

Fourthly, He sighed; not as if he found any difficulty in working this miracle, or obtaining power to do it from his Father; but thus he expresseth his pity of the miseries of human life, and his sympathy with the afflicted in their afflictions, as one that was himself touched with the feeling of their infirmities. And as to this man, he sighed, not because he was loath to do him this kindness, or did it with reluctance; but because of the many temptations which he would be exposed to, and the sins he would be in danger of, the tongue sins, after the restoring of his speech to him, which before he was free from. He had better be tongue-tied still, unless he have grace to keep his tongue as with a bridle, Ps. xxxix. 1.

Fifthly, He said, "Ephphatha, that is, Be opened." This was nothing that looked like spell, or charm, such as they used that had familiar spirits, who peeped and muttered, Isa. viii. 19. Christ speaks as one having authority, and power went along with the word. "Be opened" served both parts of the cure; "Let the ears be opened, let the lips be opened, let him hear and speak freely, and let the restraint be taken off, and the effect was answerable, ver. 35; "straightway his ears were opened, and the string of his tongue loosed," and all was well; and happy he who, as soon as he had his hearing and speech, had the blessed Jesus so near him to converse with.

Now this cure was, 1. A proof of Christ's being the Messiah, for it was foretold that by his power "the ears of the deaf should be unstopped, and the tongue of the dumb should be made to sing," Isa. xxxv. 5, 6. 2. It was a specimen of the operations of his Gospel upon the minds of men. The great command of the Gospel and grace of Christ to poor sinners is, "Ephphatha, Be opened." Grotius applies it thus, that the internal impediments of the mind are removed by the Spirit of Christ, as those bodily impediments were by the word of his power. He opens the heart, as he did Lydia's, and thereby opens the ear to receive the Word of God, and opens the mouth in prayer and praises.

Sixthly, He ordered it to be kept very private; but it was made very public. 1. It was his humility, that "he charged them they should tell no man," ver. 36. Most men will proclaim their own godness, or at least desire that others should proclaim it; but Christ, though he was himself in no danger of being puffed up with it, yet, knowing that we are, would thus set us an example of self-denial, as in other things, so especially in praise and applause. We should take pleasure in doing good, but not in its being known. 2. It was their zeal, that though he charged them to say nothing of it, yet "they published it," before Christ would have had it published; but they meant honestly, and therefore it is to be reckoned rather an act of indiscretion than an act of disobedience, ver. 37. But they that told it, and they that heard it, "were beyond measure astonished," ὑπερπερισσῶς, "more than above measure;" they were exceedingly affected with it, and this was said by every body, it was the common verdict, "He hath done all things well," ver. 37; whereas there were those that hated and persecuted him as an evil-doer, they are ready to witness for him, not only that he has done no evil, but that he has done a great deal of good, and has done it well, modestly and humbly, and very devoutly, and all dedicate to God what would have been useful to them, and was exonerated from blame by traditional interpretations and inventions. The words "he shall be free" are added to the original.

vii. 16. The words of this verse are not found in the Sinaitic and Vatican MSS., but are in the Alexandrian, the Cambridge, &c., as well as in the Syriac-Peshito and Philoxenian versions, the Latin Vulgate, &c. The verse is retained by very good modern editors and critics.

vii. 19. The word "draught" here has the sense of "draught-house" in 2 Kings x. 27; hence Robinson in his Lexicon, "a privy;" others, "a sewer," or cesspool. This receptacle is represented as the purifier of all that is eaten; only because what the body cannot utilise is there deposited.

vii. 26. The woman is called a Greek [Hellenis] as well as a Syrophenician. The former term may be used in the wider sense of Gentile, as often elsewhere in the New Testament, and hence in gratis, "without money and without price," which added to the lustre of his good works. "He maketh both the deaf to hear, and the dumb to speak," and that is well; it is well for them, it is well for their relations, to whom they had been a burthen; and therefore they are inexcusable who speak ill of him.

CHAPTER VIII.

In this chapter we have, I. Christ's miraculous feeding four thousand with seven loaves and a few small fishes, ver. 1-9. II. His refusing to give the Pharisees a sign from heaven, ver. 10-13. III. His cautioning his disciples to take heed of the leaven of Pharisism, and Herodianism, ver. 14-21. IV. His giving sight to a blind man at Bethsaida, ver. 22-26. V. Peter's confession of him, ver. 27-30. VI. The notice he gave his disciples of his own approaching sufferings, ver. 31-33; and the warning he gave them to prepare for sufferings likewise, ver. 34-38.

N those days the multitude being very great, and having nothing to eat, Jesus called his disciples unto him, and saith unto them, 2 I have compassion on the multitude, because they have now been with me three days, and have nothing to eat:

3 And if I send them away fasting to their own houses, they will faint by the way: for divers of them came from far. 4 And his disciples answered him, From whence can a man satisfy these men with bread here in the wilderness? 5 And he asked them, How many loaves have ye? And they said, Seven. 6 And he commanded the people to sit down on the ground: and he took the seven loaves, and gave thanks, and brake, and gave to his disciples to set before them; and they did set them before the people. 7 And they had a few small fishes: and he blessed, and commanded to set them also before them. 8 So they did eat, and were filled: and they took up of the broken meat that was left seven baskets. 9 And they that had eaten were about four thousand: and he sent them away.

We had the story of a miracle very like this before in this Gospel, ch. vi. 35, and of this same miracle, Mat. xv. 32; and here is little or no addition or alteration as to the circumstances; yet, observe,

I. That our Lord Jesus was mightily followed: "The multitude was very great," ver. 1; notwithstanding the wicked arts of the scribes and Pharisees to blemish him, and to blast his interest, the common people, who had more honesty, and therefore more true wisdom than their leaders, kept up their high thoughts of him. We may suppose this multitude were generally of the meaner sort of people; with such Christ conversed and was familiar; for thus he humbled himself, and made himself of no reputation, and thus encouraged the meanest to come to him for life and grace.

II. Those that followed him underwent a great deal of difficulty in following him; "they were with him three days, and had nothing to eat;" that was hard service: never let the Pharisees say that "Christ's disciples fast not." It is likely there were those that brought some food with them from home, but by this time it was all spent, and they had a great way home, and yet they continued with Christ, and did not speak of leaving him till he spoke of dismissing them. Note, True zeal makes nothing of hardships in the way of duty. They that have a full feast for their souls may be content with slender provision for their bodies. It was an old saying among the puritans, 'Brown bread and the Gospel is good fare.'

III. As Christ has a compassion for all that are in wants and straits, so he has a special concern for those that are reduced to straits by their zeal and diligence in attending on him. Christ said, "I have compassion on the multitude;" whom the proud Pharisees looked upon with disdain, the humble Jesus looked upon with pity and tenderness; and thus must we "honour all men." But that which he chiefly considers is, "they have been with me three days, and have nothing to eat." Whatever losses we sustain, or hardships we go through, for Christ's sake, and in love to him, he will take care they shall be made up to us, one way or other: "they that seek the Lord shall not" long "want any good thing," Ps. xxxiv. 10. Observe with what sympathy Christ saith, ver. 3, "If I send them away fasting to their own houses, they will faint by the way" for hunger. Christ knows and considers our frame; and he is for the body; if with it we glorify him, verily we shall be fed. He considered that many "of them came from far," and had a great way home. When we see multitudes attending upon the word preached, it is comfortable to think that Christ knows whence they all come, though we do not: "I know thy works, and where thou dwellest," Rev. ii. 13. Christ would by no means have them go home fasting, for he doth not use to send those empty away from him that in a right manner attend on him.

IV. The doubts of Christians are sometimes made to work for the magnifying of the power of Christ. The disciples could not imagine whence so many men should be satisfied with bread here in this wilderness, ver. 4. That therefore must needs be wonderful, and appear so much the more so, which the disciples looked upon as impossible.

V. Christ's time to act for the relief of his people is when things are brought to the last extremity; when they were ready to faint, Christ provided for them; that he might not invite them to follow him for the loaves, he did not supply them but when they were utterly reduced, and then "he sent them away."

VI. The bounty of Christ is inexhaustible; and to evidence that, Christ repeated this miracle, to shew that he is still the same for the succour and supply of his people that attend upon him: his favours are renewed, as our wants and necessities are. In the former miracle Christ used all the bread he had, which were five loaves, and fed all the guests he had, which were five thousand; and so he did now; though he might have said, if five loaves would feed five thousand, four may feed four thousand; he took all the seven loaves, and fed with them the four thousand, for he would teach us to take things as they are, and accommodate ourselves to them; to use what we have, and make the best of that which is: here it was as in the dispensing of the manna, "he that gathered much had nothing over, and he that gathered little had no lack."

VII. In our Father's house, in our Master's house, "there is bread enough, and to spare;" there is a fulness in Christ, which he communicates to all that passeth through his hands; so that from it we receive, and "grace for grace," Jno. i. 16. Those need not fear wanting that have a Christ to live upon.

VIII. It is good for those that follow Christ to keep together; these followers of Christ continued in a body, four thousand of them together, and Christ fed them all; Christ's sheep must abide by the flock, and go forth by their footsteps, and verily they shall be fed.

10 And straightway he entered into a ship with his disciples, and came into the parts of Dalmanutha. 11 And the Pharisees came forth, and began to question with him, seeking of him a sign from heaven, tempting him. 12 And he sighed deeply in his spirit, and saith, Why doth this generation seek after a sign? verily I say unto you, There shall no sign be given unto this generation. 13 And he left them, and entering into the ship again departed to the other side. 14 Now the disciples had forgotten to take bread, neither had they in the ship with them more than one loaf. 15 And he charged them, saying, Take heed, beware of the leaven of the Pharisees, and of the leaven of Herod. 16 And they reasoned among themselves, saying, It is because we have no bread. 17 And when Jesus knew it, he saith unto them, Why reason ye, because ye have no bread? perceive ye not yet, neither understand? have ye your heart yet hardened? 18 Having eyes, see ye not? and having ears, hear ye not? and do ye not remember? 19 When I brake the five loaves among five thousand, how many baskets full of fragments took ye up? They say unto him, Twelve. 20 And when the seven among four thousand, how many baskets full of fragments took ye up? And they said, Seven. 21 And he said unto them, How is it that ye do not understand?

Still Christ is upon motion; now he visits the parts of Dalmanutha, that no corner of the land of Israel might say but that they had had his presence with them. He came thither by ship, ver. 13; but meeting with occasions of dispute the Syriac version it is rendered by a word meaning a heathen or profane. We can scarcely think she was an idolater; she is called Syrophenician because she was a native of the region of Syria, which had been the home of the old Phœnicians. The same woman is called a Canaanite in Matt. xv. 22, because the Jews called Phœnicia by the name of Canaan.

vii. 31. Here the word "coasts" is both times applicable to the borders of a province, and has no reference whatever to the seashore. Here the Sinaitic and Vatican MSS. and other important witnesses read, "And again going forth from the borders of Tyre, he came through Sidon to the sea of Galilee," &c. If this reading is correct, our Lord journeyed from Tyre toward the north to Sidon, and then returned by a route considerably inland, until he reached the sea of Galilee. As already noted, Decapolis was mostly on the east of the upper Jordan and its lakes. Jesus, therefore, must have journeyed by a circuitous route overland to the sea of Galilee.

there, and not with opportunities of doing good, he entered into the ship again, ver. 13, and came back. In these verses we are told,

First. How he refused to gratify the Pharisees who challenged him to give them "a sign from heaven." They "came forth" on purpose to "question with him," not to propose questions to him that they might learn of him, but to cross questions with him that they might ensnare him.

1. They demanded of him "a sign from heaven," as if the signs he gave them on earth, which were more familiar to them, and were more capable of being examined and inquired into, were not sufficient. There was "a sign from heaven" at his baptism, in the descent of the dove, and the voice, Mat. iii. 16, 17; it was public enough; and if they had attended John's baptism, as they ought to have done, they might themselves have seen it. Afterwards, when he was nailed to the cross, they prescribed a new sign, "Let him come down from the cross, and we will believe him;" thus obstinate infidelity will still have something to say, though never so unreasonable. They demanded this sign, "tempting him," not in hopes he would give it them, that they might be satisfied, but in hopes he would not, that they might imagine themselves to have a pretence for their infidelity.

2. He denied them their demand. "He sighed deeply in his spirit," ver. 12; "he groaned," so some; "being grieved for the hardness of their hearts," and the little influence that his preaching and miracles had had upon them. Note, The infidelity of those that have long enjoyed the means of conviction, is a great grief to the Lord Jesus; it troubles him that sinners should thus stand in their own light, and put a bar in their own door. 1st. He expostulates with them upon this demand: "Why doth this generation seek after a sign?" This generation, that is so unworthy to have the Gospel brought to it, and to have any sign accompanying it; "this generation," that so greedily swallows the traditions of the elders without the confirmation of any sign at all; "this generation," into which, by the calculating of the times prefixed in the Old Testament, they might easily perceive that the coming of the Messiah must fall; "this generation," that has had such plenty of sensible and merciful signs given them in the cure of their sick, what an absurdity is it for them to desire a sign? 2nd. He refuseth to answer their demand: "Verily I say unto you, there shall no sign," no such sign, "be given to this generation." When God spoke to particular persons in a particular case, out of the road of his common dispensation, they were encouraged to ask a sign, as Gideon and Ahaz; but when he speaks in general to all, as in the law and Gospel, sending each with their own evidence, it is presumption to prescribe other signs than what he has given: "Shall any teach God knowledge?" He denied them, and then left them, as men not fit to be talked with; if they will not be convinced, they shall not; leave them to their strong delusions.

Secondly. How he warned his disciples against the leaven of the Pharisees and of Herod. Observe here,

1. What the caution was, ver. 15: "Take heed, beware," lest you partake "of the leaven of the Pharisees," lest ye embrace the tradition of the elders, which they are so wedded to; lest ye be proud, and hypocritical, and ceremonious, like them; Matthew adds, "and of the Sadducees;" Mark adds, "and of Herod," whence some gather that Herod and his courtiers were generally Sadducees, that is, deists, men of no religion. Others give this sense: the Pharisees demanded "a sign from heaven," and Herod, he was long desirous to see some miracle wrought by Christ, Lu. xxiii. 7, such as he should prescribe; so that the leaven of both was the same; they were unsatisfied with the signs they had, and would have others, of their own devising; "Take heed of this leaven," saith Christ; "be convinced by the miracles you have seen, and covet not to see more."

2. How they misunderstood this caution. It seems, at their putting to sea this time, they "had forgotten to take bread, and had not in their ship more than one loaf," ver. 14. When therefore Christ bade them "beware of the leaven of the Pharisees," they understood it as an intimation to them not to apply themselves to any of the Pharisees for relief when they came to the other side, for they had lately been offended at them for eating with "unwashed hands." "They reasoned among themselves" what should be the meaning of this caution, and concluded, "It is because we have no bread." He saith this to reproach us for being so careless as to go to sea, and go among strangers, with but one loaf of bread; he doth in effect tell us we must be brought to short allowance, and must eat our bread by weight. They reasoned it; βελόρυλλον, they disputed about it; one said, "It was along of you," and the other said, "It was along of you, that we are so ill provided for this voyage;" thus distrust of God makes Christ's disciples quarrel among themselves.

3. The reproof Christ gave them for their uneasiness in this matter, as it argued a disbelief of his power to supply them, notwithstanding the abundant experience they had had of it. The reproof is given with some warmth, for he knew their hearts, and knew they needed to be thus soundly chidden; "Perceive ye not yet, neither understand," that which you have had so many demonstrations of? "Have ye your hearts yet hardened," so as that nothing will make any impression upon them, or bring them to compliance with your Master's designs? "Having eyes, see ye not?" that which is plain before your eyes? "Having ears, hear ye not?" that which you have been so often told? How strangely stupid and senseless are you? "Do ye not remember" that which was done but the other day, "when I brake the five loaves among the five thousand," and soon after the "seven loaves among the four thousand?" Do ye not remember "how many baskets full ye took up" of the fragments? Yes, they did remember, and could tell that they took up twelve baskets full one time, and seven another. Why, then, saith he, "How is it that ye do not understand?" As if he that multiplied five loaves, and seven, could not multiply one; they seemed to suspect that that one was not matter enough to work upon, if he should have a mind to entertain his hearers a third time; and if that was their thought, it was indeed a very senseless one, as if it were not all alike to the Lord to save by many or few, and as easy to make one loaf to feed five thousand as five. It was therefore proper to mind them not only of the sufficiency, but of the overplus, of the former meals; and justly were they chidden for not understanding what Christ therein designed, and what they from thence might have learned. Note, 1st. The experiences we have had of God's goodness to us in the way of duty greatly aggravate our distrust of him, which is therefore very provoking to the Lord Jesus. 2nd. Our not understanding the true intent and meaning of God's favours to us, is equivalent to our not remembering them. 3rd. We are therefore overwhelmed with present cares and distrusts, because we do not understand and remember what we have known and seen of the power and goodness of our Lord Jesus. It would be a great support to us to consider the days of old, and we are wanting both to God and ourselves if we do not. 4th. When we thus forget the works of God, and distrust him, we should chide ourselves severely for it, as Christ doth his disciples here: "Am I thus without understanding? How is it that my heart is thus hardened?"

22 And he cometh to Bethsaida; and they bring a blind man unto him, and besought him to touch him. 23 And he took the blind man by the hand, and led him out of the town; and when he had spit on his eyes, and put his hands upon him, he asked him if he saw ought. 24 And he looked up, and said, I see men as trees, walking. 25 After that he put his hands again upon his eyes, and made him look up: and he was restored, and saw every man clearly. 26 And he sent him away to his house, saying, Neither go into the town, nor tell it to any in the town.

This cure is related only by this evangelist, and there is something singular in the circumstances.

First. Here is a blind man brought to Christ by his friends, with a desire that he would touch him, ver. 22. Here appears the faith of those that brought him; they doubted not but one touch of Christ's hand would recover him his sight; but the man himself shewed not that earnestness for, or expectation of a cure that other blind men did. If those that are spiritually blind do not pray for themselves, yet let their friends and relations pray for them, that Christ would be pleased to touch them.

Secondly. Here is Christ leading this blind man, ver. 23. He did not bid his friends lead him, but (which speaks his wonderful condescension) he himself "took him by the hand and led him," to teach us to be, as Job was, "eyes to the blind," Job xxix. 15. Never had poor blind man such a leader. He led him "out of the town;" had he herein only designed privacy, he might have led him into a house, into an inner chamber, and have cured him there; but he intended hereby to upbraid Bethsaida with the mighty works that had in vain been done in her, Mat. xi. 21, and was telling her in effect she was unworthy to have any more done within her walls. Perhaps Christ took the blind man "out of the town," that he might have a larger prospect in the open fields to try his sight with, than he could have in the close streets.

Thirdly. Here is the cure of the blind man, by that blessed oculist who came into the world to "preach the recovering of sight to the blind," Lu. iv. 18, and to give what he preached. In this cure we may observe, 1. That Christ used a sign; he "spit on his eyes," (spit into them, so some,) "and put his hands upon him." He could have cured him, as he did others, with a word speaking; but thus he was pleased to assist his faith, which was very weak, and to help him against his unbelief. And this spittle signified the eye-salve wherewith Christ anoints the eyes of those that are spiritually blind, Rev. iii. 18. 2. That the cure was wrought gradually, which was not usual in Christ's miracles. He "asked him if he saw ought," ver. 23; let him tell what condition his sight was in, for the satisfaction of those about him; "and he looked up," so far he recovered his sight that he could open his eyes, and he said, "I see men as trees walking;" he could not distinguish men from trees, otherwise than that he could discern them to move. He had some glimmerings of sight, and betwixt him and the sky could perceive a man erect, like a tree, but could not discern the form thereof, Job iv. 16. But, 3. It was soon completed: Christ never doth his work by the halves, nor leaves it till he can say, "It is finished." He put his hands again upon his eyes, "to disperse the remaining darkness," and then bade him look up again, and he "saw every man clearly," ver. 25.

Now Christ took this way, 1st. Because he would not tie himself to a method, but would shew with what liberty he acted in all he did. He did not cure by rote, as I may say, and in a road, but varied as he thought fit. Providence gains the same end in different ways, that men may attend its motions with an implicit faith. 2nd. Because it should be to the patient according to his faith; and perhaps this man's faith was at first very weak, but afterwards gathered strength, and accordingly his cure was. Not that Christ always went by this rule, but thus he would sometimes put a rebuke upon those who came to him doubting. 3rd. Thus Christ would shew how, and in what method, those are healed by his grace, who by nature are spiritually blind; at first their knowledge is confused, they "see men as trees walking," but, like the light of the morning, it "shines more and more to the perfect day," and then they "see all things clearly," Pr. iv. 18. Let us inquire then if we see aught of those things which faith is the substance and evidence of; and if through grace we see any thing of them, we may hope that we shall see yet more and more, for Jesus Christ will perfect for ever those that are sanctified.

Fourthly. The directions Christ gave the man he had cured, not to "tell it to any in the town" of Bethsaida, nor so much as to "go into the town," where probably there were some expecting him to come back, who had seen Christ lead him out of the town; but having been eye-witnesses of so many miracles, had not so much as the curiosity to follow him: let not such be gratified with the sight of him when he was cured, that would not shew so much respect to Christ as to go a step out of town to see this cure wrought. Christ doth not forbid him to tell it to others, but he must not "tell it to any in the town." Slighting Christ's favours is forfeiting them; and Christ will make those know the worth of their privileges by the want of them, that would not know them otherwise. Bethsaida, in the day of her visitation, would not know the things that belonged to her peace, and now they are hid from her eyes. They will not see, and therefore shall not see.

27 And Jesus went out, and his disciples, into the towns of Cæsarea Philippi: and by the way he asked his disciples, saying unto them, Whom do men say that I am? 28 And they answered, John the Baptist: but some say, Elias; and others, One of the prophets. 29 And he saith unto them, But whom say ye that I am? And Peter answereth and saith unto him, Thou art the Christ. 30 And he charged them that they should tell no man of him. 31 And he began to teach them, that the viii. 7. For "blessed," Alford says, "render, blessed them;" but this would leave it as uncertain as before whether the Saviour blessed the disciples or the fishes. The common version allows a wider latitude, and we prefer it because the verb is with its derivatives used of blessing God, (e.g., Jas. iii. 9) and praise in general. It is used also in prayers for the blessing of God on anything. De Dieu is of opinion that the word "blessed" in this verse has the same meaning as the one for "gave thanks" in verse 6.

viii. 10. Dalmanutha is peculiar to this place. It was probably near Magdala, and hence the latter is named in Matt. xv. 39, or near Magada, as the best authorities have for Magdala. Dalmanutha is supposed to have been on the west shore of the lake of Tiberias, but nothing certain is known of it. It is by no means impossible that the old opinion may be correct, which makes Dalmanutha the name of the locality near the town of Magada.

viii. 16. For "saying, It is because we have no bread," some

Son of man must suffer many things, and be rejected of the elders, and of the chief priests, and scribes, and be killed, and after three days rise again. 32 And he spake that saying openly. And Peter took him, and began to rebuke him. 33 But when he had turned about and looked on his disciples, he rebuked Peter, saying, Get thee behind me, Satan: for thou savourest not the things that be of God, but the things that be of men. 34 And when he had called the people unto him with his disciples also, he said unto them, Whosoever will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me. 35 For whosoever will save his life shall lose it; but whosoever shall lose his life for my sake and the gospel's, the same shall save it. 36 For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? 37 Or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul? 38 Whosoever therefore shall be ashamed of me and of my words in this adulterous and sinful generation; of him also shall the Son of man be ashamed, when he cometh in the glory of his Father with the holy angels.

We have read a great deal of the doctrine that Christ preached, and the miracles he wrought, which were many, and strange, and well attested; of various kinds, wrought in several places, to the astonishment of the many that were eye-witnesses of them. It is now time for us to pause a little, and to consider what these things mean; the wondrous works, which Christ then forbade the publishing of, being recorded in these sacred writings, are thereby published to all the world, to us, to all ages. Now, what shall we think of them? Is the record of those things designed only for an amusement, or to furnish us with matter for discourse? No; certainly "these things are written that we may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God," Jno. xx. 31; and this discourse Christ had with his disciples, will assist us in making the necessary reflections upon the miracles of Christ, and a right use of them. Three things we are here taught to infer from the miracles Christ wrought:

1. They prove that he is the true Messiah, the Son of God, and Saviour of the world. This the works he did witnessed concerning him; and this his disciples, who were the eye-witnesses of those works, here profess their belief of; which cannot but be a satisfaction to us in making the same inference from them.

First. Christ inquired of them what the sentiments of the people were concerning him: "Whom do men say that I am?" ver. 27. Note, Though it is a small thing for us to be judged of man's day, yet it may sometimes do us good to know what people say of us; not that we may seek our own glory, but may hear of our faults. Christ asked them, not that he might be informed, but that they might observe it themselves, and inform one another.

Secondly. The account they gave him was such as plainly speaks the high opinion the people had of him. Though they came short of the truth, yet they were convinced by his miracles that he was an extraordinary person, sent from the invisible world with a Divine commission. It is probable they would have acknowledged him to be the Messiah, if they had not been possessed by their teachers with a notion that the Messiah must be a temporal prince, appearing in external pomp and power, which the figure Christ made would not comport with; yet (whatever the Pharisees said, whose copyhold was touched by the strictness and spirituality of his doctrine,) none of the people said he was a deceiver, but some said "he was John Baptist, others Elias, others one of the prophets," ver. 28. All agree he is one risen from the dead.

Thirdly. The account they gave him of their own sentiments concerning him, speaks their abundant satisfaction in him, and in their having left all to follow him, which now, after some time of trial, they see no reason to repent. "But whom say ye that I am?" To this they have an answer ready, "Thou art the Christ;" the Messiah often promised, and long expected, ver. 29. To be a Christian indeed, is sincerely to believe that Jesus is the Christ, and to act accordingly; and that he is so, plainly appears by his wondrous works. They knew, and must shortly publish and maintain; but for the present they must keep it secret, ver. 30, till the proof of it was completed, and they were completely qualified to maintain it by the pouring out of the Holy Ghost, and then let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God has made this same Jesus, whom ye crucified, both Lord and Christ, Acts ii. 36.

II. These miracles of Christ take off the offence of the cross, and assure us that Christ was in it not conquered, but a conqueror. Now the disciples are convinced that Jesus is the Christ, they may bear to hear of his sufferings, which Christ now begins to give them notice of, ver. 31.

First. Christ taught his disciples that he "must suffer many things." Though they had got over the vulgar error of the Messiah's being a temporal prince, so far as to believe their Master to be the Messiah, notwithstanding his present meanness, yet still they retained it so far as to expect that he would shortly appear in outward pomp and grandeur, and "restore the kingdom to Israel;" and therefore, to rectify that mistake, Christ here gives them a prospect of the contrary; that he must "be rejected of the elders, and the chief priests, and the scribes;" who they expected should be brought to own and prefer him; that instead of being crowned, he must "be killed," he must be crucified, "and after three days he must rise again," to a heavenly life, and to be no more in this world. This he spake "openly," ver. 32, παρρησια. He said it freely and plainly, and did not wrap it up in ambiguous expressions. The disciples might easily understand it, if they had not been very much under the power of prejudice. Or, it intimates that he spoke it cheerfully and without any terror, and would have them to hear it so. He spake that saying boldly, as one that not only knew he must suffer and die, but was resolved he would, and made it his own act and deed.

Secondly. Peter opposed it. He "took him, and began to rebuke him." Here Peter shewed more love than discretion; a zeal for Christ and his safety, but not according to knowledge. He "took him," προσλαβόμενος αὐτόν. He took hold of him, as it were, to stop and hinder him; took him in his arms and embraced him, so some understand it; he fell on his neck, as impatient to hear that his dear Master should suffer such hard things; or he took him aside privately, and began to rebuke him. This was not the language of the least authority, but of the greatest affection, of that jealousy for the welfare of those we love which is strong as death. Our Lord Jesus allowed his disciples to be free with him, but Peter here took too great a liberty.

Thirdly. Christ checked him for his opposition, ver. 33: "He turned about, as one offended," and looked on his disciples," to see if the rest of them were of the same mind, and concurred with Peter in this; that if they did, they might take the reproof to themselves which he was now about to give to Peter; and he said, "Get thee behind me, Satan." Peter little thought to have had such a sharp rebuke for such a kind dissuasive; but perhaps expected as much commendation now for his love as he had lately had for his faith. Note, Christ sees that amiss, in what we say and do, which we ourselves are not aware of, and knows what manner of spirit we are of, when we ourselves do not. 1. Peter spoke as one that did not rightly understand, nor had duly considered the purposes and counsels of God. When he saw such proofs, as he every day saw, of the power of Christ, he might conclude that he could not be compelled to suffer; the most potent enemies could not overpower him whom diseases and deaths, whom winds and waves, and devils themselves, were forced to obey and yield to; and when he saw so much of the wisdom of Christ every day, he might conclude that he would not choose to suffer, but for some very great and glorious purposes; and therefore he ought not thus to have contradicted him, but to have acquiesced. He looked upon his death only as a martyrdom, like that of the prophets, which he thought might be prevented, if either he would take a little care not to provoke the chief priests, or to keep out of the way; but he knew not that the thing was necessary for the glory of God, the destruction of Satan, and the salvation of man, that the Captain of our salvation must be made "perfect through sufferings," and so must bring "many sons to glory." Note, The wisdom of man is perfect folly, when it pretends to give measures to the Divine counsels; the cross of Christ, the greatest instance of God's power and wisdom, was to some a stumblingblock, and to others foolishness. 2. Peter spoke as one that did not rightly understand, nor had duly considered, the nature of Christ's kingdom; he took it to be temporal and human, whereas it is spiritual and Divine: "Thou savourest not the things that be of God, but those that be of men;" οὐ φρονεῖς, "thou mindest not," so the word is rendered, Rom. viii. 5. Peter seemed to mind more the things that relate to the lower world, and the life that now is, than those which relate to the upper world, and the life to come. Minding the things of men more than the things of God—our own credit, ease, and safety, more than the things of God and his glory and kingdom—is a very great sin, and the root of much sin, and very common among Christ's disciples; and it will appear in suffering times,—those times of temptation, when those in whom the things of men have the ascendant are in danger of falling off. Non sapis,—"Thou art not wise" (so it may be read) "in the things of God, but in the things of men." It is considerable what generation we appear wise in, Lu. xvi. 8. It seems policy to shun trouble, but if with that we shun duty, it is fleshly wisdom, 2 Cor. i. 12, and it will be folly in the end.

III. These miracles of Christ should engage us all to follow him, whatever it cost us; not only as they were confirmations of his mission, but as they were explications of his design, and the tendency of that grace which he came to bring; plainly intimating that by his Spirit he would do that for our blind, deaf, lame, leprous, diseased, possessed souls, which he did for the bodies of those many who in those distresses applied themselves to him. Frequent notice had been taken of the great flocking that there was to him for help in various cases. Now this is written that we may believe that he is the great Physician of souls, and may become his patients, and submit to his regimen; and here he tells us upon what terms we may be admitted; and he "called all the people to him," to hear this, who modestly stood at some distance when he was in private conversation with his disciples. This is that which all are concerned to know and consider, if they expect Christ should heal their souls.

First. They must not be indulgent of the ease of the body; for, ver. 34, "whosoever will come after me," for spiritual cures, as these people do for bodily cures, "let him deny himself," and live a life of self-denial, mortification, and contempt of the world; let him not pretend to be his own physician, but renounce all confidence in himself and his own righteousness and strength; and let him "take up his cross," conforming himself to the pattern of a crucified Jesus, and accommodating himself to the will of God in all the afflictions he lies under; and thus let him continue to "follow me," as many of those did whom Christ healed. Those that will be Christ's patients must attend on him, converse with him, receive instruction and reproof from him, as those did that followed him, and must resolve they will never forsake him.

Secondly. They must not be solicitous, no, not for "the life of the body," when they cannot keep it without quitting Christ, ver. 35. Are we invited by the words and works of Christ to follow him, let us sit down and count the cost, whether we can prefer our advantages by Christ before life itself, whether we can bear to think of losing our life "for Christ's sake and the Gospel's." When the devil is drawing away disciples and servants after him, he conceals the worst of it, tells them only of the pleasure, but nothing of the peril of his service: "Ye shall not surely die." But what there is of trouble and danger in the service of Christ, he tells us of it before; tells us we shall suffer, perhaps we shall die in the cause; and represents the discouragements not less, but greater, than commonly they prove, that it may appear he deals fairly with us; and he is not afraid we should know the worst, because the advantages of his service abundantly suffice to balance the discouragements, if we will but impartially set the one over against the other. In short,

1. We must not dread the loss of our lives, provided it be in the cause of Christ, ver. 35: "Whosoever will save his life," by declining Christ, and refusing to come to him, or by disowning or denying him after he has in profession come to Christ, he "shall lose it," shall lose the comforts of his natural life, the root and fountain of his spiritual life, and all his hopes of eternal life; such a bad bargain will he make for himself; "but whosoever shall lose his life," shall be truly willing to lose it, shall venture it, shall lay it down when he cannot keep it without denying Christ, he "shall save it;" that is, he shall be an unspeakable gainer; for the loss of his life shall be made up to him in a better life. It is looked upon to be some kind of recompence to those who lose their lives in the service of their prince and country, to have their memories honoured, and their families provided for; but what is that to the recompence which Christ makes in eternal life to all that die for him?

2. We must dread the loss of our souls, yea, though we should "gain the whole world" by it, ver. 36, 37: "For what shall it profit a man, if he should ancient copies and modern editors have, "because they had no bread."

viii. 21. Some copies omit "How," and others read, 'Do ye not yet understand?' which is adopted in several modern critical editions.

viii. 24. For "I see men as trees, walking," the best ancient and recent authorities read, "I see men, for I see them walking, as it were trees."

viii. 25. For "every man," some read "all men," while others have "all things." Alford says, "The text is in much uncertainty."

ix. 3. The words "as snow" are omitted in some MSS. The comparison which follows is peculiar to this gospel.

ix. 5. The record of the transfiguration occurs in Matthew, Mark, and Luke. In Peter's address, as given Matt. xvii. 4, the apostle calls Jesus "Lord;" in Mark it is "Rabbi" (not "Master," as in our version); and in Luke ix. 33 it is "Master." The Greek term in gain the whole world," and all the wealth, honour and pleasure in it, by denying Christ, "and lose his own soul?" "True it is," said Bishop Hooper, the night before he suffered martyrdom, "that life is sweet, and death is bitter; but eternal death is more bitter, and eternal life is more sweet;" so that as the happiness of heaven with Christ is enough to countervail the loss of life itself for Christ, so the gain of all the world in sin, is not sufficient to countervail the ruin of the soul by sin.

What that is that men do to save their lives, and gain the world, he tells us, ver. 38; and of what fatal consequence it will be to them: "Whosoever therefore shall be ashamed of me and of my words in this adulterous and sinful generation, of him also shall the Son of man be ashamed." Something like this we had, Mat. x. 33; but it is here expressed more fully. Note, 1st. The disadvantage that the cause of Christ labours under in this world is, that it is to be owned and professed in an "adulterous and sinful generation;" such the generation of mankind is; gone a whoring from God, in the impure embraces of the world and the flesh, lying in wickedness; some ages, some places, are more especially adulterous and sinful, as that was in which Christ lived. In such a generation the cause of Christ is opposed and run down, and those that own it are exposed to reproach and contempt, and every where ridiculed and spoken against. 2nd. There are many who, though they cannot but own that the cause of Christ is a righteous cause, yet are ashamed of it because of the reproach that attends the professing of it; they are ashamed of their relation to Christ, and ashamed of the credit they cannot but give to his words; they cannot bear to be frowned upon and despised, and therefore throw off their profession, and go down the stream of a prevailing apostasy. 3rd. There is a day coming when the cause of Christ will appear as bright and illustrious as now it appears mean and contemptible; when the Son of man comes "in the glory of his Father with his holy angels," as the true Shechinah, the brightness of his Father's glory, and the Lord of angels. 4th. Those that are ashamed of Christ in this world, where he is despised, he will be ashamed of them in that world where he is eternally adored. They shall not share with him in his glory then, that were not willing to share with him in his disgrace now.

CHAPTER IX.

In this chapter we have, I. Christ's transfiguration upon the mount, ver. 1—13. II. His casting the devil out of a child, when the disciples could not do it, ver. 14—29. III. His prediction of his own sufferings and death, ver. 30—32. IV. The check he gave to his disciples for disputing who should be greatest, ver. 33—37. And to John, for rebuking one who cast out devils in Christ's name, and did not follow with them, ver. 38—41. V. Christ's discourse with his disciples of the danger of offending one of his little ones, ver. 42; and of indulging that in ourselves which is an offence and an occasion of sin to us, ver. 43—50; most of which passages we had before, Mat. xvii. and xviii.

AND he said unto them, Verily I say unto you, That there be some of them that stand here, which shall not taste of death, till they have seen the kingdom of God come with power. 2 And after six days Jesus taketh with him Peter, and James, and John, and leadeth them up into an high mountain apart by themselves: and he was transfigured before them. 3 And his raiment became shining, exceeding white as snow; so as no fuller on earth can white them. 4 And there appeared unto them Elias with Moses: and they were talking with Jesus. 5 And Peter answered and said to Jesus, Master, it is good for us to be here: and let us make three tabernacles; one for thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elias. 6 For he wist not what to say; for they were sore afraid. 7 And there was a cloud that overshadowed them: and a voice came out of the cloud, saying, This is my beloved Son: hear him. 8 And suddenly, when they had looked round about, they saw no man any more, save Jesus only with themselves. 9 And as they came down from the mountain, he charged them that they should tell no man what things they had seen, till the Son of man were risen from the dead. 10 And they kept that saying with themselves, questioning one with another what the rising from the dead should mean. 11 And they asked him, saying, Why say the scribes that Elias must first come? 12 And he answered and told them, Elias verily cometh first, and restoreth all things; and how it is written of the Son of man, that he must suffer many things, and be set at nought. 13 But I say unto you, That Elias is indeed come, and they have done unto him whatsoever they listed, as it is written of him.

Here is, I. A prediction of Christ's kingdom, now near approaching, ver. 1. That which is foretold is, 1. That the kingdom of God would come, and would come so as to be seen; the kingdom of the Messiah shall be set up in the world by the utter destruction of the Jewish polity, which stood in the way of it. This was the restoring of the kingdom of God among men, which had been in a manner lost by the woful degeneracy both of Jews and Gentiles. 2. That it would come with power, so as to make its own way, and bear down the opposition that was given to it. It came with power, when vengeance was taken on the Jews for crucifying Christ, and when it conquered the idolatry of the Gentile world. 3. That it would come while some now present were alive; "there are some standing here that shall not taste of death till they see it:" this speaks the same with Mat. xxiv. 34: "this generation shall not pass till all those things be fulfilled." Those that were standing here with Christ should see it, when the others could not discern it to be the kingdom of God, for it came not with observation.

II. A specimen of that kingdom, in the transfiguration of Christ, six days after Christ spoke that. He had begun to given notice to his disciples of his death and sufferings; and to prevent their offence at that, he gives them this glimpse of his glory, to shew that his sufferings were voluntary, and what a virtue the dignity and glory of his person would put into them, and to prevent the offence of the cross.

1. It was on the top of a high mountain, like the converse Moses had with God, which was on the top of mount Sinai, and his prospect of Canaan from the top of mount Pisgah. Tradition saith it was on the top of mount Tabor that Christ was transfigured; and if so, the Scripture was fulfilled, "Tabor and Hermon shall rejoice in thy name," Ps. lxxxix. 12, 13. Dr. Lightfoot, observing that the last place we find Christ, was in the coasts of Caesarea Philippi, which was far from mount Tabor, rather thinks it was a high mountain which Josephus speaks of, near Caesarea.

2. The witnesses of it were Peter, James, and John: these were three that were to bear record on earth, answering to Moses, Elias, and the voice from heaven, the three that were to bear record from above. Christ did not take all the disciples with him, because the thing was to be kept very private. As there are distinguishing favours which are given to disciples and not to the world, so there are to some disciples and not to others. All the saints are a people near to Christ, but some lie in his bosom. James was the first of all the twelve that died for Christ, and John survived them all, to be the last eye-witness of this glory; he bore record, 1 John. i. 14, "We beheld his glory;" and so did Peter, 2 Pet. i. 16—18.

3. The manner of it. "He was transfigured before them;" he appeared in another manner than he used to do. This was a change of the accidents, the substance remaining the same, and it was a miracle: but transubstantiation, the change of the substance, all the accidents remaining the same, is not a miracle, but a fraud and imposture, such a work as Christ never wrought. See what a great change human bodies are capable of, when God is pleased to put an honour upon them, as he will upon the bodies of the saints at the resurrection. "He was transfigured before them;" it is likely the change was gradual, from glory to glory; so that the disciples, who had their eye upon him all the while, had the clearest and most certain evidence they could have, that this glorious appearance was no other than the blessed Jesus himself, and there was no illusion in it. John seems to refer to this, 1 John. i. 1, when he speaks of the Word of life as that which they had "seen with their eyes, and looked upon." "His raiment became shining;" so that though probably it was sad coloured, if not black, yet it was now "exceeding white as snow," beyond what a fuller's art could do towards whitening it.

4. His companions in this glory were Moses and Elias, ver. 4. They appeared, talking with him; not to teach him, but to testify to him, and to be taught by him; by which it appears there is converse and intercourse between glorified saints; they have ways of talking one with another, which we understand not. Moses and Elias lived at a great distance of time one from another; but that breaks no squares in heaven, where "the first shall be last, and the last first," that is, all one in Christ.

5. The great delight that the disciples took in seeing this sight, and hearing this discourse, is expressed by Peter, the mouth of the rest; he said, "Master, it is good for us to be here," ver. 5. Though Christ was transfigured, and was in discourse with Moses and Elias, yet he gave Peter leave to speak to him, and to be as free with him as he used to be. Note, Our Lord Jesus, in his exaltation and glory, doth not at all abate of his condescending kindness to his people. Many when they are in their greatness oblige their friends to keep their distance; but even to the glorified Jesus true believers have access with boldness, and freedom of speech with him. Even in this heavenly discourse there was room for Peter to put in a word; and this is it, "Lord, it is good to be here," it is good for us to be here; here "let us make tabernacles," let this be our rest for ever. Note, Gracious souls reckon it good to be in communion with Christ, good to be near him, good to be in the mount with him, though it be a cold and solitary place; it is good to be here retired from the world, and alone with Christ. And if it is good to be with Christ transfigured only, upon a mountain with Moses and Elias, how good will it be to be with Christ glorified in heaven with all the saints? But observe, while Peter was forstaying here, he forgot what need there was of the presence of Christ, and the preaching of his apostles, among the people. At this very time the other disciples wanted them greatly, ver. 14. Note, When it is well with us, we are apt to be mindless of others, and in the fulness of our enjoyments to forget the necessities of our brethren; it was a weakness in Peter to prefer private communion with God before public usefulness. Paul is willing "to abide in the flesh," rather than depart to the mountain of glory, though that be "far better," when he sees it needful for the church, Phil. i. 24, 25. Peter talked of making three distinct tabernacles for Moses, Elias, and Christ, which was not well contrived; for such a perfect harmony there is between the law, the prophets, and the Gospel, that one tabernacle will hold them all, they dwell together in unity. But whatever was incongruous in what he said, he may be excused, "for they were all sore afraid;" and he, for his part, "wist not what to say," ver. 6; not knowing what would be the end thereof.

6. The voice that came from heaven was an attestation of Christ's mediatorship, ver. 7; "There was a cloud that overshadowed them," and was a shelter to Luke nearly corresponds in sense with the Hebrew "Rabbi" of Mark, but the word "Lord" often points to a more comprehensive and elevated dignity. There is, however, no contradiction, the real fact being probably that Peter used the term "Rabbi," which the other evangelists paraphrased. The word for "tabernacles" means tents, which might be mere booths of boughs, or of more durable materials, as skins or cloth.

ix. 9, 10. Matthew and Mark report the charge given to the apostles by Jesus, but only Mark and Luke record their observance of it. Mark is alone in saying that they questioned with one another what the rising from the dead should mean.

ix. 11—13. This conversation occurs only in Matthew and Mark, the latter adding the significant phrase, "as it is written of him." These words Kuinoel justly observes are to be understood of John the Baptist; but he is scarcely so correct in supposing that they point to those passages of the Old Testament in which the prophets them: Peter had talked of making tabernacles for Christ and his friends, but "while he yet spake," see how his project was superseded; this cloud was unto them instead of tabernacles, for their shelter, Isa. iv. 5; while he spake of his tabernacles, God created his tabernacle not made with hands. Now out of this cloud (which was but a shade to the excellent glory Peter speaks of, from whence this voice came), it was said, "This is my beloved Son, hear him." God owns him, and accepts him as his beloved Son, and is ready to accept of us in him; we must then own and accept him as our beloved Saviour, and must give up ourselves to be ruled by him.

7. The vision being designed only to introduce this voice, when that was delivered, disappeared; ver. 8: "Suddenly, when they had looked round about," as men amazed, to see where they were, all was gone, "they saw no man any more;" Elias and Moses were vanished out of sight, and Jesus only remained with them, and he not transfigured, but as he used to be. Note, Christ doth not leave the soul when extraordinary joys and comforts leave it. Though more sensible and ravishing communions may be withdrawn, Christ's disciples have, and shall have, his ordinary presence with them always, even to the end of the world, and that is it we must depend upon. Let us thank God for daily bread, and not expect a continual feast on this side heaven.

8. We have here the discourse between Christ and his disciples, as they came down from the mount.

1st. He charged them to keep this matter very private till he was "risen from the dead," which would complete the proof of his Divine mission, and then this must be produced with the rest of the evidence, ver. 9; and besides, he being now in a state of humiliation, would have nothing publicly taken notice of that might seem disagreeable to such a state; for to that he would in every thing accommodate himself. This enjoining of silence to the disciples would likewise be of use to them, to prevent their boasting of the intimacy they were admitted to, that they might not be puffed up with "the abundance of the revelations." It is a mortification to a man to be tied up from telling of his advancements, and may help to hide pride from him.

2nd. The disciples were at a loss "what the rising from the dead should mean;" they could not form any notion of the Messiah's dying, Lu. xviii. 34 and therefore were willing to think that the rising he speaks of was figurative, his rising from his present mean and low estate to the dignity and dominion they were in expectation of. But if so, here is another thing that embarrasseth them, ver. 11, "Why say the scribes that," before the appearing of the Messiah in his glory, according to the order settled in the prophecies of the Old Testament, "Elias must first come?" But Elias was gone, and Moses too. Now that which raised this difficulty was, that the scribes taught them to expect the person of Elias, whereas the prophecy intended one "in the spirit and power of Elias." Note, The misunderstanding of Scripture is a great prejudice to the entertainment of truth.

3rd. Christ gave them a key to the prophecy concerning Elias, ver. 17, 18. It is indeed prophesied that Elias will come, and will "restore all things," and set them to rights; and (though you will not understand it) it is also prophesied "of the Son of man that he must suffer many things, and be set at nought;" must be a reproach of men, and despised of the people. And though the scribes do not tell you so, the Scriptures do, and you have as much reason to expect that as the other, and should not make so strange of it: but as to Elias, I tell you, he is come; and if you consider a little, you will understand what I mean; it is one to whom they have done "whatsoever they listed," which was very applicable to the ill usage they had given John Baptist. Many of the ancients, and the Popish writers generally, think, that besides the coming of John Baptist in the spirit of Elias, himself in his own person is to be expected, with Enoch, before the second appearance of Christ, wherein the prophecy of Malachi will have a more full accomplishment than it had in John Baptist. But it is a groundless fancy; the true Elias, as well as the true Messiah promised, is come, and we are to look for no other. These words, "as it is written of him," refer not to their doing "to him whatever they listed," that comes in in a parenthesis, but only to his coming; he is come, and hath been, and done according as was "written of him."

14 And when he came to his disciples, he saw a great multitude about them, and the scribes questioning with them. 15 And straightway all the people, when they beheld him, were greatly amazed, and running to him saluted him. 16 And he asked the scribes, What question ye with them? 17 And one of the multitude answered and said, Master, I have brought unto thee my son, which hath a dumb spirit; 18 And wheresoever he taketh him, he teareth him: and he foameth, and gnasheth with his teeth, and pineth away: and I spake to thy disciples that they should cast him out; and they could not. 19 He answereth him, and saith, O faithless generation, how long shall I be with you? how long shall I suffer you? bring him unto me. 20 And they brought him unto him: and when he saw him, straightway the spirit tare him; and he fell on the ground, and wallowed foaming. 21 And he asked his father, How long is it ago since this came unto him? And he said, Of a child. 22 And oftentimes it hath cast him into the fire, and into the waters, to destroy him: but if thou canst do any thing, have compassion on us, and help us. 23 Jesus said unto him, If thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth. 24 And straightway the father of the child cried out, and said with tears, Lord, I believe; help thou mine unbelief. 25 When Jesus saw that the people came running together, he rebuked the foul spirit, saying unto him, Thou dumb and deaf spirit, I charge thee, come out of him, and enter no more into him. 26 And the spirit cried, and rent him sore, and came out of him: and he was as one dead; inso-much that many said, He is dead. 27 But Jesus took him by the hand, and lifted him up; and he arose. 28 And when he was come into the house, his disciples asked him privately, Why could not we cast him out? 29 And he said unto them, This kind can come forth by nothing, but by prayer and fasting.

We have here the story of Christ's casting the devil out of a child, somewhat more fully related than it was Mat. xvii. 14, &c. Observe here,

I. Christ's return to his disciples, and the perplexity he found them in. He laid aside his robes of glory, and came to look after his family, and to inquire what was become of them. Christ's glory above doth not make him forget the concerns of his church below, which he visits in great humility, ver. 14. And he came very seasonably, when the disciples were embarrassed and run aground; the scribes, who were sworn enemies both to him and them, had gained an advantage against them. A child possessed with a devil was brought to them, and they could not cast out the devil; whereupon the scribes insulted over them, and reflected upon their Master, and triumphed as if the day were their own. He found "the scribes questioning with them," in the hearing of the multitude, some of whom perhaps began to be shocked by it. Thus Moses, when he came down from the mount, found the camp of Israel in great disorder; so soon were Christ and Moses missed. Christ's return was very welcome, no doubt, to the disciples, and unwelcome to the scribes. But particular notice is taken of its being very surprising to the people, who perhaps were ready to say, "As for this Jesus, we wot not what is become of him; but," when they beheld him "coming to them again, they were greatly amazed;" some copies add, καὶ ἐξέδοθησαν, "and they were afraid," and running to him; "some copies for προσπεσόντες read προσχαίροντες, 'congratulating him,' or bidding him welcome, they saluted him. It is easy to give a reason why they should be glad to see him, but why were they amazed, 'greatly amazed,' when they beheld him? Probably there might remain something unusual in his countenance, as Moses' face shone when he came down from the mount, which made the people "afraid to come nigh him," Ex. xxxiv. 30; so perhaps did Christ's face, in some measure; at least, instead of seeming fatigued, there appeared a wonderful briskness and sprightliness in his looks, which amazed them.

II. The case which perplexed the disciples brought before him. He asked the scribes, who he knew were always vexations to his disciples, and teasing them upon every occasion, "What question ye with them?" what is the quarrel now? The scribes made no answer, for they were confounded at his presence; the disciples made none, for they were comforted, and now left all to him. But the father of the child opened the cause, ver. 17, 18. 1. His child is possessed with "a dumb spirit." He has the falling sickness, and in his fits is speechless; his case is very sad, for wheresoever the fit takes him, the spirit tears him, throws him into such violent convulsions as almost pull him to pieces; and which is very grievous to himself, and frightful to those about him; "he foams" at the mouth, "and gnasheth with his teeth," as one in pain and great misery; and though the fits go off presently, yet they leave him so weak that he "pines away," is worn to a skeleton, his flesh is dried away, so the word signifies, Ps. cii. 3-5; this was a constant affliction to a tender father. 2. The disciples cannot give him any relief: "I desired they would cast him out, as they had done many, and they would willingly have done it, but they could not; and therefore thou couldst never have come in better time; Master, I have brought him to thee."

III. The rebuke he gave to them to all, ver. 19: "O faithless generation, how long shall I be with you? how long shall I suffer you?" Dr. Hammond understands this as spoken to the disciples, reproving them for not exerting the power he had given them, and because they did not fast and pray, as in some cases he had directed them to do. But Dr. Whitty takes it as a rebuke to the scribes, who gloried in this balk that the disciples met with, and hoped to run them down with it. Them he calls a "faithless generation," and speaks as one weary of being with them, and of bearing with them. We never hear him complaining, How long shall I be in this low condition, and suffer that? but, How long shall I be among these faithless people, and suffer them?

IV. The deplorable condition that the child was actually in when he was brought to Christ, and the doleful representation which the father made of it. When the child saw Christ, he fell into a fit, "straightway the spirit tare him," "boiled within him, troubled him," so Dr. Hammond; as if the devil would set Christ at defiance, and hoped to be too hard for him too, and to keep possession in spite of him. The child "fell on the ground, and wallowed foaming;" we may put another construction upon it, that the devil raged and had so much the greater wrath, because he knew that his time was short, Rev. xii. 12. Christ asked, "How long is it since this came to him?" and it seems the disease was of long standing; it came to him "of a child," ver. 21; which made the case the more sad, and the cure the more difficult. We are all by nature children of disobedience, and in such the evil spirit works, and has done so from our childhood, for "foolishness is bound in the heart of a child," and nothing but the mighty grace of Christ can cast it out.

V. The pressing instances which the father of the child makes with Christ for a cure, ver. 22: "Oftentimes it hath cast him into the fire and into the water, to destroy him." Note, The devil aims at the ruin of those in whom he rules and works, and seeks "whom he may devour." But if thou canst do anything, have compassion on us, and help us." The leper was confident of Christ's are told they will be despised by their own people. We prefer the opinion of Heinsius, that "as it is written of him" is an allusion to John's coming as the Elias of prophecy: "Elias is come, as it is written of him."

ix. 14, 15. The picture of the occupations of the multitude is peculiar to Mark. The scribes were conspicuous amid the crowd discussing with the disciples. The appearance of Jesus filled the people with surprise, not unaccompanied by reverence, as their running to greet him indicates. "The Lord's countenance probably retained traces of the glory on the mount," says Alford, in his English notes to this passage. Lange says, "Jesus finds his nine other disciples at the foot of the mountain, not only surrounded by a multitude of people, but involved in controversy with the scribes, who have surprised them in a condition of entire impotence. The people are amazed, or are very much excited, when they see Jesus coming. They were probably in a profane and mocking state of power, but put an if upon his will, Mat. viii. 2, "If thou wilt, thou canst." This poor man referred himself to his good will, but put an if upon his power because his disciples, who cast out devils in his name, had been nonplussed in this case. Thus Christ suffers in his honour by the difficulties and follies of his disciples.

VI. The answer Christ gave to his address, ver. 23: "If thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth." Here, 1. He tacitly checks the weakness of his faith. He put it upon Christ's power, "If thou canst do any thing," and reflected on the want of power in the disciples; but Christ turns it upon him, and puts him upon questioning his own faith, and will have him impute the disappointment to the want of that; "If thou canst believe." 2. He graciously encourageth the strength of his desire; "all things are possible;" that is, will appear possible to him that believes the almighty power of God, to which all things are possible; or, that shall be done by the grace of God, for them that believe in the promise of God, which seemed utterly impossible. Note, In dealing with Christ, very much is put upon our believing, and very much promised to it; "Canst thou believe?" that is, Darest thou believe? Art thou willing to venture thy all in the hands of Christ? To venture all thy spiritual concerns with him, and all thy temporal concerns for him? Canst thou find in thy heart to do this? If so, it is not impossible but that, though thou hast been a great sinner, thou mayest be reconciled; though thou art very mean and unworthy, thou mayest get to heaven. "If thou canst believe," it is possible that thy hard heart may be softened, thy spiritual diseases may be cured, and that, weak as thou art, thou mayest be able to hold out to the end.

VII. The profession of faith which the poor man made hereupon, ver. 24: he cried out, "Lord, I believe;" I am fully persuaded both of thy power and of thy pity, it shall never stick at that; "Lord, I believe;" and adds a prayer for grace to enable him more firmly to rely upon the assurances he had of the ability and willingness of Christ to save. "Help thou mine unbelief." Note, 1. Even those who through grace can say, "Lord, I believe," yet have reason to complain of their unbelief, that they cannot so readily apply to themselves and their own case the word of Christ as they should, nor so cheerfully depend upon it. 2. Those that complain of unbelief, must look up to Christ for grace to help them against it, and his grace shall be sufficient for them. "Help mine unbelief," help me to a pardon for it, help me with power against it; help out what is wanting in my faith with thy grace, the strength of which is perfected in our weakness.

VIII. The cure of the child, and the conquest of this raging devil in the child. Christ "saw the people come running together," expecting to see the issue of this trial of skill, and therefore kept them in suspense no longer, but "rebuked the foul spirit," the unclean spirit, so it should be rendered, as in other places. Observe, 1. What the charge was which Christ gave to this unclean spirit, "Thou deaf and dumb spirit," that maketh the poor child dumb and deaf, but shalt thyself be made to hear thy doom, and not be able to say any thing against it, "come out of him immediately, and enter no more into him," let him not only be brought out of this fit, but let his fits never return. Note, Whom Christ cures, he cures effectually. Satan may go out himself, and yet recover possession; but if Christ cast him out, he will keep him out. 2. How the unclean spirit took it; he grew yet more outrageous, he "cried and rent him sore;" gave him such a twist at parting, that he was "as one dead;" so loath was he to quit his hold, and so exasperated at the superior power of Christ; and so malicious to the child, and so vain he would have killed him. "May I said, He is dead." Thus the toss that a soul is in at the breaking of Satan's power in it, may perhaps be frightful for the present, but opens the door to lasting comfort. 3. How the child was perfectly restored; ver. 27, "Jesus took him by the hand," sperans, took fast hold of him, and strongly bore him up, and he arose and recovered, and all was well.

IX. The reason he gave to the disciples why they could not cast out this devil. They inquired of him privately why they could not, that wherein they were defective might be made up another time, and they might not be again thus publicly shamed; and he told them, ver. 29, "This kind can come forth by nothing but by prayer and fasting." Whatever other difference there really might be, none appears between this and other kinds, but that the unclean spirit had had possession of this poor patient from a child, and that strengthened his interest and confirmed his hold. When vicious habits are rooted by long usage, and begin to plead prescription, like chomical diseases, they are hardly cured: "Can the Ethiopian change his skin?" The disciples must not think to do their work always with a like ease; some services call them to take more than ordinary pains; but Christ can do that with a word's speaking which they must prevail for the doing of by prayer and fasting.

30 And they departed thence, and passed through Galilee; and he would not that any man should know it. 31 For he taught his disciples, and said unto them, The Son of man is delivered into the hands of men, and they shall kill him; and after that he is killed, he shall rise the third day. 32 But they understood not that saying, and were afraid to ask him. 33 And he came to Capernaum: and being in the house he asked them, What was it that ye disputed among yourselves by the way? 34 But they held their peace: for by the way they had disputed among themselves, who should be the greatest. 35 And he sat down, and called the twelve, and saith unto them, If any man desire to be first, the same shall be last of all, and servant of all. 36 And he took a child, and set him in the midst of them: and when he had taken him in his arms, he said unto them, 37 Whosoever shall receive one of such children in my name, receiveth me: and whosoever shall receive me, receiveth not me, but him that sent me. 38 And John answered him, saying, Master, we saw one casting out devils in thy name, and he followeth not us: and we forbid him, because he followeth not us. 39 But Jesus said, Forbid him not: for there is no man which shall do a miracle in my name, that can lightly speak evil of me. 40 For he that is not against us is on our part.

Here, First, Christ foretels his own approaching sufferings. He "passed through Galilee" with more expedition than usual, "and would not that any man should know it," ver. 30; because he had done many mighty and good works among them in vain, they shall not be invited to see them, and have the benefit of them, as they have been. The time of his sufferings drew nigh, and therefore he was willing to be private a while, and to converse only with his disciples, to prepare them for the approaching trial, ver. 31. He said to them, "The Son of man is delivered," by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, "into the hands of men," ver. 31, "and they shall kill him." Had he been delivered into the hands of devils, and they had worried him, it had not been so strange; but that men, who have reason, and should have love, that they should be thus spiteful to the Son of man, who came to redeem and save them, is unaccountable. But still it is observable, that when Christ spoke of his death, he always spoke of his resurrection, which took away the reproach of it from himself, and should take away the grief of it from his disciples. But they "understood not that saying," ver. 32. The words were plain enough, but they could not be reconciled to the thing, and therefore would suppose them to have some mystical meaning, which they did not understand; and they "were afraid to ask him," not because he was difficult of access, or stern to those who consulted him, but either because they were loath to know the truth, or because they expected to be chidden for their backwardness to receive it. Many remain ignorant because they are ashamed to inquire.

Secondly, He rebukes his disciples for magnifying themselves. When he came to Capernaum, he privately asked his disciples what it was that they disputed among themselves by the way, ver. 33. He knew very well what the dispute was, but he would know it from them, and would have them to confess their fault and folly in it. Note, 1. We must all expect to be called to an account by our Lord Jesus concerning what passeth while we are in the way in this state of passage and probation. 2. We must in a particular manner be called to an account about our discourses among ourselves, for by our words we must be justified or condemned. 3. As other our discourses among ourselves by the way, so especially our disputes, will be all called over again, and we shall be called to an account about them. 4. Of all disputes, Christ will be sure to reckon with his disciples for their disputes about precedency and superiority; that was the subject of the debate here, "who should be the greatest," ver. 34. Nothing could be more contrary to the two great laws of Christ's kingdom, lessons of his school, and instructions of his example, which are humility and love, than desiring preferment in the world, and disputing about it. This ill temper he took all occasions to check, both because it arose from a mistaken notion of his kingdom, as if it were of this world, and because it tended so directly to the debasing of the honour and the corrupting of the purity of his Gospel, and, he foresaw, would be so much the bane of the church. Now,

1st. "They were willing to cover this fault," ver. 34; "they held their peace." As they would not ask, ver. 32, because they were ashamed to own their ignorance, so here they would not answer, because they were ashamed to own their pride. 2nd. He was willing to amend this fault in them, and to bring them to a better temper; and therefore sat down, that he might have a solemn and full discourse with them about this matter. He called the twelve to him, and told them, First. That ambition, and affectation of dignity and dominion, instead of gaining them preferment in his kingdom, would but postpone their preferment: "If any man desire" and aim "to be first, he shall be last;" he that exalteth himself shall be abased, and men's pride shall bring them low. Secondly. That there is no preferment to be had under him, but an opportunity for, and an obligation to, so much the more labour and condescension. "If any man desire to be first," when he is so, he must be so much the more busy and serviceable to every body: "He that desires the office of a bishop desires a good work," for he must, as St. Paul did, labour the more abundantly, and make himself "the servant of all." Thirdly. That those who are most humble and self-denying do most resemble Christ, and shall be most tenderly owned by him. This he taught them by a sign: he "took a child in his arms," that had nothing of pride and ambition in it, "Look you," saith he, "whosoever shall receive one like this child, receiveth me. Those of a humble, meek, mild disposition, are such as I will own and countenance, and encourage every body else to do so too, and will take what is done to them as done to myself; and so will my Father too, for he who thus receiveth me, receiveth him that sent me; and it shall be placed to his account, and repaid with interest."

Thirdly, He rebukes them for vilifying all but themselves; while they are striving which of them should be greatest, they will not allow those who are not in communion with them to be any thing. Observe,

1. The account which John gave him of the restraint they had laid upon one from making use of the name of Christ, because he was not of their society. Though they were ashamed to own their contests for preferment, they seem to boast of this exercise of their authority, and expected their Master should not only justify them in it, but commend them for it; and hoped he would not blame them for desiring to be great, when they would thus use their power for the maintaining of the honour of the sacred college. "Master," saith John, "we saw one casting out devils in thy name, but he followeth not us," ver. 38. 1st. It was strange that one that was not a professed disciple and follower of Christ should yet have power to cast out devils in his name, for that seemed to be peculiar to those whom he called, ch. vi. 7. But some think that he was a disciple of John, who made use of the name of the Messiah, not as come, but as near at hand, not knowing that Jesus was he. It should rather seem he made use of the name of Jesus, believing him to be the Christ, as the other apostles did. And why might not he receive that power from Christ, whose Spirit, like the wind, blows where it listeth, without such an outward call as the apostles had? and perhaps there were many more such. Christ's grace is not tied to the visible church. 2nd. It was strange that one who cast out devils in the name of Christ did not join himself to the apostles, and follow Christ with them, but should continue to act in separation from them. I know of nothing that could hinder him from following them, unless because he was loath to leave all to follow them; and if so, that was an ill principle. The thing did not look mind, in consequence of the disciples' failure to work the miracle, and of the attack of the scribes, and were disposed to indulge this inclination, when the sudden and overpowering appearance of Christ smote their consciences." Lange favours the idea above quoted from Alford.

ix. 16. Instead of "the scribes," the best critics adopt the reading "them;" "he asked them." Hence has arisen the question, whom did Jesus ask? Four answers are given: 1, the scribes; 2, the disciples; 3, the scribes and disciples; 4, the people. We prefer the sense conveyed by the common reading, not only as in harmony with the context, especially verse 14, but as conveyed by very ancient copies and versions.

ix. 22, 23. In the second of these verses the words "if thou canst" are separated from what follows by omitting the word "believe." According to this reading, which some modern editors follow, our Lord says, "If thou canst? all things are possible to him well, and therefore the disciples forbade him to make use of Christ's name as they did, unless he would follow him as they did. This was like the motion Joshua made concerning Eldad and Medad, that prophesied in the camp, and went not up with the rest to the door of the tabernacle, "My lord Moses, forbid them." Num. xi. 28; "restrain them, silence them, for it is a schism." Thus apt are we to imagine that those do not follow Christ at all, that do not follow him with us, and that those do nothing well, who do not just as we do. "But the Lord knoweth them that are his," however they are dispersed; and this instance gives us a needful caution to take heed lest we be carried by an excess of zeal for the unity of the church, and for that which we are sure is right and good, to oppose that which yet may tend to the enlargement of the church, and the advancement of its true interests another way.

2. The rebuke he gave to them for this, ver. 39: "Jesus said, Forbid him not" nor any other that do likewise. This was like the check Moses gave to Joshua, "Enviest thou for my sake?" Note, That which is good, and doth good, must not be prohibited, though there may be some defect or irregularity in the manner of doing it. Casting out devils, and so destroying Satan's kingdom, doing this in Christ's name, and so owning him to be sent of God, and giving honour to him as the Fountain of grace, preaching down sin, and preaching up Christ, are good things, very good things, which ought not to be forbidden to any, merely because they follow not with us. If Christ be preached, Paul therein doth and will rejoice, though he be eclipsed by it, Phil. i. 18.

Two reasons Christ gives why such should not be forbidden: 1st. Because we cannot suppose that any man that makes use of Christ's name in working miracles should blaspheme his name, as the scribes and Pharisees did. There were those indeed that did in Christ's name cast out devils, and yet in other respects were workers of iniquity, but they did not speak evil of Christ. 2nd. Because those that differed in communion, while they agreed to fight against Satan, under the banner of Christ, ought to look upon one another as on the same side, notwithstanding that difference; "he that is not against us, is on our part." As to the great controversy between Christ and Beelzebub, he had said, "He that is not with me, is against me," Mat. xii. 30. He that will not own Christ, owns Satan; but among those that own Christ, though not in the same circumstances, that follow him, though not with us, we must reckon that, though these differ from us, they are not against us, and therefore are on our part, and we must not be any hindrance to their usefulness.

41 For whosoever shall give you a cup of water to drink in my name, because ye belong to Christ, verily I say unto you, he shall not lose his reward. 42 And whosoever shall offend one of these little ones that believe in me, it is better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and he were cast into the sea. 43 And if thy hand offend thee, cut it off: it is better for thee to enter into life maimed, than having two hands to go into hell, into the fire that never shall be quenched: 44 Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. 45 And if thy foot offend thee, cut it off: it is better for thee to enter halt into life, than having two feet to be cast into hell, into the fire that never shall be quenched: 46 Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. 47 And if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out: it is better for thee to enter into the kingdom of God with one eye, than having two eyes to be cast into hell fire: 48 Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. 49 For every one shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt. 50 Salt is good: but if the salt have lost his saltiness, wherewith will ye season it? Have salt in yourselves, and have peace one with another.

Here, First, Christ promiseth a reward to all those that are any way kind to his disciples, ver. 41: "Whosoever shall give you a cup of water," when you need it, and it will be a refreshment to you, "because ye belong to Christ," and are of his family, "he shall not lose his reward." Note, 1. It is the honour and happiness of Christians that they "belong to Christ;" they have joined themselves to him, and are owned by him; they wear his livery, as retainers to his family; nay, they are more nearly related, they are members of his body. 2. They who belong to Christ may sometimes be reduced to such straits as to be glad of "a cup of cold water." 3. The relieving of Christ's poor in their distresses is a good deed, and will turn to a good account. He accepts it, and will reward it. 4. What kindness is done to Christ's poor must be done them for his sake, and because they belong to him; for that is it that sanctifies the kindness, and puts a value upon it in the sight of God. 5. This is a reason why we must not discountenance and discourage those who are serving the interests of Christ's kingdom, though they are not in every thing of our mind and way. It comes in here as a reason why those must not be hindered that cast out devils in Christ's name, though they did not follow him; for (as Dr. Hammond paraphraseth it) "it is not only the great, eminent performances which are done by you, my constant attendants and disciples, that are accepted by me, but every the least degree of sincere faith and Christian performance, proportionable but to the expressing the least kindness, as giving a cup of water to a disciple of mine, for being such, shall be accepted and rewarded. If Christ reckons kindnesses to us services to him, we ought to reckon services to him kindnesses to us, and to encourage them, though done by those that follow not with us.

Secondly, He threatens those that offend his little ones, that wilfully are the occasion of sin or trouble to them, ver. 42; whosoever shall grieve any true Christians, though they be of the weakest, shall oppose their entrance into the ways of God, or discourage and obstruct their progress in those ways, shall either restrain them from doing good, or draw them in to commit sin, it were "better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and he were cast into the sea:" his punishment will be very great, and the death and ruin of his soul more terrible than such a death and ruin of his body would be: see Mat. xviii. 6.

Thirdly, He warns all his followers to take heed of ruining their own souls. This charity must begin at home; if we must take heed of doing any thing to hinder others from good, and to occasion their sin, much more careful must we be to avoid every thing that will take us off from our duty, or lead us to sin; and that which doth so, we must part with it, though it be never so dear to us. This we had twice in Mat. v. 29, 30; xviii. 8, 9. It is here urged somewhat more largely and pressingly; certainly this requires our serious regard, which is so much insisted upon. Observe,

1. The case supposed, that our own hand, or eye, or foot, offends us; that the impure corruption we indulge is as dear to us as an eye or a hand; or, that that which is to us as an eye or a hand is become an invincible temptation to sin, or occasion of it. Suppose the beloved is become a sin, or the sin a beloved; suppose we cannot keep that which is dear to us, but it will be a snare and a stumblingblock; suppose we must part with it, or part with Christ and a good conscience.

2. The duty prescribed in that case: pluck out the eye, cut off the hand and foot; mortify the darling lust, kill it, crucify it, starve it, make no provision for it. Let the idols, that have been delectable things, be cast away as delectable things; keep at a distance from that which is a temptation, though never so pleasing. It is necessary the part that is gangrened should be taken off, for the preservation of the whole: Immedicabile vulnus ense recidendum est, ne pars sincera trahatur.—"The part that is incurably wounded must be cut off, lest the parts that are sound be corrupted." We must put ourselves to pain, that we may not bring ourselves to ruin; self must be denied, that it may not be destroyed.

3. The necessity of doing this. The flesh must be mortified, that we may "enter into life," ver. 43, 45; into the kingdom of God, ver. 47. Though by abandoning sin we may for the present feel ourselves as if we were halt and maimed, it may seem to be a force put upon ourselves, and may create us some uneasiness, yet it is for life, and all that men have they will give for their lives; it is for a kingdom—the kingdom of God—which we cannot otherwise obtain: these halts and maims will be the marks of the Lord Jesus, will be in that kingdom scars of honour.

4. The danger of not doing this. The matter is brought to this issue, that either sin must die or we must die; if we will lay this Delilah in our bosom, it will betray us; if we be ruled by sin, we shall inevitably be ruined by it; if we must keep our two hands, and two eyes, and two feet, we must with them be cast into hell. Our Saviour often pressed our duty upon us, from the consideration of the torments of hell, which we run ourselves into if we continue in sin. With what an emphasis of terror are those words repeated three times here, "where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched!" which is quoted from Isa. lxvi. 24. 1st. The reflections and reproaches of the sinner's own conscience are the worm that dieth not; which will cleave to the damned soul, as the worms do to the dead body, and prey upon it, and never leave it till it is quite devoured. "Son, remember," will set this worm a gnawing, and how terribly will it bite with that word, Pr. v. 12, 13, "How have I hated instruction!" The soul that is food to this worm dies not, and the worm is bred in it, and one with it, and therefore neither doth that die. Damned sinners will be to eternity accusing, condemning, and upbraiding themselves with their own follies, which, how much soever they are now in love with them, will "at the last bite like a serpent, and sting like an adder." 2nd. The wrath of God, fastening upon a guilty and polluted conscience, is the fire that is not quenched; for it is the wrath of the living God, the eternal God, into whose hands it is a fearful thing to fall. There are no operations of the Spirit of grace upon the souls of damned sinners, and therefore there is nothing to alter the nature of the fuel, which must remain for ever combustible: nor is there any application of the merit of Christ to them, and therefore there is nothing to appease or quench the violence of the fire. Dr. Whitby shews that the eternity of the torments of hell was not only the constant faith of the Christian church, but had been so of the Jewish church. Josephus saith, "that the Pharisees held that the souls of the wicked were to be punished with perpetual punishment, and that there was appointed for them a perpetual prison." And Philo saith, "the punishment of the wicked is to live for ever dying, and to be for ever in pains and griefs that never cease."

The two last verses are somewhat difficult, and interpreters agree not in the sense of them; "for every one" in general, or rather every one of them that are cast into hell, "shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt." Therefore "have salt in yourselves." 1. It was appointed by the law of Moses that every sacrifice should be salted with salt; not to preserve it, for it was to be immediately consumed, but because it was the food of God's table, and no flesh is eaten without salt; it was therefore particularly required in the meat offerings, Lev. ii. 12. 2. The nature of man being corrupt, and, as such, being called flesh, Gen. vi. 3, Ps. lxxviii. 39, some way or other must be salted, in order to its being a sacrifice to God. The salting of fish (and, I think, of other things), they call the curing of it. 3. Our chief concern is to present ourselves living sacrifices to the grace of God, Rom. xii. 1; and in order to our acceptableness, we must be salted with salt, that is, our corrupt affections must be subdued and mortified, and we must have in our souls a savour of grace. Thus "the offering up," or sacrificing of the Gentiles, is said to be "acceptable, being sanctified by the Holy Ghost," as the sacrifices were salted, Rom. xv. 16. 4. Those that have the salt of grace must make it appear that they have it; that they have salt in themselves, a living principle of grace in their hearts, which works out all corrupt dispositions, and every thing in the soul that tends to putrefaction, and would offend our God or our own consciences, as unsavoury meat doth. Our speech must be always with grace, seasoned with this salt, that no corrupt communication may proceed out of our mouth, but we may loathe it as much as we would to put stinking meat into our mouths. 5. As this gracious salt will keep our own consciences void of offence, so it will keep our conversation with others so, that we may not offend any of Christ's little ones, but may be at peace with one another. 6. We must not only have this salt of grace, but we must always retain the relish and savour of it; for if this "salt lose its saltiness," if a Christian revolt from his Christianity, if he lose the savour of it, and be no longer under the power and influence of it, what can recover him? or "wherewith will ye season him?" This was said Mat. v. 13. 7. Those that present not themselves living sacrifices to God's that believes." The received text is very ancient, being found in the Alexandrian and Cambridge MSS., the Syriac, &c., and should not be lightly abandoned. Upon the words "all things are possible to him that believeth," a weighty question rises: do they mean he who believes can do all things, or that everything can be done for him who believes? The latter view is advanced by Grotius, and maintained by later critics, and is that which we should prefer.

ix. 24. The words "with tears" are left out of some copies and editions. The word "Lord" is also omitted by several MSS. and editors. There is some difference of opinion as to the sense of the expression, "help thou mine unbelief." The Syriac renders it, "help thou my lack of faith." Some explain it, "free me from my unbelief;" others, "what my faith lacks, by thy goodness supply;" but it may also mean, "help me who have been an unbeliever." Something may be said for each view; but if the last is adopted, the idiom is a Hebraism, of which it is said there is an important example grace, shall be made for ever dying sacrifices to his justice; and since they would not give honour to him, he will get him honour upon them; they would not be salted with the salt of Divine grace, would not admit that to subdue their corrupt affections; no, they would not submit to the operation, could not bear the corrosives that were necessary to eat out the proud flesh; it was to them like cutting off a hand, or plucking out an eye, and therefore in hell they shall be "salted with fire;" coals of fire shall be scattered upon them, Eze. x. 2, as salt upon the meat; and brimstone, Job xviii. 15, as fire and brimstone were rained on Sodom. The pleasures they have lived in "shall eat their flesh, as it were fire," Jas. v. 3. The pain of mortifying the flesh now, is no more to be compared with the punishment for not mortifying it, than salting with burning. And since he had said that the fire of hell shall not be quenched, but it might be objected that the fuel will not last always, he here intimates, that by the power of God it shall be made to last always; for those that are cast into hell will find the fire to have not only the corroding quality of salt, but its preserving quality; from whence it is used to signify that which is lasting: a covenant of salt is a perpetual covenant; and Lot's wife being turned into a pillar of salt made her a remaining monument of Divine vengeance. Now since this will certainly be the doom of those that do not crucify the flesh with its affections and lusts, let us, knowing this terror of the Lord, be persuaded to do it.

CHAPTER X.

In this chapter we have, I. Christ's dispute with the Pharisees concerning divorce, ver. 1-12. II. The kind entertainment he gave to the little children that were brought to him to be blessed, ver. 13-16. III. His trial of the rich man that inquired what he must do to get to heaven, ver. 17-22. IV. His discourse with his disciples upon that occasion, concerning the peril of riches, ver. 23-27; and the advantage of being impoverished for his sake, ver. 28-31. V. The repeated notice he gave his disciples of his sufferings and death approaching, ver. 32-34. VI. The counsel he gave to James and John, to think of suffering with him, rather than of reigning with him, ver. 35-45. VII. The cure of Bartimæus, a poor blind man, ver. 46-52. All which passages of story we had the substance of before, Mat. xix. and xx.

AND he arose from thence, and cometh into the coasts of Judæa by the farther side of Jordan: and the people resort unto him again; and, as he was wont, he taught them again. 2 And the Pharisees came to him, and asked him, Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife? tempting him. 3 And he answered and said unto them, What did Moses command you? 4 And they said, Moses suffered to write a bill of divorcement, and to put her away. 5 And Jesus answered and said unto them, For the hardness of your heart he wrote you this precept. 6 But from the beginning of the creation God made them male and female. 7 For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and cleave to his wife; 8 And they twain shall be one flesh: so then they are no more twain, but one flesh. 9 What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder. 10 And in the house his disciples asked him again of the same matter. 11 And he saith unto them, Whosoever shall put away his wife, and marry another, committeth adultery against her. 12 And if a woman shall put away her husband, and be married to another, she committeth adultery.

Our Lord Jesus was an itinerant preacher; did not continue long in a place, for the whole land of Canaan was his parish or diocese, and therefore he would visit every part of it, and give instruction to those in the remotest corners of it. Here we have him in the coasts of Judæa, by the farther side of Jordan eastward, as we found him not long since, in the utmost borders westward, near Tyre and Sidon. Thus was his circuit like that of the sun, from whose light and heat nothing is hid. Now we have him,

First. Resorted to by the people, ver. 1; wherever he was, they flocked after him in crowds; they came to him again, as they had done when he had formerly been in these parts, "and, as he was wont, he taught them again." Note, Preaching was Christ's constant practice; it was what he was used to, and wherever he came, he did "as he was wont." In Matth. vi it is said, he healed them; here it is said, "he taught them;" his cures were to confirm his doctrine, and to recommend it; and his doctrine was to explain his cures, and illustrate them; his teaching was healing to poor souls. "He taught them again." Note, Even those whom Christ hath taught, have need to be taught again. Such is the fulness of the Christian doctrine, that there is still more to be learned; and such our forgetfulness, that we need to be minded of what we do know.

Secondly. We have him disputed with by the Pharisees, who envied the progress of his spiritual arms, and did all they could to obstruct and oppose it to divert him, to perplex him, and to prejudice the people against him. Here is

1. A question they started concerning divorce; ver. 2, "Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife?" This was a good question, if it had been well put, and with a humble desire to know the mind of God in this matter; but they proposed it "tempting him," seeking an occasion against him, and an opportunity to expose him, which side soever he should take of the question. Ministers must stand upon their guard, lest, under pretence of being advised with, they be ensnared.

2. Christ's reply to them with a question, ver. 3, "What did Moses command you?" This he asked them, to testify his respect to the law of Moses, and to shew that he came not to destroy it, and to engage them to an universal impartial respect for Moses' writings, and to compare one part of them with another.

3. The fair account they give of what they found in the law of Moses expressly concerning divorce, ver. 4. Christ asked what Moses commanded; they own Moses only suffered or permitted a man to write his wife a bill of divorce, and to put her away, Deu. xxiv. 1. If you will do it, you must do it in writing, delivered into her own hand, and so put her away, and never return to her again.

4. The answer that Christ gave to their question, in which he abides by the doctrine he had formerly laid down in this case, Mat. v. 32, "that whosoever puts away his wife, except for fornication, causeth her to commit adultery." And to clear this, he here shews, 1st. That the reason why Moses in his law permitted divorce, was such as that they ought not to make use of that permission; for it was only "for the hardness of their hearts," ver. 5; lest, if they were not permitted to divorce their wives, they should murder them; so that none must put away their wives, but such as were willing to own that their hearts were so hard as to need this permission. 2nd. That the account which Moses in this history gives of the institution of marriage, affords such a reason against divorce as amounts to a prohibition of it. So that if the question be, "What did Moses command?" ver. 3, it must be answered, Though by a temporary proviso he allowed divorce to the Jews, yet by an eternal reason he forbade it to all the children of Adam and Eve, and that is it we must abide by. Moses tells us, First. That God made man male and female, one male and one female; so that Adam could not put away his wife and take another, for there was no other to take, which was an intimation to all his sons that they must not. Secondly. When this male and this female were by the ordinance of God joined together in holy marriage, the law was, that a man must "leave his father and mother, and cleave unto his wife," ver. 7, which intimates not only the nearness of the relation, but the perpetuity of it: he shall so cleave to his wife as not to be separated from her. Thirdly. The result of the relation is, that though they are two, yet they are one; they are one flesh, ver. 8. The union between them is the most intimate that can be; and, as Dr. Hammond expresseth it, a sacred thing that must not be violated. Fourthly. God himself has joined them together; he has not only, as Creator, fitted them to be comforts and helps meet for each other, but he has in wisdom and goodness appointed them who are thus joined together to live together in love, till death parts them. Marriage is not an invention of men, but a Divine institution; and therefore is to be religiously observed, and the more, because it is a figure of the mystical, inseparable union between Christ and his church. Now, from all this he infers that men ought not to put their wives asunder from them, whom God has put so near to them. The bond which God himself has tied is not to be lightly untied. They who are for divorcing their wives for every offence, would do well to consider what would become of them, if God should in like manner deal with them: see Isa. l. 1; Jer. iii. 1.

5. Christ's discourse with his disciples in private about this matter, ver. 10, 11. It was an advantage to them that they had opportunity of personal converse with Christ, not only about gospel mysteries, but about moral duties, for their farther satisfaction. No more is here related of this private conference, but the law Christ laid down in this case: that it is adultery for a man to put away his wife, and marry another; it is adultery against the wife he puts away; it is a wrong to her, and a breach of his contract with her, ver. 11. He adds, "if a woman shall put away her husband," that is, elope from him, leave him by consent, and "be married to another," she "commits adultery," ver. 12; and it will be no excuse at all to her to say, that it was with the consent of her husband. Wisdom and grace, holiness and love reigning in the heart, will make those commands easy which to the carnal mind may be as a heavy yoke.

13 And they brought young children to him, that he should touch them: and his disciples rebuked those that brought them. 14 But when Jesus saw it, he was much displeased, and said unto them, Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of God. 15 Verily I say unto you, Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein. 16 And he took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them, and blessed them.

It is looked upon as the indication of a kind and tender disposition to take notice of little children; and this was remarkable in our Lord Jesus, which is an encouragement not only to little children to apply themselves to Christ when they are very young, but to grown people, who are conscious to themselves of weakness and childishness, and of being, through manifold infirmities, helpless and useless, like little children. Here we have,

First. Little children brought to Christ, ver. 13. Their parents, or whoever they were that had the nursing of them, brought them to him that he should touch them, in token of his commanding and conferring a blessing on them. It doth not appear they needed any bodily cure, nor were they capable of being taught; but it seems, 1. They that had the care of them were mostly concerned about their souls, their better part, which ought to be the principal care of all parents for their children; for that is the principal part, and it is well with them if it be well with their souls. 2. They believed that Christ's blessing would do their souls good, and therefore to him they bring them, that he might touch them, knowing that he could reach their hearts, when nothing their parents could say to them, or do for them, would reach them. We may present our children to Christ now he is in heaven, for from thence he can reach them with his blessing, and therein we may act faith upon the fulness and extent of in Luke i. 48, where "the low estate of his handmaiden" is explained by some, "his lowly handmaiden."

ix. 31. For "the third day" some early MSS. and modern editors have "after three days," or "within three days."

ix. 33. For "and he came," some of the oldest MSS., &c., have "and they came," which is the sense of the parallel passage in Matt. xvii. 24.

ix. 35. This verse does not occur in the corresponding places of Matthew and Luke. It shows that the whole of the twelve were present.

ix. 41. For "in my name, because ye belong to Christ," some good MSS. and editors have a reading which means "by reason that ye are Christ's."

ix. 44. This verse is omitted by the Sinaitic, the Vatican, and some other copies; but the Syriac version and other early authorities have it.

his grace, the kind intimations he hath always given of favour to the seed of the faithful, the tenor of the covenant with Abraham, and the promise to us and to our children, especially that great promise of pouring his Spirit upon our seed, and his blessing upon our offspring, Isa. xlv. 3.

Secondly. The discouragement which the disciples gave to the bringing of children to Christ. They "rebuked those that brought them;" as if they had been sure they knew their Master's mind in this matter, whereas he had lately cautioned them not to despise the little ones.

Thirdly. The encouragement Christ gave to it. 1. He took it very ill at his disciples for keeping them off: "when he saw it, he was much displeased," ver. 14. "What do you mean? Will you hinder me from doing good, from doing good to the rising generation, to the lambs of the flock?" Christ is very angry with his own disciples, if they discountenance any in coming to him themselves, or in bringing their children to him. 2. He ordered that they should be brought to him, and nothing said or done to hinder them. "Suffer little children, as soon as they are capable, to come to me, to offer up their supplications to me, and to receive instructions from me." Little children are welcome betimes to the throne of grace with their hosannas. 3. He owned them as members of his church, as they had been of the Jewish church. He came to set up the kingdom of God among men, and took this occasion to declare, that that kingdom admitted little children to be the subjects of it, and gave them a title to the privilege of subjects. Nay, the kingdom of God is to be kept up by such: they must be taken in, when they are little children, that they may be secured for hereafter to bear up the name of Christ. 4. That there must be something of the temper and disposition of little children found in all that Christ will own and bless. We must receive the kingdom of God as little children, ver. 15; that is, we must stand affected to Christ and his grace, as little children do to their parents, nurses, and teachers. We must be inquisitive as children, must learn as children; that is the learning age; and "in learning must believe," oportet discitum credere. The mind of a child is as white paper, tabula rasa,—"a mere blank;" you may write upon it what you will; so must our minds be to the pen of the blessed Spirit. Children are under government, so must we be: "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" We must receive the kingdom of God as the child Samuel did, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant hears." Little children depend upon their parents' wisdom and care, are carried in their arms, go where they send them, and take what they provide for them; and thus must we receive the kingdom of God, with a humble resignation of ourselves to Jesus Christ, and an easy dependence upon him, both for strength and righteousness, for tuition, provision, and a portion. 5. He received the children, and gave them what was desired: ver. 16. "He took them up in his arms," in token of his affectionate concern for them, "put his hands upon them," as was desired, "and blessed them." See how he outdid the desires of these parents; they begged he would touch them, but he did more.

1st. "He took them in his arms." Now the Scripture was fulfilled, Isa. xl. 11. "He shall gather the lambs in his arms, and carry them in his bosom." Time was when Christ himself was taken up in old Simeon's arms, Lu. ii. 28; and now he took up these children, not complaining of the burthen, as Moses did, when he was bid to carry Israel (that peevish child) "in his bosom, as a nursing father bears the sucking child," Num. xi. 12, but pleased with it. If we in a right manner bring our children to Christ, he will take them up, not only in the arms of his power and providence, but in the arms of his pity and grace, as Eze. xvi. 8; underneath them are the everlasting arms. 2nd. He "put his hands upon them," noting the bestowing of his Spirit upon them, (for that is the hand of the Lord), and his setting them apart for himself. 3rd. He "blessed them" with the spiritual blessings he came to give. Our children are happy, if they have but the Mediator's blessing for their portion. It is true, we do not read that he baptized these children,—baptism was not fully settled as the door of admission into the church till after Christ's resurrection,—but he asserted their visible church membership, and by another sign bestowed those blessings upon them which are now appointed to be conveyed and conferred by baptism, the seal of the promise which is to us and our children.

17 And when he was gone forth into the way, there came one running, and kneeled to him, and asked him, Good Master, what shall I do that I may inherit eternal life? 18 And Jesus said unto him, Why callest thou me good? there is none good but one, that is, God. 19 Thou knowest the commandments, Do not commit adultery, Do not kill, Do not steal, Do not bear false witness, Defraud not, Honour thy father and mother. 20 And he answered and said unto him, Master, all these have I observed from my youth. 21 Then Jesus beholding him loved him, and said unto him, One thing thou lackest: go thy way, sell whatsoever thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come, take up the cross, and follow me. 22 And he was sad at that saying, and went away grieved: for he had great possessions. 23 And Jesus looked round about, and saith unto his disciples, How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God! 24 And the disciples were astonished at his words. But Jesus answereth again, and saith unto them, Children, how hard it is for them that trust in riches to enter into the kingdom of God! 25 It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God. 26 And they were astonished out of measure, saying among themselves, Who then can be saved? 27 And Jesus looking upon them saith, With men it is impossible, but not with God: for with God all things are possible. 28 Then Peter began to say unto him, Lo, we have left all, and have followed thee. 29 And Jesus answered and said, Verily I say unto you, There is no man that hath left house, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my sake, and the gospel's, 30 But he shall receive an hundredfold now in this time, houses, and brethren, and sisters, and mothers, and children, and lands, with persecutions; and in the world to come eternal life. 31 But many that are first shall be last; and the last first.

Here is, I. A hopeful meeting between Christ and a young man, so he is said to be, Mat. xix. 20, 22, and a ruler, Lu. xviii. 18, a person of quality. Some circumstances here are which we had not in Matthew, which make his address to Christ very promising.

1. He came running to Christ, which was an indication of his humility; he laid aside the gravity and grandeur of a ruler when he came to Christ: and of his earnestness and importunity; he ran as one in haste, and longing to be in conversation with Christ. He had now an opportunity of consulting this great Prophet in the things that belonged to his peace, and he would not let slip the opportunity.

2. He came to him when he was in the way, in the midst of company; he did not insist upon a private conference with him by night, as Nicodemus did, though like him he was a ruler; but when he shall find him without, will embrace that opportunity of advising with him, and not be ashamed, Cant. viii. 1.

3. He kneeled to him, in token of the great value and veneration he had for him, as a teacher come from God, and his earnest desire to be taught by him. He bowed the knee to the Lord Jesus, as one that would not only do obedience to him now, but would yield obedience to him always; he bowed the knee, as one that meant to bow the soul to him.

4. His address to him was serious and weighty: "Good Master, what shall I do that I may inherit eternal life?" Eternal life was an article of his creed, though then denied by the Sadducees, a prevailing article. He thinks it a thing possible that he may inherit eternal life; looking upon it not only as set before us, but offered to us, he asks, what he shall do now that he may be happy for ever. Most men inquire for good to be had in this world, Ps. iv. 6, "any good." He asks for good to be done in this world, in order to the enjoyment of the greatest good in the other world; not who will make us to see good, but to do good; he inquires for happiness in the way of duty; the summum bonum,—"the chief good," which Solomon was in quest of, was that "good for the sons of men which they should do," Ecc. ii. 3. Now this was, 1st. A very serious question in itself; it was about eternal things, and his own concern in those things. Note, Then there begins to be some hopes of people when they begin to inquire solicitously what they shall do to get to heaven. 2nd. It was proposed to a right person, one that was every way fit to answer it, being himself "the way, the truth, and the life;" the true way to life, to eternal life; who came from heaven on purpose, first to lay open for us, and then to lay open to us—first to make, and then to make known, the way to heaven. Note, Those who would know what they shall do to be saved, must apply themselves to Christ, and inquire of him. It is peculiar to the Christian religion, both to shew eternal life, and to shew the way to it. 3rd. It was proposed with a good design to be instructed. We find this same question put by a lawyer, not kneeling, but standing up, Lu. x. 25, with a bad design, to pick quarrels with him; he "tempted him, saying, Master, what shall I do?" It is not so much the good words, as the good intention of them, that Christ looks at.

5. Christ encouraged this address, 1st. By assisting his faith, ver. 17. He called him, "Good Master," and Christ would have him mean thereby, that he looked upon him to be God, since there is none good but one, that is God, who is one, and his name One, Zec. xiv. 9. Our English word, God, doubtless hath affinity with good; as the Hebrews name God by his power, Elohim, "the strong God," so we by his goodness, the good God. 2nd. By directing his practice, ver. 19: "Keep the commandments," and thou knowest what they are; he mentions the six commandments of the second table, which prescribe our duty to our neighbour; he inverts the order, putting the seventh commandment before the sixth, to intimate that adultery is a sin no less heinous than murder itself. The fifth commandment is here put last, as that which should especially be remembered and observed, to keep us to all the rest. Instead of the tenth commandment, "Thou shalt not covet," our Saviour here puts "defraud not." Μη ἀποστερησῃς, that is, saith Dr. Hammond, "Thou shalt rest contented with thy own, and not seek to increase it by the diminution of other men's." It is a rule of justice, not to advance or enrich ourselves by doing wrong or injury to any other.

6. The young man bid fair for heaven, having been free from any open gross violations of the Divine commands. Thus far he was able to say, in some measure, ver. 20, "Master, all these have I observed from my youth." He thought he had, and his neighbours thought so too. Note, Ignorance of the extent and spiritual nature of the Divine law makes people think themselves in a better condition than really they are. Paul was alive "without the law." But when he saw that to be spiritual, he saw himself to be carnal, Rom. vii. 9, 14. However, he that could say he was free from scandalous sin, went farther than many in the way to eternal life. But though we know nothing by ourselves, yet are we not thereby justified.

7. Christ had a kindness for him: "Jesus beholding him, loved him," ver. 21. He was pleased to find that he had lived inoffensively, and pleased to see that he was inquisitive how to live better than so. Christ particularly loves to see young people, and rich people, asking the way to heaven, with their faces thitherward.

ix. 45. The words "into the fire that never shall be quenched" are not found in all the old MSS., and are omitted by the most ancient.

ix. 46. This verse is not found in the earliest copies and some recent editions, but it is found in very ancient copies and versions.

ix. 47. The word "fire" is omitted by the Sinaitic and Vatican MSS., as well as by some modern editors, but it is a very ancient reading.

x. 1. For "coasts" translate "borders." There is a various reading here: "into the borders of Judea and the other side of the Jordan." Our Lord might have reached Judea by way of the other side of the Jordan, as the common text expresses it. Strictly speaking, Judea was bounded on the east by the river Jordan, but speaking conventionally the word sometimes included more or less of the neighbouring district to the east of the Jordan. As a fact, our Lord may not have entered Judea at this time, but only came "to" the

1. Christ gave him a command of trial, by which it would appear whether he did in sincerity aim at eternal life, and press towards it. He seemed to have his heart much upon it, and if so, he is what he should be; but has he indeed his heart upon it? Bring him to the touchstone. 1st. Can he find in his heart to part with his riches for the service of Christ? He hath a good estate; and now shortly, at the first founding of the Christian church, the necessity of the case will require that those that have lands sell them, and lay the money at the apostles' feet; and how will he dispense with that? Acts iv. 34. After a while, tribulation and persecution will arise, because of the Word; and he must be forced to sell his estate, or have it taken from him, and how will he like that? Let him know the worst. Now, if he will not come up to these terms, let him quit his pretensions, as good at first as at last: "Sell whatsoever thou hast," over and above what is necessary for thy support; probably he had no family to provide for; let him therefore be a father to the poor, and make them his heirs. Every man according to his ability must relieve the poor, and be content, when there is occasion, to straiten himself to do it. Worldly wealth is given us not only as maintenance, to bear our charges through this world, according to our place in it, but as a talent, to be used and employed for the glory of our great Master in the world, who hath so ordered it that the poor we should always have with us, as his receivers. 2nd. Can he find in his heart to go through the hardest, costliest services he may be called to, as a disciple of Christ, and depend upon him for a recompence in heaven? He asks Christ what he shall do more than he has done to obtain eternal life; and Christ puts it to him, whether he has indeed that firm belief of, and that high value for, eternal life that he seems to have. Doth he really believe there is a treasure in heaven sufficient to make up all he can leave, or lose, or lay out for Christ? Is he willing to deal with Christ upon trust? Can he give him credit for all he is worth? and be willing to bear a present cross in expectation of a future crown?

2. Upon this he flew off, ver. 22; "he was sad at that saying;" was sorry he could not be a follower of Christ upon any easier terms than leaving all to follow him; that he could not lay hold on eternal life, and keep hold of his temporal possessions too. But since he could not come up to the terms of discipleship, he was so far as not to pretend to it, "he went away grieved." Here appeared the truth of that, Mat. vi. 24. "Ye cannot serve God and Mammon;" while he held to Mammon, he did in effect despise Christ, as all those do who prefer the world before him. He bids for what he has a mind of in the market, yet goes away grieved, and leaves it, because he cannot have it at his own price. Two words to a bargain. Motions are not marriages. That which ruined this young man was, "he had great possessions;" thus "the prosperity of fools destroys them;" and those who spend their days in wealth, are tempted to say to God, Depart from us, or to their hearts, Depart from God.

III. Here is Christ's discourse with his disciples. We are tempted to wish that Christ had mollified that saying which frightened this young gentleman from following him, and by any explanation taken off the harshness of it; but he knew all men's hearts; he would not court him to be his follower, because he was a rich man, and a ruler; but if he will go, let him go; Christ will keep no man against his will; and therefore we do not find that Christ called him back, but took this occasion to instruct his disciples in two things:

1. The difficulty of the salvation of those that have an abundance of this world; because there are few who have a deal to leave that can be persuaded to leave it for Christ, or to lay it out in doing good.

1st. Christ asserts this here. He looked about upon his disciples, because he would have them all take notice of what he said, that by it they might have their judgments rightly informed, and their mistakes rectified concerning worldly wealth, which they were apt to overrate. "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God," ver. 23. They have many temptations to grapple with, and many difficulties to get over, which lie not in the way of poor people. But he explains himself, ver. 24, where he calls the disciples children, because as such they should be taught by him, and portioned by him with better things than this young man left Christ to cleave to; and whereas he had said how hardly those that have riches will get to heaven, here he tells them that the danger arose not so much from their having riches as from their trusting to them, and placing their confidence in them, expecting protection, provision, and a portion from them, saying that to their gold which they should say only to their God, "Thou art my hope," Job xxxi. 24. They that have such a value as this for the wealth of the world, will never be brought to put a right value upon Christ and his grace. They that have never so much riches, but do not trust in them, that see the vanity of them, and their utter insufficiency to make a soul happy, have got over the difficulty, and can easily part with them for Christ; but they that have never so little, if they set their hearts upon that little, and place their happiness in it, it will keep them from Christ. He enforceth this assertion with, ver. 25, "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man" that trusts in riches, or inclines to do so, "to enter into the kingdom of God." The disproportion here seems so great (though the more so, the more it answers the intention,) that some have laboured to bring the camel and the eye of the needle a little nearer together.

1st. Some imagine there might be some wicket-gate or door at Jerusalem, commonly known by the name of the needle's eye for its straitness, through which a camel could not be got, unless he were unloaded, and made to kneel, as those camels, Gen. xxiv. 11. So a rich man cannot get to heaven unless he be willing to part with the burthen of his worldly wealth, and stoop to the duties of a humble religion, and so enter in "at the strait gate." 2nd. Others suggest that the word we translate a camel, sometimes signifies a cable rope; which, though not to be got through a needle's eye, yet is of greater affinity to it. A rich man, compared with the poor, is as a cable to a single thread, stronger, but not so pliable, and it will not go through the needle's eye unless it be untwisted; so the rich man must be loosed and disentangled from his riches, and then there is some hopes of him, that thread by thread he may be got through the eye of the needle; otherwise he is good for nothing but to cast anchor in the earth.

2nd. This truth was very surprising to the disciples, they were "astonished at his words," ver. 24; "they were astonished out of measure, and said among themselves, Who then can be saved?" They knew what were generally the sentiments of the Jewish teachers, that the Spirit of God chooseth to reside upon rich men; nay, they knew what abundance of promises there were in the Old Testament of temporal good things; they knew likewise that all either are rich, or fain would be so; and that they who are rich have so much the larger opportunities of doing good, and therefore were amazed to hear that it should be so hard for rich people to go to heaven.

3rd. Christ reconciled them to it, by referring it to the almighty power of God to help even rich people over the difficulties that lie in the way of their salvation; ver. 23. He "looked upon them," to engage their attention, and said, "With men it is impossible;" rich people cannot, by their own skill or resolution, get over these difficulties; but the grace of God can do it, for "with him all things are possible." "If the righteous scarcely are saved," much more may we say so of the rich; and therefore when any get to heaven, they must give all the glory to God, who worketh in them both to will and to do.

2. The greatness of the salvation of those that have but a little of this world, and leave it for Christ. This he speaks of upon occasion of Peter's mentioning what he and the rest of the disciples had left to follow him. "Behold," saith he, "we have left all to follow thee," ver. 28. "You have done well," saith Christ, "and it will prove in the end that you have done well for yourselves; you shall be abundantly recompensed;" and not only you shall be recompensed, who have left but little, but those that have never so much, though it were so much as this young man had, that could not persuade himself to quit it for Christ, yet they shall have much more than an equivalent for it!

1st. The loss is supposed to be very great. He instanteth, First. In worldly wealth, houses are here put first, and lands last; if a man quit his house, which should be for his habitation, and his land, which should be for his maintenance, and so makes himself a beggar and an outcast. This has been the choice of suffering saints: Farewell houses and lands, though never so convenient and desirable, though the inheritance of fathers, though the house which is from heaven, and the inheritance of the saints in light, where are many mansions. Secondly. In dear relations, "Father and mother, wife and children, brethren and sisters;" in these, as much as in any temporal blessing, the comfort of life is bound up; without these the world would be a wilderness; yet when we must either forsake these or Christ, we must remember that we stand in nearer relation to Christ than we do to any creature; and therefore to keep in with him, we must be content to break with all the world, and say to father and mother, as Levi did, "I have not known you." The greatest trial of a good man's constancy is, when his love to Christ comes to stand in competition with a love that is lawful, nay, that is his duty. It is easy to such a one to forsake a lust for Christ, for he hath that within him that riseth against it; but to forsake a father, a brother, a wife, for Christ, whom he knows he must love, is hard. And yet he must do so, rather than deny or disown Christ. Thus great is the loss supposed to be; but it is for Christ's sake, that he may be honoured; and the Gospels, that that may be promoted and propagated. It is not the suffering, but the cause, that makes the martyr. And therefore,

2nd. The advantage will be great. First. "They shall receive a hundredfold in this time, houses, and brethren, and sisters;" not in kind, but that which is equivalent. He shall have abundance of comfort while he lives, sufficient to make up all his losses; his relation to Christ, his communion with the saints, and his title to eternal life, shall be to him brethren, and sisters, and houses, and all. God's providence gave Job double to what he had had; but suffering Christians shall have an hundredfold, in the comforts of the Spirit sweetening their creature comforts. But observe, it is added here, in Mark, "with persecutions." Even when they are gainers by Christ, let them still expect to be sufferers for him, and not to be out of the reach of persecution till they come to heaven; nay, the persecutions seem to come in here among the receivings in this present time, for unto you it is given, not only to believe in Christ, but also to "suffer for his name;" yet this is not all. Secondly. They shall have "eternal life in the world to come." If they receive an hundredfold in this world, one would think they should not be encouraged to expect any more. Yet, as if that were a small matter, they shall have life eternal into the bargain, which is more than ten thousandfold, ten thousand times told, for all their losses. But because they talked so much, and really more than became them, of leaving all for Christ, he tells them, though they were first called, yet there should be disciples called after them that should be preferred before them; as St. Paul, who was one born out of due time, and yet laboured more abundantly than all the rest of the apostles, 1 Cor. xv. 10. Then the first were last, and the last first.

32 And they were in the way going up to Jerusalem; and Jesus went before them: and they were amazed; and as they followed, they were afraid. And he took again the twelve, and began to tell them what things should happen unto him, 33 Saying, Behold, we go up to Jerusalem; and the Son of man shall be delivered unto the chief priests, and unto the scribes; and they shall condemn him to death, and shall deliver him to the Gentiles: 34 And they shall mock him, and shall scourge him, and shall spit upon him, and shall kill him: and the third day he shall rise again. 35 And James and John, the sons of Zebedee, come unto him, saying, Master, we would that thou shouldest do for us whatsoever we shall desire. 36 And he said unto them, What would ye that I should do for you? 37 They said unto him, Grant unto us that we may sit, one on thy right hand, and the other on thy left hand, in thy glory. 38 But Jesus said unto them, Ye know not what ye ask: can ye drink of the cup that I drink of? and be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with? 39 And they said unto him, We can. And Jesus said unto them, Ye shall indeed drink of the cup that I drink of; and with the baptism that I am baptized withal shall ye be baptized: 40 But to sit on my right hand and on my left hand is not mine to give; but it shall be borders of it, remaining in the Peræa, as they called the region beyond the Jordan. Between this and the previous chapter some time must have elapsed, for the transactions of which the other Gospels supply materials.

x. 32. Part of this verse is peculiar to this evangelist, who, as often, introduces minute circumstantialities which seem to proceed from an eye-witness. Nothing can be more simple and natural than the forms adopted here. They were on the road, going up to Jerusalem, and

Jesus was at the head, taking the lead, while his companions were amazed and followed him with fear. Our Lord is said to have been going up, and the phrase is correct, whether understood of going up to the capital, according to a common idiom, or used of the literal road on which they travelled. From the Jordan and Jericho there is a constant ascent, on some part of which this narrative must be located. Note the opposite expression in the parable of the man who "went down" from Jerusalem to Jericho. Here the word given to them for whom it is prepared. 41 And when the ten heard it, they began to be much displeased with James and John. 42 But Jesus called them to him, and saith unto them, Ye know that they which are accounted to rule over the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and their great ones exercise authority upon them. 43 But so shall it not be among you: but whosoever will be great among you, shall be your minister: 44 And whosoever of you will be the chiefest, shall be servant of all. 45 For even the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many.

Here is, First, Christ's prediction of his own sufferings; this string he harped much upon, though in the ears of his disciples it sounded very harsh and unpleasant.

1. See here how bold he was: when they were going up to "Jerusalem, Jesus went before them," as the "Captain of our salvation," that was now to be "made perfect through sufferings," ver. 32. Thus he shewed himself forward to go on with his undertaking, even when he came to the hardest part of it; now the time was at hand, he said, "Lo, I come!" so far from drawing back, that now more than ever he pressed forwards. "Jesus went before them, and they were amazed." They began now to consider what imminent danger they ran themselves into, when they went to Jerusalem; how very malicious the Sanhedrim, which sat there, was against their Master and them; and they were ready to tremble at the thought of it. To hearten them, therefore, Christ went before them: "Come," saith he, "sure you will venture where your Master ventures." Note, When we see ourselves entering upon sufferings, it is encouraging to see our Master go before us. Or, he went before them, and therefore they were amazed; they admired to see with what cheerfulness and alacrity he went on, though he knew he was going to suffer and die. Note, Christ's courage and constancy in going on with his undertaking for our salvation, is, and will be, the wonder of all his disciples.

2. See here how timorous and faint-hearted his disciples were: "As they followed they were afraid;" afraid for themselves, as being apprehensive of their own danger; and justly might they be ashamed of their being thus afraid. Their Master's courage should have put spirit into them.

3. See here, what method he took to silence their fears: he did not go about to make the matter better than it was, nor to feed them with hopes that he might escape the storm; but told them again, what he had often told them before, the things that should happen to him. He knew the worst of it, and therefore went on thus boldly; and he will let them know the worst of it. Come, be not afraid; for, 1st. There is no remedy, the matter is determined, and cannot be avoided. 2nd. It is only the Son of man that shall suffer; their time of suffering was not at hand; he will now provide for their security. 3rd. "He shall rise again;" the issue of his sufferings will be glorious to himself, and advantageous to all that are his, ver. 33, 34. The method and particulars of Christ's sufferings are more largely foretold here than in any other of the predictions; that he shall first be delivered up by Judas "to the chief priests and the scribes, that they shall condemn him to death," but not having power to put him to death, they "shall deliver him to the Gentiles," to the Roman powers, "and they shall mock him, and scourge him, and spit upon him, and kill him." Christ had a perfect foresight, not only of his own death, but of all the aggravating circumstances of it, and yet he thus went forth to meet it.

Secondly. The check he gave to two of his disciples for their ambitious request. This story is much the same here as we had it, Mat. xx. 20; only there they are said to have made their request by their mother, here they are said to make it themselves; she introduced them, and presented their petition, and then they seconded it, and assented to it. Note, 1. As on the one hand there are some that do not use, so on the other hand there are some that do abuse the great encouragements Christ has given us in prayer. He hath said, "Ask, and it shall be given you;" and it is a commendable faith to ask for the great things he has promised. But it was a culpable presumption in these disciples to make such a boundless demand upon their Master: "We would that thou shouldst do for us whatsoever we shall desire." We had much better leave it to him to do for us what he sees fit, and he will do more than we can desire, Eph. iii. 20. 2. We must be cautious how we make general promises. Christ would not engage to do for them whatever they desired; but would know from them what it was they did desire: "What would ye that I should do for you?" He would have them go on with their suit, that they might be made ashamed of it. 3. Many have been led into a snare by false notions of Christ's kingdom, as if it were of this world, and like the kingdoms of the potentates of this world. James and John conclude, if Christ rise again, he must be a king; and if he be a king, his apostles must be peers; and one of these would willingly be the primus par regni.—the first peer of the realm; and the other next him, like Joseph in Pharaoh's court, or Daniel in Darius's. 4. Worldly honour is a glittering thing, with which the eyes of Christ's own disciples have many a time been dazzled; whereas to be good should be more our care than to look great, or to have the pre-eminence. 5. Our weakness and shortsightedness appear as much in our prayers as in any thing. We cannot order our speech when we speak to God, by reason of darkness, both concerning him and concerning ourselves. It is folly to prescribe to God, and wisdom to subscribe. 6. It is the will of Christ that we should prepare for sufferings, and leave it to him to recompense us for them. He needs not be put in mind, as Ahasuerus did, of the services of his people; nor can forget their "work of faith, and labour of love." Our care must be, that we may have wisdom and grace to know how to suffer with him, and then we may trust him to provide in the best manner how we shall reign with him, and when and where, and what the degrees of our glory shall be.

Thirdly. The check he gave to the rest of the disciples, for their uneasiness at it; "they began to be much displeased," to have indignation about James and John, ver. 41. They were angry at them for affecting precedence; not because it did so ill become the disciples of Christ, but because each of them hoped to have it themselves. When the Cynic trampled on Alexander's foot-cloth, with, Calco fastum Alexandri.—Now I tread on Alexander's pride, he was seasonably checked with, Sed majori fastu.—But with greater pride of thine own; so these discovered their own ambition, in their displeasure at the ambition of James and John; and Christ took this occasion to warn them against it, and all their successors in the ministry of the Gospel, ver. 42, 43. He "called them to him," in a familiar way, to give them an example of condescension, then, when he was reproving their ambition, and to teach them never to bid their disciples keep their distance. He shews them,

1. That dominion was generally abused in the world, ver. 42: "They which seem to rule over the Gentiles," that have the name and title of rulers, "they exercise lordship over them," that is all they study and aim at; not so much to protect them, and provide for their welfare, as to "exercise authority upon them;" they will be obeyed, aim to be arbitrary, and to have their will in every thing: Sic volo; sic jubeo; stat pro ratione voluntas.—Thus I will; thus I command; my good pleasure is my law.' Their care is what they shall get by their subjects, to support their own pomp and grandeur, not what they shall do for them.

2. That therefore it ought not to be admitted into the church; "it shall not be so among you;" those that shall be put under your charge must be as sheep under the charge of the shepherd, who is to tend them and feed them, and be a servant to them; not as horses under the command of the driver, that works them and beats them, and gets his pennyworths out of them. He that affects to be great and chief, that thrusts himself into a secular dignity and dominion, "he shall be servant of all," he shall be mean and contemptible in the eyes of all that are wise and good. "He that exalteth himself shall be abased." Or rather, he that would be truly great and chief, he must lay out himself to do good to all, must stoop to the meanest services, and labour in the hardest services. Those not only shall be most honoured hereafter, but are most honourable now, who are most useful. To convince them of this, he sets before them his own example, ver. 45. The Son of man submits first to the greatest hardships and hazards, and then enters into his glory; and can you expect to come to it any other way; or to have more ease and honour than he has? 1st. He takes upon him the form of a servant, comes "not to be ministered to," and waited upon, "but to minister" and wait to be gracious. 2nd. He becomes obedient to death, and to its dominion, for he "gives his life a ransom for many." Did he die for the benefit of good people, and shall not we study to live for their benefit?

46 And they came to Jericho: and as he went out of Jericho with his disciples and a great number of people, blind Bartimæus, the son of Timæus, sat by the highway side begging. 47 And when he heard that it was Jesus of Nazareth, he began to cry out, and say, Jesus, thou son of David, have mercy on me. 48 And many charged him that he should hold his peace: but he cried the more a great deal, Thou son of David, have mercy on me. 49 And Jesus stood still, and commanded him to be called. And they call the blind man, saying unto him, Be of good comfort, rise; he calleth thee. 50 And he, casting away his garment, rose, and came to Jesus. 51 And Jesus answered and said rendered "amazed" is radically the same as the one so translated in chap. ix. 15, but not so emphatic. Mr. Webster, in his "Synonyms," &c., explains the verb here to mean "amazement at our Lord's majestic bearing, solemn manner, and awful aspect." He regards the substantive as meaning "awe, surprise at a strange or unusual deed or expression." Not only were the disciples following behind, but oppressed with a vague feeling of dread, a presentiment of a solemn future, and, worse than all, they were afraid. Their fear was not terror, however, so much as a reluctant anticipation of impending troubles.

x. 34. Instead of the common reading, "the third day," the reading "within" or "after three days" is adopted by some modern editors and critics.

x. 35. From Matt. xx. 20 we learn that James and John were accompanied by their mother, who really acted as their petitioner. Coming, as this incident does, immediately after the sad predictions unto him, What wilt thou that I should do unto thee? The blind man said unto him, Lord, that I might receive my sight. 52 And Jesus said unto him, Go thy way; thy faith hath made thee whole. And immediately he received his sight, and followed Jesus in the way.

This passage of story agrees with that, Mat. xx. 29, &c., only that there were told of two blind men; here, and Lu. xviii. 35, only of one; but if there were two, there was one; this one is named here, being a blind beggar that was much talked of, Bartimæus, that is, the son of Timæus; which some think signifies, 'the son of a blind man.' He was the blind son of a blind father, which made the case the worse, and the cure the more wonderful, and the more proper to typify the spiritual cures wrought by the grace of Christ on those that not only are born blind, but are born of those that are blind.

I. This blind man sat begging, as they do with us. Note, Those who, by the providence of God, are disabled to get a livelihood by their own labour, and have not any other way of subsisting, are the most proper objects of charity; and particular care ought to be taken of them.

II. He cried out to the Lord Jesus for mercy: "Have mercy on me, O Lord, thou son of David." Misery is the object of mercy; his own miserable case he recommends to the compassion of the son of David, of whom it was foretold, that when he should come to save us, "the eyes of the blind should be opened," Isa. xxxv. 5. In coming to Christ for help and healing, we should have an eye to him as the promised Messiah, the trustee of mercy and grace.

III. Christ encouraged him to hope that he should find mercy, for he "stood still, and commanded him to be called." We must never reckon it a hindrance to us in our way to stand still, when it is to do a good work. Those about him, who had discouraged him at first, perhaps were now the persons that handed to him the gracious call of Christ, "Be of good comfort, rise, he calls thee;" and if he call thee, he will cure thee. Note, The gracious invitations Christ gives us to come to him, are great encouragements to our hope, that we shall speed well if we come to him, and shall have what we come for. Let the guilty, the empty, the tempted, the hungry, the naked, be of good comfort, for he calls them to be pardoned, to be supplied, to be succoured, to be filled, to be clothed, to have all that done for them which their case calls for.

IV. The poor man hereupon made the best of his way to Christ. He cast away his loose upper garment, and came to Jesus, ver. 50; he cast away every thing that might be in danger of throwing him down, or might any way hinder him in coming to Christ, or retard his motion. Those who would come to Jesus, must cast away the garment of their own sufficiency, must strip themselves of all conceit of that, and must free themselves from every weight, and the sin that, like long garments, doth most easily beset them, Heb. xii. 1.

V. The particular favour he begged was, that his eyes might be opened, that so he might be able to work for his living, and might be no longer burthensome to others. It is a very desirable thing to be in a capacity of earning our own bread; and where God has given men their limbs and senses, it is a shame for men, by their foolishness and slothfulness, to make themselves in effect blind and lame.

VI. This favour he received, his eyes were opened, ver. 52; and two things Mark here adds, which intimate, 1. How Christ made it a double favour to him, by putting the honour of it upon his faith, "thy faith hath made thee whole;" faith in Christ, as the son of David, and in his pity and power; not thy importunity, but thy faith; setting Christ on work, or rather Christ setting thy faith on work. Those supplies are most comfortable that are fetched in by our faith. 2. How he made it a double favour to himself; when he had "received his sight, he followed Jesus by the way;" by this he made it appear that he was thoroughly cured, that he no more needed one to lead him, but could go himself; and by this he evidenced the grateful sense he had of Christ's kindness to him, that when he had his sight, he made this use of it. It is not enough to come to Christ for spiritual healing, but when we are healed, we must continue to follow him; that we may do honour to him, and receive instruction from him. Those that have spiritual eyesight see such beauty in Christ as will effectually draw them to run after him.

CHAPTER XI.

We are now come to the Passion week, the week in which Christ died; and the great occurrences of that week. I. Christ's riding in triumph into Jerusalem, ver. 1—11. II. His cursing the barren fig tree, ver. 12—14. III. His driving those out of the temple that turned it into an exchange, ver. 15—19. IV. His discourse with his disciples concerning the power of faith, and efficacy of prayer, on occasion of the withering of the fig tree he cursed, ver. 20—26. V. His reply to those who questioned his authority, ver. 27—33.

AND when they came nigh to Jerusalem, unto Bethphage and Bethany, at the mount of Olives, he sendeth forth two of his disciples, 2 And saith unto them, Go your way into the village over against you: and as soon as ye be entered into it, ye shall find a colt tied, whereon never man sat; loose him, and bring him. 3 And if any man say unto you, Why do ye this? say ye that the Lord hath need of him; and straightway he will send him hither. 4 And they went their way, and found the colt tied by the door without in a place where two ways met; and they loose him. 5 And certain of them that stood there said unto them, What do ye, loosing the colt? 6 And they said unto them even as Jesus had commanded: and they let them go. 7 And they brought the colt to Jesus, and cast their garments on him; and he sat upon him. 8 And many spread their garments in the way: and others cut down branches off the trees, and strawed them in the way. 9 And they that went before, and they that followed, cried, saying, Hosanna; Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord: 10 Blessed be the kingdom of our father David, that cometh in the name of the Lord: Hosanna in the highest. 11 And Jesus entered into Jerusalem, and into the temple: and when he had looked round about upon all things, and now the eventide was come, he went out unto Bethany with the twelve.

We have here the story of the public entry Christ made into Jerusalem, four or five days before his death. And he came into town thus remarkably, 1. To shew that he was not afraid of the power and malice of his enemies in Jerusalem; he did not steal into the city incognito, as one that durst not shew his face; no, they needed not send spies to search for him, he comes in with observation. This would be an encouragement to his disciples, that were timorous and cowed at the thought of their enemies' power and rage; let them see how bravely their Master sets them all at defiance. 2. To shew that he was not cast down or disquieted at the thoughts of his approaching sufferings, he not only came publicly, but came in cheerfully and with acclamations of joy. Though he was now but taking the field, and girding on the harness, yet, being fully assured of a complete victory, he thus triumphs as though he had put it off.

First. The outside of this triumph was very mean; he rode upon an ass's colt, that being an ass looked very contemptible, and made no figure; and being but a colt, whereon never man sat, we may suppose was rough and untrimmed; and not only so, but rude and ungovernable, and would disturb and disgrace the solemnity. This colt was borrowed too. Christ went upon the water in a borrowed boat, eat the passover in a borrowed chamber, was buried in a borrowed sepulchre, and here rode on a borrowed ass. Let not Christians scorn to be beholden one to another, and when need is, to go a borrowing, for our Master did not. He had no rich trappings; they threw their clothes upon the colt, and so he sat upon him, ver. 7. The persons that attended were mean people; and all the show they could make, was by spreading their garments in the way, and strewing branches of trees in the way, ver. 8, as they used to do at the feast of tabernacles. All these were marks of his humiliation; even when he would be taken notice of, he would be taken notice of for his meanness; and they are instructions to us not to mind high things, but to condescend to them of low estate. How ill doth it become Christians to take state, when Christ was so far from affecting it.

Secondly. The inside of this triumph was very great, not only as it was the fulfilling the Scripture, which is not taken notice of here, as it was in Matthew, but as there were several rays of Christ's glory shining forth in the midst of all this meanness. 1. Christ shewed his knowledge of things distant, and his power over the wills of men, when he sent his disciples for the colt, ver. 1—4. By this it appears he can do every thing, and no thought can be withholden from him. 2. He shewed his dominion over the creatures, in riding on a colt that was never backed. The subjection of the inferior part of the creation to of the two preceding verses, it holds a peculiarly striking position. Their faith and expectations had crossed the yawning valley of humiliation, and seizing upon the promised resurrection beyond, were ambitious of a principal share in the glory. They had forgotten what is recorded in chap. ix. 34, &c., and hence their indiscretion.

x. 46. According to Matt. xx. 29, &c., there were two blind beggars by the wayside at Jericho. Here almost literally the same words are spoken of one beggar only, with the addition of his name. On referring to Luke xviii. 35, &c., we find mention of a blind beggar who sat by the wayside as they came near to Jericho. Much ingenuity has been expended upon the attempt to harmonise the three accounts, and not a few are content to believe that there were two blind men, one of whom they saw as they went into Jericho, and the other as they left the town. The name of the latter is given here only. As "bar" means "son," it would seem that "son of Timeus" man is spoken of, with application to Christ, Ps. viii. 5, 6, compared with Heb. ii. 8; for to him it is owing, and to his mediation, that we have any remaining benefit by that grant God made to man of a sovereignty in this lower world, Gen. i. 28. And perhaps Christ, in riding the ass's colt, would give a shadow of his power over the spirit of man, who is born as the wild ass's colt, Job xi. 12. 3. The colt was brought from a place where two ways met, ver. 4, as if Christ would shew that he came to direct those into the right way who had two ways before them, and were in danger of taking the wrong. 4. Christ received the joyful hosannas of the people; that is, both the welcome they gave him, and their good wishes to the prosperity of his kingdom, ver. 9. It was God that put it into the hearts of these people to cry hosanna, who were not by art and management brought to it, as those were who afterwards cried "Crucify, crucify." Christ reckons himself honoured by the faith and praises of the multitude; and it is God that brings people to do him this honour, beyond their own intentions.

1st. They welcomed his person, ver. 9, "Blessed is he that cometh," the οἰκουμενος, "he that should come," so often promised, so long expected; he comes "in the name of the Lord," as God's ambassador to the world; "Blessed be he;" let him have our applauses, and best affections; he is a blessed Saviour, and brings blessings to us, and blessed be he that sent him. Let him be "blessed in the name of the Lord," and let all nations and ages call him blessed, and think and speak highly and honourably of him.

2nd. They wished well to his interest, ver. 10. They believed that, as mean a figure as he made, he had a kingdom, which should shortly be set up in the world, that it was the kingdom of their father David, (that father of his country,) the kingdom promised to him and his seed for ever; a kingdom that came "in the name of the Lord," supported by a Divine authority. "Blessed be this kingdom; let it take place, let it get ground, let it come in the power of it, and let all opposing rule, principality, and power be put down; let it go on conquering and to conquer." Hosanna to this kingdom; prosperity be to it; all happiness attend it. The proper signification of Hosanna is that which we find Rev. vii. 10, "Salvation to our God that sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb;" that is, "Success to religion, both natural and revealed." "Hosanna in the highest;" "Praises be to our God, who is in the highest heavens, over all, God blessed for ever;" or, "Let him be praised by his angels, that are in the highest heavens; let our hosannas be an echo to theirs."

Christ, thus attended, thus applauded, came into the city, and went directly to the temple. Here was no banquet of wine prepared for his entertainment, nor the least refreshment, but he immediately applied himself to his work, for that was his meat and drink. He went to the temple, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, "The Lord, whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to his temple," without sending any immediate notice before him; he shall surprise you with a day of visitation, for he shall be "like a refiner's fire, and like fuller's soap," Mal. iii. 1-3. He came to the temple, and took a view of the present state of it, ver. 11. He "looked round about upon all things," but as yet said nothing. He saw many disorders there, but kept silence, Ps. i. 21. Though he intended to suppress them, he would not go about the doing of it all on a sudden, lest he should seem to have done it rashly; but let things be as they were for this night, intending the next morning to apply himself to the necessary reformation, and to take the day before him. We may be confident that God sees all the wickedness that is in the world, though he do not presently reckon for it, nor cast it out. Christ having made his remarks upon what he saw in the temple, retired in the evening to a friend's house at Bethany, because there he would be more out of the noise of the town, and out of the way of being suspected as designing to head a faction.

12 And on the morrow, when they were come from Bethany, he was hungry: 13 And seeing a fig tree afar off having leaves, he came, if haply he might find any thing thereon: and when he came to it, he found nothing but leaves; for the time of figs was not yet. 14 And Jesus answered and said unto it, No man eat fruit of thee hereafter for ever. And his disciples heard it. 15 And they come to Jerusalem: and Jesus went into the temple, and began to cast out them that sold and bought in the temple, and overthrew the tables of the money-changers, and the seats of them that sold doves; 16 And would not suffer that any man should carry any vessel through the temple. 17 And he taught, saying unto them, Is it not written, My house shall be called of all nations the house of prayer? but ye have made it a den of thieves. 18 And the scribes and chief priests heard it, and sought how they might destroy him: for they feared him, because all the people was astonished at his doctrine. 19 And when even was come, he went out of the city. 20 And in the morning, as they passed by, they saw the fig tree dried up from the roots. 21 And Peter calling to remembrance saith unto him, Master, behold, the fig tree which thou cursedst is withered away. 22 And Jesus answering saith unto them, Have faith in God. 23 For verily I say unto you,

That whosoever shall say unto this mountain, Be thou removed, and be thou cast into the sea; and shall not doubt in his heart, but shall believe that those things which he saith shall come to pass; he shall have whatsoever he saith. 24 Therefore I say unto you, What things soever ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them. 25 And when ye stand praying, forgive, if ye have ought against any: that your Father also which is in heaven may forgive you your trespasses. 26 But if ye do not forgive, neither will your Father which is in heaven forgive your trespasses.

Here is, I. Christ's cursing the fruitless fig tree. He had a convenient resting place at Bethany, and therefore thither he went at resting time, but his work lay at Jerusalem, and thither therefore he returned in the morning, at working time; and so intent was he upon his work, that he went out from Bethany without breakfast, which, before he was gone far, he found the want of, and was hungry, ver. 12, for he was subject to all the sinless infirmities of our nature. Finding himself in want of food, he went to a fig tree, which he saw at some distance; that being well adorned with green leaves, he hoped to find enriched with some sort of fruit; but "he found nothing but leaves;" he hoped to find some fruit, for the time of gathering in figs, though it was near, yet it was not yet; so that it could not be pretended that it had had fruit, but it was gathered and gone, for it was not come to that yet. Or, he found none, for indeed it was not a season of figs, it was no good fig year. But this was worse than any other fig tree, for there was not so much as one fig to be found upon it, though it was so full of leaves. However, Christ was willing to make an example of it, not to the trees, but to the men of that generation, and therefore cursed it, with that curse which is the reverse of the first blessing, "Be fruitful;" he said unto it, "Never let any man eat fruit of thee hereafter for ever," ver. 14. Sweetness and good fruit is, in Jotham's parable, the honour of the fig tree, Jud. ix. 11; and its serviceableness therein to man, preferable to the preferment of being promoted over the trees; now to be deprived of that was a grievous curse. This was intended to be a type and figure of the doom passed upon the Jewish church, to which he came seeking fruit, but found none," Lu. xiii. 6, 7; and though it was not, according to the doom in the parable, immediately cut down, yet according to this in the history, blindness and hardness befell them, Rom. xi. 8, 25; so that they were from henceforth good for nothing. The disciples heard what sentence Christ passed on this tree, and took notice of it. Woes from Christ's mouth are to be observed and kept in mind, as well as blessings.

II. His clearing the temple of the market people that frequented it, and of those that made it a thoroughfare. We do not find that Christ met with food elsewhere, when he missed of it on the fig tree; but the zeal of God's house so ate him up, and made him forget himself, that he came hungry as he was to Jerusalem, and went straight to the temple, and began to reform those abuses which the day before he had marked out; to shew, that when the Redeemer came to Zion, his errand was to "turn away ungodliness from Jacob," Rom. xi. 26; and that he came not, as he was falsely accused, to destroy the temple, but to purify and refine it, and reduce his church to its primitive rectitude.

1. He cast out the "buyers and sellers, overthrew the tables of the money-changers," (and threw the money to the ground, the fitter place for it,) and threw down the "seats of them that sold doves." This he did as one having authority, as a Son in his own house. The filth of the daughter of Zion is purged away, not by might, nor by power, but by "the spirit of judgment, and the spirit of burning;" and he did it without opposition, for what he did was manifested to be right and good, even in the consciences of those that had connived at it, and countenanced it; because they got money by it. Note, It may be some encouragement to zealous reformers, that many times the purging out of corruptions, and the correcting of abuses, proves an easier piece of work than was apprehended. Prudent attempts sometimes prove successful beyond expectation; and there are not those lions found in the way that were feared to be.

2. He "would not suffer that any man should carry any vessel," any sort of goods or wares, "through the temple," or any of the courts of it, because it was the nearer way, and would save them the labour of going about, ver. 16. The Jews owned it was one of the instances of honour due to the temple, not to make the mountain of the house, or the court of the Gentiles, a road or common passage, or to come into it with any bundle.

3. He gave a good reason for this; because it was written, "My house shall be called of all nations the house of prayer," vc 17: so it is written, Isa. lvi. 7. It shall pass among all people under that character; "it shall be the house of prayer of all nations;" it was so in the first institution of it. When Solomon dedicated it, it was with an eye to the sons of the strangers, 1 Kin. viii. 41; and it was prophesied that it should be yet more so. Christ will have the temple, as a type of the gospel church, to be, 1st. A house of prayer. After he had turned out the oxen and doves, which were things for sacrifice, he revived the appointment of it as "a house of prayer," to teach us that when all sacrifices and offerings shall be abolished, the spiritual sacrifices of prayer and praise should continue, and remain for ever. 2nd. That it should be so "to all nations," and not to the people of the Jews only; for "whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved," though not of the seed of Jacob, according to the flesh. It was therefore insufferable for them to "make it a den of thieves," which would prejudice those nations against it, whom they should have invited to it. When Christ drove out the buyers and sellers at the beginning of his ministry, he only charged them with making the temple a house of merchandise, Jno. ii. 1; but now he charged them with making it a den of thieves, because, since then, they had twice gone about to stone him in the temple, Jno. viii. 1; x. 31; or because the traders there were grown notorious for cheating their customers, and imposing upon the ignorance and necessity of the country people, which is no better than downright thievery. Those that suffer vain worldly thoughts to lodge within them, when they are at their devotions, turn the house of prayer into a house of merchandise; but they that make loud prayers for a pretence to devour widows' houses, turn it into a den of thieves.

4. The scribes and the chief priests were extremely nettled at this, ver. 18.

is merely an explanation of Bar Timeus. The reading of the verse in the Syriac is, "And they came to Jericho: and when Jesus departed from Jericho, he and his disciples, and great multitudes, Timeus, son of Timeus, a blind man, was sitting by the wayside and begging." In the Sinaitic MS. the last clause is, "The son of Timeus, Bartimeus, blind and a beggar, was sitting by the way." We need not go far to find illustration of the custom of placing blind beggars by the wayside.

x. 51. The word here rendered "Lord" is the Hebrew "Rabboni," i.e., "my master;" it is only found elsewhere in the New Testament at John xx. 16.

xi. 1. More literally, perhaps, and as given in the Sinaitic MS., "And when they come nigh to Jerusalem, to Bethphage and to Bethany, by the Mount of Olives, he sendeth forth two of his disciples." The site of Bethphage is disputed, the hamlet having long since disappeared; but Bethany is still well known, and on the

They hated him, and hated to be reformed by him, and yet they feared him, lest he should next overthrow their seats, and expel them, being conscious to themselves of the profaning and abusing of their power. They found he had a great interest, and that "all the people were astonished at his doctrine," and every thing he said was an oracle and a law to them; and what durst he not attempt, what could he not effect, being thus supported? They therefore sought not how they might make their peace with him, but "how they might destroy him." A desperate attempt, and which one would think, they themselves could not but fear was fighting against God. But they care not what they do, to support their own power and grandeur.

II. His discourse with his disciples, upon occasion of the fig tree's withering away, which he had cursed. At even, as usual, he "went out of the city," ver. 19, to Bethany; but it is probable it was in the dark, so that they could not see the fig tree; but the next morning, as they passed by, they observed the "fig tree dried up from the roots," ver. 20. More is included many times in Christ's curses than is expressed, as appears by the effects of them. The curse was no more but that it should never bear fruit again; but the effect goes farther, it is "dried up from the roots." If it bear no fruit, it shall bear no leaves to cheat people. Now observe,

1. How the disciples were affected with it. Peter remembered Christ's words, and said, with surprise, "Master, behold, the fig tree which thou cursedst is withered away," ver. 21. Note, Christ's curses have wonderful effects, and make those to wither presently that flourished like the green bay tree. Those whom he curseth, they are cursed indeed. This represented the character and state of the Jewish church, which from henceforward was as a tree dried up from the roots; no longer fit for food, but for fuel only. The first establishment of the Levitical priesthood was ratified and confirmed by the miracle of a dry red, which in one night budded and blossomed, and brought forth almonds, Num. xvii. 8; a happy omen of the fruitfulness and flourishing of that priesthood; and now by a contrary miracle, the expiration of that priesthood was signified by a flourishing tree dried up in a night; the just punishment of those priests that had abused it. And this seemed very strange to the disciples, and scarce credible, that the Jews, that had been so long God's own, his only professing people in the world, should be thus abandoned. They could not imagine how that fig tree should so soon wither away; but this comes of rejecting Christ, and being rejected by him.

2. The good instructions Christ gave them from it, for of those even this withered tree was fruitful.

1st. Christ teacheth them from hence to pray in faith, ver. 22: "Have faith in God." They admired the power of Christ's word of command, "Why," saith Christ, "a lively active faith would put as great a power into your prayers, ver. 23, 24: "Whosoever shall say to this mountain," this mount of Olives, "Be removed, and be cast into the sea," if he has but any word of God, general or particular, to build his faith upon, and if he "shall not doubt in his heart, but shall believe that those things which he saith," according to the warrant he has from what God hath said, "shall come to pass, he shall have whatsoever he saith." Through the strength and power of God in Christ, the greatest difficulty shall be got over, and the thing shall be effected; and therefore, ver. 24, "What things soever ye desire when ye pray, believe that ye" shall receive them; nay, believe that ye "do receive them," and He that has power to give them saith, "Ye shall have them." I say unto you, ye shall, ver. 24; Verily I say unto you, ye shall, ver. 23. Now this is to be applied, First. To that faith of miracles which the apostles and first preachers of the Gospel were endued with, which did wonders in things natural; healing the sick, raising the dead, casting out devils; these were in effect the removing of mountains. The apostle speaks of a faith which would do that, and yet might be found where holy love was not, 1 Cor. xiii. 2. Secondly. It may be applied to that miracle of faith which all true Christians are endued with, which doth wonders in things spiritual. It justifies us, Rom. v. 1; and so removes mountains of guilt, and casts them into the depths of the sea, never to rise up in judgment against us, Mic. vii. 19. It purifies the heart, Acts xv. 10; and so removes mountains of corruption, and makes them plain before the grace of God, Zec. iv. 7. It is by faith that the world is conquered, Satan's fiery darts quenched, a soul is crucified with Christ, and yet lives; by faith we set the Lord always before us, and see him that is invisible, and have him present to our minds, and this is effectual to remove mountains; for at the presence of the Lord, at the presence of the God of Jacob, the mountains were not only moved, but removed, Ps. cxiv. 6, 7.

2nd. To this is added, here, that necessary qualification of the prevailing prayer, that we freely forgive those who have been any way injurious to us, and be in charity with all men, ver. 25, 26: "When ye stand praying, forgive." Note, Standing is no improper posture for prayer; it was generally used among the Jews: hence they called their prayers, their standings; when they say how the world was kept up by prayer, they expressed it thus: Stationibus stat mundus.—"The world is upheld by standings." But the primitive Christians generally used the more humble and reverent gesture of kneeling, especially on fasting days, though not on Lord's days. When we are at prayer, we must remember to pray for others, particularly for our enemies, and those that have wronged us; now we cannot pray sincerely that God would do them good, if we bear malice to them, and wish them ill. If we have injured others, before we pray we must go and be reconciled to them, Mat. v. 26; but if they have injured us, we go a nearer way to work, and must immediately from our hearts forgive them. First. Because this is a good step towards obtaining the pardon of our own sins: forgive, that your Father may forgive you; that is, that you may be qualified to receive forgiveness; that he may forgive you without injury to his honour, as it would be if he should suffer those to have such benefit by his mercy, as are so far from being conformable to the pattern of it. Secondly. Because the want of this is a certain bar to the obtaining of the pardon of our sins. "If ye do not forgive" those who have injured you, if you hate their persons, bear them a grudge, meditate revenge, and take all occasions to speak ill of them, "neither will your Father forgive your trespasses." This ought to be remembered in prayer, because one great errand we have to the throne of grace, is to pray for the pardon of our sins; and care about it ought to be our daily care, because prayer is a part of our daily work. Our Saviour often insists on this, for it was his great design to engage his disciples to love one another.

27 And they come again to Jerusalem: and as he was walking in the temple, there come to him the chief priests, and the scribes, and the elders, 28 And say unto him, By what authority doest thou these things? and who gave thee this authority to do these things? 29 And Jesus answered and said unto them, I will also ask of you one question, and answer me, and I will tell you by what authority I do these things. 30 The baptism of John, was it from heaven, or of men? answer me. 31 And they reasoned with themselves, saying, If we shall say, From heaven; he will say, Why then did ye not believe him? 32 But if we shall say, Of men; they feared the people: for all men counted John, that he was a prophet indeed. 33 And they answered and said unto Jesus, We cannot tell. And Jesus answering saith unto them, Neither do I tell you by what authority I do these things.

We have here Christ examined by the great Sanhedrim concerning his authority; for they claimed a power to call prophets to an account concerning their mission. They came to him when he was walking in the temple, not for his diversion, but teaching the people, first one company, and then another. The cloisters or piazzas, in the courts of the temple, were fitted for this purpose. The great men were vexed to see him followed, and heard with attention; and therefore came to him with some solemnity, and did as it were arraign him at the bar with this question, "By what authority doest thou these things?" ver. 28. Now observe,

First. How they designed hereby to run him aground, and to embarrass him; if they could make it out, before the people, that he had not a legal mission, that he was not duly ordained, though he was never so well qualified, and preached never so profitably and well, they would tell the people they ought not to hear him. And this they made the last refuge of an obstinate unbelief; because they were resolved not to receive his doctrine, they were resolved to find some flaw or other in his commission, and will conclude it invalid if it be not produced and ratified in their court. Thus the papists resolve their controversy with us very much into the mission of our ministers, and if they have but any pretence to overthrow that, they think they have gained their point, though we have the Scripture never so much on our side. But this is indeed a question which all that act either as magistrates or ministers ought to be furnished with a good answer to, and often put it to themselves, By what authority do I these things? For how can men preach except they be sent? or how can they act with comfort, or confidence, or hope of success, except they be authorized? Jer. xxxiii. 22.

Secondly. How he effectually ran them aground, and embarrassed them with a question, what their thoughts were concerning "the baptism of John, was it from heaven, or of men?" By what authority did John preach, and baptize, and gather disciples? "answer me," ver. 30. Deal fairly and ingenuously, and give a categorical answer, either one way or other. By the resolving of their question into this, our Saviour intimates how near akin his doctrine and baptism was to John's; they had the same original, and the same design and tendency, to introduce the gospel kingdom. Christ might with the better grace put this question to them, because they had sent a committee of their own house to examine John, Jno. i. 19. Now, saith Christ, what was the result of your inquiries concerning him? They knew what they thought of this question; they could not but think that John Baptist was a man sent of God. But the difficulty was, what they should say to it now; and men that oblige not themselves to speak as they think, which is a certain rule, cannot avoid perplexing themselves thus.

1. If they own the baptism of John to be "from heaven," as really it was, they shame themselves, for Christ will presently turn it upon them, "Why did ye not then believe him," and receive his baptism? They could not bear that Christ should say this, but they could bear it that their own consciences should say so, because they had an art of stifling and silencing them, and because what conscience said, though it might gail and grate them a little, it would not shame them, and then they would do well enough, who looked no farther than Saul's care when he was convicted, "Honour me now before this people," 1 Sam. xv. 30.

2. If they say it is "of men," that he was not sent of God, but his doctrine and baptism were inventions of his own, they expose themselves, the people will be ready to do them a mischief, or at least clamour upon them; for "all men counted John that he was a prophet indeed;" and therefore they could not bear that he should be reflected on. Note, There is a carnal, slavish fear, which not only wicked subjects, but wicked rulers likewise, are liable to, which God makes use of as a means to keep the world in some order, and to suppress violence, that it shall not always grow up into a rod of wickedness. Now, by this dilemma to which Christ brought them, 1st. They were confounded and baffled, and forced to make a dishonourable retreat; to pretend ignorance, "We cannot tell," (and that was mortification enough to those proud men,) but really to discover the greatest malice and wilfulness. What Christ did by his wisdom, we must labour to do by our well-doing, "put to silence the ignorance of foolish men," 1 Pet. ii. 15. 2nd. Christ came off with honour, and justified himself, in denying to give them an answer to their imperious demand, "Neither tell I you by what authority I do these things." They did not deserve to be told, who, it was plain, did not contend for truth, but victory; nor did he need to tell them, for the works which he did told them plainly that he had authority from God to do what he did; since no man could do those miracles which he did unless God were with him. Let them wait but three or four days, and his resurrection shall tell them who gave him his authority, for by that he will be "declared to be the Son of God with power," as by their rejecting him notwithstanding, they will be declared to be the enemies of God.

road between Jericho and Jerusalem. Some think there was another Bethany, east of Jericho and across the Jordan.

xi. 11. The entrance of Jesus into the city is mentioned elsewhere, but only Mark expressly records his going to the Temple on this occasion; Matthew implies it.

xi. 13. The last words, "for the time of figs was not yet," or "for it was not the season of figs," have attracted attention; and it has been asked how Jesus could expect figs when the season for them was not come. Sundry replies have been proposed, but it is clear that none will be satisfactory unless such as accord with known facts. At Engedi the fig-tree yields fruit all the year round, and the tree is an evergreen. There are trees again on which the unripe fruit remains through the winter, and attains maturity early, before the ordinary crop. Again, as figs may appear before the leaves, a tree with leaves might be expected to have fruit. Moreover, figs are often eaten before they are ripe. From all these and other ND he began to speak unto them by parables. A certain man planted a vineyard, and set an hedge about it, and digged a place for the winefat, and built a tower, and let it out to husbandmen, and went into a far country. 2 And at the season he sent to the husbandmen a servant, that he might receive from the husbandmen of the fruit of the vineyard. 3 And they caught him, and beat him, and sent him away empty. 4 And again he sent unto them another servant; and at him they cast stones, and wounded him in the head, and sent him away shamefully handled. 5 And again he sent another; and him they killed, and many others; beating some, and killing some. 6 Having yet therefore one son, his wellbeloved, he sent him also last unto them, saying, They will reverence my son. 7 But those husbandmen said among themselves, This is the heir; come, let us kill him, and the inheritance shall be our's. 8 And they took him, and killed him, and cast him out of the vineyard. 9 What shall therefore the lord of the vineyard do? he will come and destroy the husbandmen, and will give the vineyard unto others. 10 And have ye not read this scripture; The stone which the builders rejected is become the head of the corner: 11 This was the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes? 12 And they sought to lay hold on him, but feared the people: for they knew that he had spoken the parable against them: and they left him, and went their way.

Christ had formerly in parables shewed how he designed to set up the gospel church, now he begins in parables to shew how he would lay aside the Jewish church, which it might have been grafted into the stock of, but was built upon the ruins of. This parable we had, just as we have it here, Mat. xxi. 33. We may observe here.

First. They that enjoy the privileges of the visible church have a vineyard let out to them, which is capable of great improvement, and from the occupiers of which rent is justly expected. When God "shewed his word unto Jacob, his statutes and judgments unto Israel," Ps. cxlvii. 19, when he set up his temple among them, his priesthood, and other his ordinances, then he let out to them the vineyard he had planted, which he hedged, and in which he built a tower, ver. 1. Members of the church are God's tenants, and they have both a good landlord and a good bargain, and may live well upon it, if it be not their own fault.

Secondly. Those whom God lets out his vineyard to, he sends his servants to, to put them in mind of his just expectations from them, ver. 2. He was not hasty in his demands, nor high, for he did not send for the rent till they could make it, at the season: nor did he put them to the trouble of making money of it, but was willing to take it in kind.

Thirdly. It is sad to think what base usage God's faithful ministers have met with, in all ages, from those that have enjoyed the privileges of the church, and have not brought forth fruit answerable. The Old Testament prophets were persecuted even by those that went under the name of the Old Testament church; they "beat them and sent them empty away," ver. 3; that was bad; they "wounded them, and sent them away shamefully entreated," ver. 4; that was worse; nay, at length they came to such a pitch of wickedness that they "killed them," ver. 5.

Fourthly. It was no wonder if those who abused the prophets abused Christ himself. God did at length send them his "Son, his wellbeloved;" it was therefore so much the greater kindness in him to send him, as in Jacob to send Joseph to visit his brethren, Gen. xxxvii. 14. And it might be expected that he whom their Master loved, they also should respect and love, ver. 6; "they will reverence my Son," and in reverence to him will pay their rent; but, instead of reverencing him because he was the Son and heir, they therefore hated him, ver. 7. Because Christ, in calling to repentance and reformation, made his demands with more authority than the prophets had done, they were the more enraged against him, and determined to put him to death; that they might engross all church power to themselves, and all the respects and obedience of the people might be paid to them only; "the inheritance shall be ours;" we will be lords paramount, and bear all the sway. There is an inheritance which, if they had duly revered the Son, might have been theirs; a heavenly inheritance: but they slighted that, and would have their inheritance in the wealth, and pomp, and powers of this world. So they "took him and killed him;" they had not done it yet, but they would do it in a little time; and they "cast him out of the vineyard," that is, they refused to admit his Gospel when he was gone; it would by no means agree with their scheme, and so they threw it out with disdain and detestation.

ritance: but they slighted that, and would have their inheritance in the wealth, and pomp, and powers of this world. So they "took him and killed him;" they had not done it yet, but they would do it in a little time; and they "cast him out of the vineyard," that is, they refused to admit his Gospel when he was gone; it would by no means agree with their scheme, and so they threw it out with disdain and detestation.

Fifthly. For such sinful, shameful doings, nothing can be expected but a fearful doom, ver. 9: "What shall therefore the Lord of the vineyard do?" It is easy to say what, for nothing could be done more provoking. 1. "He will come and destroy the husbandmen," whom he would have saved. When they only denied the fruit, he did not distrust upon them for the rent, nor dispossess them and dispossess them for nonpayment; but when they killed his servants and his Son, he determined to destroy them; and this was fulfilled when Jerusalem was laid waste, and the Jewish nation extirpated and made a desolation. 2. He will "give the vineyard to others." If he have not the rent from them, he will have it from another people; for God will be no loser by any. This was fulfilled in the taking in of the Gentiles, and the abundance of fruit which the Gospel brought forth in all the world, Col. i. 6. Note, If some, from whom we expected well, prove bad, it doth not follow but that others will be better. Christ encouraged himself with this in his undertaking, "Though Israel be not gathered," not gathered to him, but gathered against him, "yet shall I be glorious," Isa. xlix. 5, 6, as "a light to lighten the Gentiles." 3. Their opposition to Christ's exaltation shall be no obstruction to it, ver. 10, 11: "The stone which the builders rejected," notwithstanding that, "is become the head of the corner," is highly advanced as the head-stone, and of necessary use and influence as the corner-stone. God will set Christ as his King upon his holy hill of Zion, in spite of their project who would break his bands asunder. And all the world shall see and own this to be the Lord's doing, in justice to the Jews, and in compassion to the Gentiles. The exaltation of Christ was the Lord's doing; and it is his doing to exalt him in our hearts, and to set up his throne there; and if it be done, it cannot but be marvellous in our eyes.

Now what effect had this parable upon the chief priests and scribes, whose conviction was designed by it? "They knew he spake this parable against them," ver. 12. They could not but see their own faces in the glass of it; and one would think it shewed them their sin so very heinous, and their ruin so certain and great, that it should have frightened them into a compliance with Christ and his Gospel, should have prevailed to bring them to repentance, at least to make them desist from their malicious purpose against him; but instead of that, 1st. They sought to lay hold on him, and make him their prisoner immediately, and so to fulfil what he had just now said they would do to him, ver. 8. 2nd. Nothing restrained them from it but the awe they stood in of the people; they did not reverence Christ, nor had any fear of God before their eyes, but were afraid, if they should publicly lay hold on Christ, the mob would rise and lay hold on them and rescue him. 3rd. They "left him, and went their way;" if they could not do hurt to him, they resolved he should not do good to them; and therefore they got out of the hearing of his powerful preaching, "lest they should be converted and healed." Note, If men's prejudices be not conquered by the evidence of truth, they are but confirmed; and if the corruptions of the heart be not subdued by faithful reproofs, they are but enraged and exasperated. If the Gospel be not "a savour of life unto life," it will be "a savour of death unto death."

13 And they send unto him certain of the Pharisees and of the Herodians, to catch him in his words. 14 And when they were come, they say unto him, Master, we know that thou art true, and carest for no man: for thou regardest not the person of men, but teachest the way of God in truth: Is it lawful to give tribute to Cæsar, or not? 15 Shall we give, or shall we not give? But he, knowing their hypocrisy, said unto them, Why tempt ye me? bring me a penny, that I may see it. 16 And they brought it. And he saith unto them, Whose is this image and superscription? And they said unto him, Cæsar's. 17 And Jesus answering said unto them, Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's. And they marvelled at him.

When the enemies of Christ, who thirsted for his blood, could not find occasion against him from what he said against them, they tried to ensnare him by putting questions to him. Here we have him tempted, or attempted rather, with a question about the lawfulness of paying tribute to Cæsar. We had this story, Mat. xxii. 15.

First. The persons they employed were the Pharisees and the Herodians, men that in this matter were contrary to one another, and yet concurred against Christ, ver. 13. The Pharisees were great sticklers for the Jews' liberty, and if he should say it was lawful to give tribute to Cæsar, they would incense the common people against him, and the Herodians would underhand assist them in it. The Herodians were great sticklers for the Roman power, and if he should discountenance the paying of tribute to Cæsar, they would incense the governor against him; yea, and the Pharisees, against their own principles, would join with them in it. It is no new thing for those that are at variance in other things to join in a confederacy against Christ.

Secondly. The pretence they made was, that they desired him to resolve them a case of conscience, which was of great importance in the present juncture; and they take on them to have a mighty opinion of his ability to resolve it, ver. 14. They complimented him at a high rate, called him "Master," owned him for a teacher of "the way of God," a teacher of it "in truth;" he taught what was good, and upon principles of truth; that he would not be brought by smiles or frowns to depart a step from the rules of equity and goodness; "thou carest for no man, nor regardest the person of men;" thou art not afraid of offending either the jealous prince on one hand, or the jealous people facts, it follows that there was nothing unreasonable in looking for figs on so precocious a tree. This view is adopted by Dr. Thomson, in "The Land and the Book," as in harmony with well-ascertained facts.

xi. 21. The word "Master" here is a translation of "Rabbi," which occurs in the original, and is always best left untranslated.

xi. 22, 23. The Sinaitic MS. reads, "And Jesus answering saith to them, If ye have faith in God" (or, belief of God), "verily I say to you, Whoever saith to this mountain," &c. Several important authorities omit "whatsoever he saith" from the end of verse 23.

xi. 24. For "what things soever ye desire, when ye pray," the Sinaitic and Vatican MSS. read, "what things soever ye pray and desire."

xii. 4. In the Sinaitic MS. this verse reads, "And again he sent unto them another, and him they wounded in the head and shamefully handled."

on the other; thou art right, and always in the right, and dost in a right manner declare good and evil, truth and falsehood. If they spoke as they thought concerning Christ, when they said, 'We know that thou art right,' their persecuting him and putting him to death as a deceiver was a sin against knowledge; they knew him, and yet crucified him. However, a man's testimony shall be taken most strongly against himself, and out of their own mouths are they judged; they knew that he taught the way of God in truth, and yet rejected the counsel of God against themselves. The professions and pretences of hypocrites will be produced in evidence against them, and they will be self-condemned. But if they did not know or believe it, "they lied unto God with their mouth, and flattered him with their tongue."

Thirdly. The question they put was, "Is it lawful to give tribute to Cæsar, or not?" They would be thought desirous to know their duty: "as a nation that did righteousness, they ask of God the ordinances of justice;" when really they desired nothing but to know what he would say, in hopes that, which side soever he took of the question, they might take occasion from it to accuse him. Nothing more likely to ensnare ministers than bringing them to meddle with controversies about civil rights, and to settle the landmarks between the prince and the subject, which it is fit should be done, but not at all fit that they should have the doing of it. They seemed to refer the determining of this matter to Christ, and he indeed was fit to determine it, for "by him kings reign, and princes decree justice;" for they put the question fairly, "Shall we give, or shall we not give?" They seemed resolved to stand to his award: "If thou sayest we must pay tribute, we will do it, though we be made beggars by it; if thou sayest we must not, we will not, though we be made traitors for it." Many seem desirous to know their duty, that are no ways disposed to do it, as those proud men, Jer. xlii. 20.

Fourthly. Christ determined the question, and evaded the snare, by referring them to their national concessions already made, by which they were precluded from disputing this matter, ver. 15-17. "He knew their hypocrisy," the malice that was in their hearts against him, while "with their mouth they shewed all this love." Hypocrisy, though never so artfully managed, cannot be concealed from the Lord Jesus: he sees the potsherd that is covered with the silver dross. He knew they intended to ensnare him; and therefore contrived the matter so as to ensnare them, and to oblige them by their own words to do what they were unwilling to do, which was to pay their taxes honestly and quietly, and yet at the same time to screen himself against their exceptions. He made them acknowledge that the current money of their nation was Roman money, had the emperor's image on one side, and his superscription on the reverse; and if so, 1. Cæsar might command their money for the public benefit, because he has the custody and conduct of the state, wherein he ought to have his charges borne: "Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's." The circulation of the money is from him as the fountain, and therefore it must return to him. As far as it is his, so far it must be rendered to him; and how far it is his, and may be commanded by him, is to be judged by the constitution of the government, according as it is, and hath settled the prerogative of the prince and the property of the subject. 2. Cæsar might not command their consciences, nor did he pretend to it; he offered not to make any alteration in their religion. Pay your tribute therefore without murmuring or disputing, but be sure to "render to God the things that are God's;" perhaps referring to the parable he had just now put forth, in which he had condemned them for not rendering the fruits to the Lord of the vineyard, ver. 2. Many that seem careful to give to men their due, are in no care to give unto God "the glory due to his name;" whereas our hearts and best affections are as much due to him as ever rent was to a landlord, or tribute to a prince. All that heard Christ marvelled at the discretion of his answer, and how ingeniously he avoided the snare; but I doubt none were brought by it, as they ought to be, to render to God themselves and their devotions. Many will commend the wit of a sermon that will not be commanded by the Divine laws of a sermon.

18 Then come unto him the Sadducees, which say there is no resurrection; and they asked him, saying, 19 Master, Moses wrote unto us, If a man's brother die, and leave his wife behind him, and leave no children, that his brother should take his wife, and raise up seed unto his brother. 20 Now there were seven brethren: and the first took a wife, and dying left no seed. 21 And the second took her, and died, neither left he any seed: and the third likewise. 22 And the seven had her, and left no seed: last of all the woman died also. 23 In the resurrection therefore, when they shall rise, whose wife shall she be of them? for the seven had her to wife. 24 And Jesus answering said unto them, Do ye not therefore err, because ye know not the scriptures, neither the power of God? 25 For when they shall rise from the dead, they neither marry, nor are given in marriage; but are as the angels which are in heaven. 26 And as touching the dead, that they rise: have ye not read in the book of Moses, how in the bush God spake unto him, saying, I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob? 27 He is not the God of the dead, but the God of the living: ye therefore do greatly err.

The Sadducees, that were the deists of that age, here attack our Lord Jesus: it should seem, not as the scribes, and Pharisees, and chief priests, with any malicious design upon his person; they were not bigots and persecutors, but sceptics and infidels; and their design was upon his doctrine, to hinder the spreading of that. They denied that there was any resurrection, any world of spirits, any state of rewards and punishments on the other side death. Now those great and fundamental truths which they denied, Christ had made it his business to establish and prove, and had carried the notion of them much farther than ever it was before carried; and therefore they set themselves to perplex his doctrine.

First. See here the method they take to entangle it; they quote the ancient law, by which if a man died without issue, his brother was obliged to marry his widow, ver. 19. They suppose a case to happen, that, according to that law, seven brothers were successively the husbands of one woman, ver. 20. Probably these Sadducees, according to their wonted profaneness, intended hereby to ridicule that law, and so to bring the whole frame of the Mosaic institution into contempt, as absurd and inconvenient in the practice of it. Those who deny Divine truths commonly set themselves to disparage Divine laws and ordinances. But this only by the by: their design was to expose the doctrine of the resurrection; for they suppose that if there be a future state, it must be such a one as this; and then the doctrine they think is clogged either with this invincible absurdity, that a woman in that state must have seven husbands, or else with this unsolvable difficulty, whose wife she must be. See with what subtlety these heretics undermine the truth! They do not deny it, nor say there can be no resurrection; nay, they do not seem to doubt of it; nor say, 'If there be a resurrection, whose wife shall she be?' as the devil to Christ, "If thou be the Son of God;" but, as though these beasts of the field were more subtle than the serpent himself, they pretend to own the truth, as if they were not Sadducees—no, not they!—who said they denied the resurrection? they take it for granted there is a resurrection, and would be thought to desire instruction concerning it; when really they are designing to give it a fatal stab, and think they shall do it. Note, It is the common artifice of heretics and Sadducees to perplex and entangle the truth which they have not the impudence to deny.

Secondly. See here the method Christ takes to clear and establish this truth, which they attempted to darken and give a shock to. This was a matter of moment, and therefore Christ doth not pass it over lightly, but enlargeth upon it, that if they should not be reclaimed, yet others might be confirmed.

1. He chargeth the Sadducees with error, and chargeth that upon their ignorance. They who banter the doctrine of the resurrection, as some do in our age, would be thought the only knowing men, because the only free-thinkers; when really they are the fools in Israel, and the most enslaved and prejudiced thinkers in the world. "Do ye not therefore err?" Ye cannot but be sensible of it yourselves, and that the cause of your error is, 1. "Because ye know not the Scriptures;" not but that the Sadducees had read the Scriptures, and perhaps were ready in them; and yet they might be truly said not to know the Scriptures, because they did not know the sense and meaning of them, but put false constructions upon them; or they did not receive the Scriptures as the Word of God, but set up their own corrupt reasonings in opposition to the Scripture, and would believe nothing but what they could see. Note, A right knowledge of the Scripture, as the fountain whence all revealed religion now flows, and the foundation on which it is built, is the best preservative against error. Keep the truth, the Scripture truth, and it shall keep thee. 2. Because you know not "the power of God." They could not but know that God is almighty; but they would not apply that doctrine to this matter, but gave up the truth to the objections of the impossibility of it, which would all have been answered if they had but stuck to the doctrine of God's omnipotence, to which nothing is impossible. This therefore, which God hath spoken once, we are concerned to hear twice, to hear and believe, to hear and apply—"that power belongs to God," Ps. lxxi. 10; Rom. iv. 19-21. The same power that made soul and body, and preserved them while they were together, can preserve the body safe, and the soul active, when they are parted, and can unite them together again; for, "Behold, the Lord's arm is not shortened." The power of God, seen in the return of the spring, Ps. civ. 30; in the reviving of the corn, Jno. xii. 24; in the restoring of an abject people to their prosperity, Eze. xxxvii. 12-14; in the raising so many to life miraculously, both in the Old Testament and in the New; and especially in the resurrection of Christ, Eph. i. 19, 20;—are all earnest of our resurrection by the same power. Phil. iii. 21, "according to the mighty working whereby he is able to subdue all things to himself."

2. He sets aside all the force of their objection, by setting the doctrine of the future state in a true light, ver. 25; "when they shall rise from the dead, they neither marry nor are given in marriage." It is folly to ask, "Whose wife shall she be of the seven?" when the relation between husband and wife, though instituted in the earthly paradise, will not be known in the heavenly one. Turks and infidels expect sensual pleasures in their fools' paradises, but Christians know better things, that "flesh and blood shall not inherit the kingdom of God," 1 Cor. xv. 50; and expect better things, even a full satisfaction in God's love and likeness, Ps. xvii. 14, 15. They are as the angels of God in heaven, and we know they have neither wives nor children. It is no wonder if we confound ourselves with endless absurdities, when we measure our ideas of the world of spirits by the affairs of this world of sense.

Thirdly. He builds the doctrine of the future state, and of the blessedness of the righteous in that state, upon the covenant of God with Abraham, which God was pleased to own, long after Abraham's death, ver. 26, 27. He appeals to the Scriptures, "Have ye not read in the book of Moses?" We have some advantage in dealing with those that have read the Scriptures, though many that have read them "wrest them," as these Sadducees did, "to their own destruction." Now that which he refers them to is what God said to Moses at the bush, "I am the God of Abraham;" not only I was so, but I am so; I am the portion and happiness of Abraham, a God all-sufficient to him. Note, It is absurd to think that God's relation to Abraham should be continued, and thus solemnly recognised, if Abraham was annihilated, or that the living God should be the portion and happiness of a man that is dead, and must be for ever so; and therefore you must conclude, 1. That Abraham's soul exists and acts in a state of separation from the body. 2. That therefore some time or other the body must rise again, for there is such an innate inclination in a human soul towards its body, as would make a total and everlasting separation inconsistent with the ease and repose, much more with the bliss and joy, of those souls that have the Lord for their God. Upon the whole matter he concludes, "ye therefore do greatly err." Those that deny the resurrection greatly err, and ought to be told so.

28 And one of the scribes came, and having heard them reasoning together, and perceiving that

xii. 6. For "having yet therefore one son, his well-beloved," the Sinaitic and Vatican MSS. read, "he had yet one well-beloved son."

xii. 23. In the Sinaitic and Vatican MSS. this verse begins, "In the resurrection whose wife shall she be of them?"

xii. 26. For "in the book of Moses, how in the bush God spake," translate, "in the book of Moses, at the bush, how God spake."

xii. 29. The Sinaitic and Vatican MSS. read, "Jesus answered, The first is, Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord."

xii. 30. For "strength" the Alexandrian MS. reads "soul." The words "this is the first commandment" are not in the Sinaitic and Vatican MSS.

xii. 32. Some of the most ancient MSS. here read, "Thou hast said of a truth, for he is one, and there is none other but he."

xii. 33. The words "and with all the soul" are omitted by the Vatican and Sinaitic MSS., but are found in other early authorities.

xii. 34. Calvin thinks Jesus told the scribe he was not far from he had answered them well, asked him, Which is the first commandment of all? 29 And Jesus answered him, The first of all the commandments is, Hear, O Israel; The Lord our God is one Lord: 30 And thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength: this is the first commandment. 31 And the second is like, namely this, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. There is none other commandment greater than these. 32 And the scribe said unto him, Well, Master, thou hast said the truth: for there is one God; and there is none other but he: 33 And to love him with all the heart, and with all the understanding, and with all the soul, and with all the strength, and to love his neighbour as himself, is more than all whole burnt offerings and sacrifices. 34 And when Jesus saw that he answered discreetly, he said unto him, Thou art not far from the kingdom of God. And no man after that durst ask him any question.

The scribes and Pharisees were, however had otherwise, yet enemies to the Sadducees. Now one would have expected, that when they heard Christ argue so well against the Sadducees, they should have countenanced him, as they did Paul, when he appeared against the Sadducees, Acts xxiii. 9; but it had not that effect; because he did not fall in with them in the ceremonial of religion, his agreeing with them in the essentials gained him no manner of respect with them. Only we have here an account of one of them, a scribe, who had so much civility in him as to take notice of Christ's answer to the Sadducees, and to own that he had answered well, and much to the purpose, ver. 28; and we have reason to hope he did not join with other the scribes, in persecuting Christ; for here we have his application to Christ for instruction, and it was such as became him; not tempting Christ, but desiring to improve his acquaintance with him.

First. He inquired, "Which is the first commandment of all?" ver. 28. He doth not mean the first in order, but the first in weight and dignity; which is that command which we ought to have in a special manner an eye to, and our obedience to which will lay a foundation for our obedience to all the rest. Not that any commandment of God is little, they are all the commands of a great God; but some are greater than others, moral precepts than rituals, and of some we may say they are the greatest of all.

Secondly. Christ gave him a direct answer to this inquiry, ver. 29-31. Those that sincerely desire to be instructed concerning their duty, Christ will guide in judgment, and teach his way. He tells him, 1. That the great commandment of all is, that of loving God with all our hearts. 1st. Where this is the commanding principle in the soul, there is a disposition to every other duty. Love is the leading affection of the soul; the love of God is the leading grace in the renewed soul. 2nd. Where this is not, nothing else that is good is done, or not done aright, or not accepted, or not done long. Loving God with all our heart will effectually take us off from, and arm us against, all those things that are rivals with him for the throne in our souls, and will engage us to every thing by which he may be honoured, and with which he will be pleased; and no commandment will be grievous where this principle commands and has the ascendant. Now here in Mark our Saviour prefixeth to this command the great doctrinal truth upon which it is built, ver. 29: "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord." If we firmly believe this, it will follow, that we shall love him "with all our heart." He is Jehovah, who has all amiable perfections in himself; he is our God, to whom we stand related and obliged, and therefore we ought to love him, to set our affections on him, let out our desire towards him, and take a delight in him; and he is one Lord, therefore he must be loved with our whole heart; he has the sole right to us, and therefore ought to have the sole possession of us. If he be one, our hearts must be one with him; and since there is no God but he, no rival must be admitted with him upon the throne. 2. That the second great commandment is to "love our neighbour as ourselves," ver. 31; as truly and sincerely as we love ourselves, and in the same instances, and we must shew it by doing as we would be done by. As we must therefore love God better than ourselves, because he is Jehovah, a being infinitely better than we are, and must love him with all our heart, because he is one Lord, and there is no other like him, so we must love our neighbour as ourselves, because he is of the same nature with ourselves; our hearts are fashioned alike, and my neighbour and myself are of one body, of one society, that of the world of mankind; and if a fellow Christian, and of the same sacred society, the obligation is the stronger. "Has not one God created us?" Mal. ii. 10. Has not one Christ redeemed us? Well might Christ say, "There is no other commandment greater than these;" for in these all the law is fulfilled; and if we make conscience of obedience to these, all other instances of obedience will follow of course.

Thirdly. The scribe consented to what Christ said, and descanted upon it, ver. 32, 33. 1. He commendeth Christ's decision of this question: "Well, Master, thou hast said the truth." Christ's assertions needed not the scribe's attestations; but this scribe, being a man in authority, thought it would put some reputation upon what Christ said to have it commended by him; and it shall be brought in evidence against those who persecuted Christ as a deceiver, that one of themselves, even a scribe of their own, confessed that he said the truth, and said it well. And thus must we subscribe to Christ's sayings; must set to our seal that they are true. 2. He comments upon it. Christ had quoted that great doctrine, that "the Lord our God is one Lord," and this he not only assented to, but added, and "there is none other but he;" and therefore we must have no other God but him. This excludes all rivals with him, and secures the throne in the heart entire for him. Christ had laid down that great law of loving God with all our heart; and this also he explains, that it is loving him with the understanding, as those that know what abundant reason we have to love him. Our love to God, as it must be an entire, so it must be an intelligent love; we must love him with all the understanding, ἐφ' ὅλης τῆς συνέσεως,—"out of the whole understanding;" our rational powers and faculties must all be set on work to lead out the affections of our souls towards God. Christ had said, that to love God and our neighbour is the greatest commandment of all; Yea, saith the scribe, it is better, it "is more than all whole burnt offerings and sacrifices;" more acceptable to God, and will turn to a better account to ourselves. There were those who held that the law of sacrifices was the greatest commandment of all; but this scribe readily agreed with our Saviour in this, that the law of love to God and our neighbour is greater than that of sacrifice, even than that of whole burnt offerings, which were intended purely for the honour of God.

Fourthly. Christ approved of what he said, and encouraged him to proceed in his inquiries of him, ver. 34. 1. He owned that he understood himself well, as far as he went; so far, so good: "Jesus saw that he understood himself well, and was the more pleased with it, because he had of late met with so many, even of the scribes, men of letters, that answered indiscreetly, as those that had no understanding, nor desired to have any. He answered σοφως, 'as one that had a mind;' as a rational, intelligent man; as one that had his wits about him; as one whose reason was not blinded, whose judgment was not biased, and whose forethought was not fettered by the prejudices which other scribes were so much under the power of. He answered as one that allowed himself liberty and leisure to consider, and as one that had considered. 2. He owned that he stood far for a farther advance: "Thou art not far from the kingdom of God," the kingdom of grace and glory; thou art in a likely way to be a Christian,—"a disciple of Christ; for the doctrine of Christ insists most upon these things, and is designed and has a tendency direct to bring thee to this. Note, There is hope of those who make a good use of the light they have, and go as far as that will carry them, that by the grace of God they will be led farther, by the clearer discoveries God has to make to them. What came of this scribe we are not told, but would willingly hope that he took the hint Christ hereby gave him; and that having been told by him, so much to his satisfaction, what was the great commandment of the law, he proceeded to inquire of him or his apostles what was the great commandment of the Gospel too; yet, if he did not, but took up here, and went no farther, we are not to think it strange, for there are many who are "not far from the kingdom of God," and yet never come thither. Now one would think this should have invited many to consult him; but it had a contrary effect, "no man after that durst ask him any question;" every thing he said was spoken with such authority and majesty, that every one stood in awe of him; those that desired to learn were ashamed to ask, and those that designed to cavil were afraid to ask.

35 And Jesus answered and said, while he taught in the temple, How say the scribes that Christ is the son of David? 36 For David himself said by the Holy Ghost, The Lord said to my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand, till I make thine enemies thy footstool. 37 David therefore himself calleth him Lord; and whence is he then his son? And the common people heard him gladly. 38 And he said unto them in his doctrine, Beware of the scribes, which love to go in long clothing, and love salutations in the marketplaces, 39 And the chief seats in the synagogues, and the uppermost rooms at feasts: 40 Which devour widows' houses, and for a pretence make long prayers: these shall receive greater damnation.

Here, First. Christ shews the people how weak and defective the scribes were in their preaching, and how unable to solve the difficulties that occurred in the Scriptures of the Old Testament, which they undertook to expound. Of this he gives an instance, which is not so fully related here as it was in Matthew. Christ was teaching in the temple, and many things he said which were not written; but notice is taken of this, because it will stir us up to inquire concerning Christ, and to inquire of him; for none can have the right knowledge of him but from himself; it is not to be had from the scribes, for they will soon be run aground.

1. They told the people that the Messiah was to be the son of David, ver. 35; and they were in the right; he was not only to descend from his loins, but to fill his throne, Lu. i. 32: "The Lord God shall give him the throne of his father David." The Scripture said it often, but the people took it as what the scribes said; whereas the truths of God should rather be quoted from our Bibles than from our ministers, for there is the original of them: Dulcis ex ipso fonte bibuntur aquæ,—"The waters are sweetest when drawn immediately from their source."

2. Yet they could not tell them how, notwithstanding that it was very proper for David in spirit—the spirit of prophecy—to call him his Lord, as he doth, Ps. cx. 1. They had taught the people that concerning the Messiah which would be for the honour of their nation, that he should be a branch of their royal family; but had not taken care to teach them that which was the honour of the Messiah himself, that he should be the Son of God, and, as such, and not otherwise, David's Lord. Thus they held the truth in unrighteousness, and were partial in the Gospel, as well as in the law of the Old Testament. They were able to say it, and prove it, that Christ was to be David's son; but if any should object, "How then doth David call him Lord?" they would not know how to avoid the force of the objection. Note, Those are unworthy to sit in Moses' seat who, though they are able to preach the truth, are not, in some measure able to defend it when they have preached it, and to convince gain-sayers. Now this galled the scribes, to have their ignorance thus exposed, and no doubt incited them more against Christ; but "the common people heard him gladly," ver. 37. What he preached was surprising and affecting; and though it reflected upon the scribes, it was instructive to them, and they had never heard such preaching. Probably there was something more than the kingdom of God, "because he would yield to his duty, and did wisely discern the outward profession of the worship of God from the necessary duties of neighbourhood." It was said to encourage rather than to praise him.

xii. 41. By "the treasury" Lightfoot understands the thirteen boxes for alms, &c., which were in the court of the women. "This court," he says, "was so called, not because women only were admitted, but because they might not go further; just as the court of the Gentiles was so called, not because they only entered it, but because they might not go beyond it." "Jesus sat over against the treasury," i.e., he sat under the porch, before which the boxes were plac'd. By "the treasury," in John viii. 20, Lightfoot says the court of the women is meant.

xiii. 1. For "see what manner of stones and what buildings are here!" translate, "Behold, what great stones, and what great buildings!"

ordinarily commanding and charming in his voice and way of delivery, which recommended him to the affections of the common people: for we do not find that any were wrought upon to believe in him, and to follow him; but he was to them as "a lovely song of one that could play well on an instrument," as Ezekiel was to his hearers, Eze. xxxiii. 32; and perhaps some of these cried, "Crucify him;" as Herod heard John Baptist gladly, and yet cut off his head.

Secondly, He cautions the people to take heed of suffering themselves to be imposed upon by the scribes, and of being infected with their pride and hypocrisy: "He said unto them in his doctrine, Beware of the scribes," ver. 38; stand upon your guard, that you neither imbibe their peculiar opinions, nor the opinions of the people concerning them. It was a long charge drawn up against them in the parallel place, Mat. xxiii.; it is here contracted.

1. They affect to appear very great; for they go in "long clothing," with vestures "down to their feet," and in those they walk about the streets, as princes, or judges, or gentlemen of the long robe. Their going in such clothing was not sinful, but their loving to go in it, priding themselves in it, valuing themselves by it, commanding respect by it, saying to their long clothes, as Saul to Samuel, "Honour me now before this people;" this was a product of pride. Christ would have his disciples go with their loins girt.

2. They affect to appear very good; for they pray, they make long prayers, as if they were very intimate with heaven, and had a deal of business there. They took care it should be known that they prayed, that they prayed long, which some think intimates that they prayed not for themselves only, but for others, and therein were very particular and very large. This they did for a pretence, that they might seem to love prayer, not only for God's sake, whom hereby they pretended to glorify, but for their neighbour's sake, whom hereby they pretended to be serviceable to.

3. They herein aimed to advance themselves; they coveted applause, and were fond of it; they loved "salutations in the marketplaces, and the chief seats in the synagogues, and the uppermost rooms at feasts;" these pleased a vain fancy: to have these given them, they thought expressed the value they had for them that did know them, and gained them respect from those that did not.

4. They herein aimed to enrich themselves; they "devoured widows' houses;" made themselves masters of their estates by some trick or other; and it was to screen themselves from the suspicion of dishonesty that they put on the mask of piety; and that they might not be thought as bad as the worst, they were studious to seem as good as the best. Let fraud and oppression be thought the worse of for their having profaned and disgraced long prayers; but let not prayers, no, nor long prayers, be thought the worse of, if made in humility and sincerity, for their having been by some thus abused. But as iniquity, thus disguised with a show of piety, is double iniquity, so its doom will be doubly heavy; "these shall receive greater damnation; greater than those that live without prayer; greater than they should have received for the wrong done to the poor widows, if it had not been thus disguised. Note, The damnation of hypocrites will be of all other the greatest damnation."

41 And Jesus sat over against the treasury, and beheld how the people cast money into the treasury: and many that were rich cast in much. 42 And there came a certain poor widow, and she threw in two mites, which make a farthing. 43 And he called unto him his disciples, and saith unto them, Verily I say unto you, That this poor widow hath cast more in, than all they which have cast into the treasury: 44 For all they did cast in of their abundance; but she of her want did cast in all that she had, even all her living.

This passage of story was not in Matthew, but is here, and in Luke. It is Christ's commendation of the poor widow that cast two mites into the treasury, which our Saviour, as busy as he was in preaching, found leisure to take notice of. Observe,

I. There was a public fund for charity, into which contributions were brought, and out of which distributions were made; a poor's box, and this in the temple; for works of charity and works of piety very fitly go together; where God is honoured by our worship, it is proper he should be honoured by the relief of his poor; and we often find prayers and alms in conjunction, as Acts xx. 1, 2. It is good to erect public receptacles of charity, for the inviting and directing of private hands in giving to the poor; nay, it is good for those who are of ability to have funds of their own, to "lay by as God has prospered them," 1 Cor. xvi. 2, that they may have something ready to give, when an object of charity offers itself, which is before dedicated to such uses.

II. Jesus Christ had an eye upon it; he "sat over against the treasury, and beheld how the people cast money into it;" not grudging either that he had none to cast in, or had not the disposal of that which was cast in, but observing what was cast in. Note, Our Lord Jesus takes notice what we contribute to pious and charitable uses; whether we give liberally, or give sparingly; whether cheerfully, or with reluctance and ill-will; nay, he looks at the heart; he observes what principles we act upon, and what our views are in giving alms; and whether we do it as unto the Lord, or only to be seen of men.

III. He saw "many that were rich cast in much;" and it was a good sight, to see rich people charitable; to see many rich people so; and to see them not only cast in, but cast in much. Note, Those that are rich ought to give richly; if God give abundantly to us, he expects we should give abundantly to the poor; and it is not enough for those that are rich to say, they give as much as others do, who perhaps have much less of the world than they have; but they must give in proportion to their estates; and if objects of charity do not present themselves that require so much, they ought to inquire them out, and to "devise liberal things."

IV. There was a poor widow that cast in two mites, which make a farthing, ver. 42; and our Lord Jesus highly commended her; "called his disciples" to him, and bid them take notice of it, ver. 43; tells them she could very ill spare that which she gave; she had scarce enough for herself; it was "all her living;" all she had to live upon for that day, and perhaps a great part of what she had earned by her labour the day before; and that, forasmuch as he knew she did it from a truly charitable disposition, he reckoned it more than all that put together which the rich people threw in; for they did "cast in of their abundance," but she of her want, ver. 44. Now many would have been ready to censure this poor widow, and to think she did ill; why should she give to others, when she had little enough for herself? Charity begins at home; or, if she would give it, why did she not bestow it upon some poor body that she knew? what need she bring it to the treasury, to be disposed of by the chief priests, who, we have reason to fear, were partial in the disposal of it. It is so rare a thing to find any that would not blame this widow, that we cannot expect to find any that will imitate her; and yet our Saviour commends her, and therefore we are sure she did very well and wisely: if Christ saith "Well done," no matter who saith otherwise; and we must from hence learn, 1. That giving alms is an excellent good thing, and highly pleasing to the Lord Jesus; and if we be humble and sincere in it, he will graciously accept of it; though in some circumstances there may not be all the discretion in the world. 2. Those that have but a little, yet ought to give alms out of their little. Those that live by their labour, from hand to mouth, yet must give to those that need, Eph. iv. 28. 3. It is very good for us to straiten and deny ourselves, that we may be able to give the more to the poor; not only to deny ourselves superfluities, but even conveniences, for the sake of charity; we should in many cases pinch ourselves, that we may supply others' necessities; this is loving our neighbours as ourselves. 4. Public charities should be encouraged, for they bring upon a nation public blessings; and though there may be some mismanagement of them, yet that is not a good reason why we should not bring in our quota to them. 5. Though we can give but a little in charity, yet if it be according to our ability, and be given with an upright heart, it shall be accepted of Christ, who requires "according to what a man has, and not according to what he has not." Two mites shall be put upon the score, and brought to account, if given in a right manner, as if it had been two pounds. 6. It is much to the praise of charity, when we give not only "to our power, but beyond our power;" as the Macedonian churches, "whose deep poverty abounded to the riches of their liberality," 2 Cor. viii. 2, 3. When we can cheerfully provide for others, out of our own necessary provision, as the widow of Sarepta for Elijah, and Christ for his five thousand guests, and trust God to provide for us some other way, this is thankworthy.

CHAPTER XIII.

We have here the substance of that prophetic sermon which our Lord Jesus preached, pointing at the destruction of Jerusalem, and the consummation of all things; it was one of the last of his sermons, and not ad populum,—"to the people," but ad clerum,—"to the clergy;" it was private, preached only to four of his disciples, with whom his secret was. Here is, I. The occasion of his prediction, his disciples admiring the buildings of the temple, ver. 1, 2, and their inquiry concerning the time of the desolation of them, ver. 3, 4. II. The predictions themselves: 1. Of the rise of deceivers, ver. 5, 6, 21—23. 2. Of the wars of the nations, ver. 7, 8. 3. Of the persecution of Christians, ver. 9—13. 4. Of the destruction of Jerusalem, ver. 14—20. 5. Of the end of the world, ver. 24—27. III. Some general intimations concerning the time of them, ver. 28—32. IV. Some practical inferences from all, ver. 33—37.

AND as he went out of the temple, one of his disciples saith unto him, Master, see what manner of stones and what buildings are here! 2 And Jesus answering said unto him, Seest thou these great buildings? there shall not be left one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down. 3 And as he sat upon the mount of Olives over against the temple, Peter and James and John and Andrew asked him privately, 4 Tell us, when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign when all these things shall be fulfilled?

We may here see, First, How apt many of Christ's own disciples are to idolize things that look great, and have been long looked upon as sacred: they had heard Christ com-xiii. 3. Mark gives the names of the disciples who proposed the question which follows, and he is the only evangelist who does so.

xiii. 5. The Sinaitic, Vatican, and other ancient MSS. read, "And Jesus began to say to them." The verb "to answer" is often left out of early copies.

xiii. 6. It will be noted that the word "Christ" is not in the Greek text, which would therefore be more correctly rendered, "I am he." There is no doubt that our version gives the completed sense, because the parallel passage in St. Matthew reads, "I am the Christ."

xiii. 8. The words "and troubles" here, which are peculiar to this Gospel, are omitted by the Sinaitic and Vatican MSS.

xiii. 10. The word "first" is understood to mean "before the end of the troubles which are here predicted."

xiii. 12. For "shall cause them to be put to death" some, both here and in Matt. x. 21, translate, "shall put them to death."

plain of those who had made the temple a den of thieves; and yet, when he quitted it, for the wickedness that remained in it they count him to be as much in love as they were with the stately structure and adorning of it. One of them said to him, "Look, Master, what manner of stones and what buildings are here!" ver. 1; we never saw the like in Galilee. O do not leave this fine place!"

Secondly. How little Christ values external pomp, where there is not real purity: "Seest thou these great buildings?" saith Christ, and admirest thou them? I tell thee the time is at hand when "there shall not be left one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down," ver. 2; and the sumptuousness of the fabric shall be no security to it; no, nor move any compassion in the Lord Jesus towards it. He looks with pity upon the ruin of precious souls, and weeps over them, for on them he has put a great value; but we do not find him look with any pity upon the ruin of a magnificent house, when he is driven out of it by sin, for that is of small value with him. With what little concern doth he say, "not one stone shall be left upon another." Much of the strength of the temple lay in the largeness of the stones; and if these be thrown down, no footstep, no remembrance of it will remain: while any part remained standing there might be some hopes of the repair of it; but what hope is there when not one stone is left upon another?

Thirdly. How natural it is to us to desire to know things to come, and the times of them; more inquisitive we are apt to be about that, than about our duty. His disciples knew not how to digest this doctrine of the ruin of the temple, which they thought must be their Master's royal palace, and in which they expected their preferment, and to have the posts of honour; and therefore were in pain till they got him alone, and got more out of him concerning this matter. As he was returning to Bethany therefore, "he sat upon the mount of Olives, over against the temple," where he had a full view of it; and there four of them agreed to ask "him privately," what he meant by the destroying of the temple, which they understood no more than they did the predictions of his own death; so inconsistent was it with their scheme. Probably, though these four proposed the question, yet Christ's discourse in answer to it, was in the hearing of the rest of the disciples, yet "privately," that is, apart from the multitude; their inquiry is, "When shall these things be?" They will not question, at least not seem to question, whether they shall be or no, for their Master has said they shall, but are willing to hope it is a great way off. Yet they ask not precisely the day and year; therein they were modest: But, "Tell us what shall be the sign when all these things shall be fulfilled?" what presages shall there be of them, and how may we prognosticate their approach?

5 And Jesus answering them began to say, Take heed lest any man deceive you: 6 For many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ; and shall deceive many. 7 And when ye shall hear of wars and rumours of wars, be ye not troubled: for such things must needs be; but the end shall not be yet. 8 For nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom: and there shall be earthquakes in divers places, and there shall be famines and troubles: these are the beginnings of sorrows. 9 But take heed to yourselves: for they shall deliver you up to councils; and in the synagogues ye shall be beaten: and ye shall be brought before rulers and kings for my sake, for a testimony against them. 10 And the gospel must first be published among all nations. 11 But when they shall lead you, and deliver you up, take no thought beforehand what ye shall speak, neither do ye premeditate: but whatsoever shall be given you in that hour, that speak ye: for it is not ye that speak, but the Holy Ghost. 12 Now the brother shall betray the brother to death, and the father the son; and children shall rise up against their parents, and shall cause them to be put to death. 13 And ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake: but he that shall endure unto the end, the same shall be saved.

Our Lord Jesus, in reply to their question, sets himself not so much to satisfy their curiosity, as to direct their consciences; leaves them still in the dark concerning the times and seasons, which the Father has kept in his own power, and which it was not for them to know; but gives them the cautions which were needful, with reference to the events that should now shortly come to pass.

First. They must take heed that they be not deceived by the seducers and impostors that should now shortly arise, ver. 5, 6: "Take heed lest any man deceive you;" lest having found the true Messiah, you lose him again in the crowd of pretenders; or be inveigled to embrace others in rivalry with him: "Many shall come in my name;" not in the name of Jesus, but "saying, I am Christ," and so claiming the dignities which I only am entitled to. After the Jews had rejected the true Christ, they were imposed upon, and so exposed by many false Christs, but never before; those false Christs deceived many, therefore take heed lest they deceive you. Note, When many are deceived, we should thereby be awakened to look to ourselves.

Secondly. They must take heed that they be not disturbed at the noise of wars, which they should be alarmed with, ver. 7, 8. Sin introduced wars, and they come from men's lusts; but at some times the nations are more distracted and wasted with wars than at other times: so it shall be now. Christ was born into the world when there was a general peace, but soon after he went out of the world there were general wars. "Nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom;" and what will become of them, then, who are to preach the Gospel to every nation? Inter arma silent leges.—"Amidst the clash of arms the voice of law is not heard;" but "be not troubled at it." 1. Let it be no surprise to you, you are bid to expect it, and "such things must needs be," for God has appointed them, in order to the farther accomplishment of his purposes; and by the wars of the Jews (which Josephus has given us a large account of) God will punish the wickedness of the Jews. 2. Let it be no terror to you, as if your interest were in danger of being overthrown, or your work obstructed, by these wars; you have no concern in them, and therefore need not be apprehensive of any damage by them. Note, Those that despise the smiles of the world, and do not court and covet them, may despise the frowns of the world, and need not fear them. If we seek not to rise with them that rise in the world, why should we dread falling with them that fall in the world? 3. Let it not be looked upon as an omen of the approaching period of the world, for "the end is not yet," ver. 7. Think not that these wars will bring the world to a period; no, there are other intermediate counsels to be fulfilled betwixt them and the end of all things, which are designed to prepare you for the end, but not to hasten it out of due time. 4. Let it not be looked upon as if in them God had done his worst; no, he has more arrows in his quiver, and they are "ordained against the persecutors;" be not troubled at the wars you shall hear of, for they are but "the beginnings of sorrows;" and therefore, instead of being disturbed at them, you ought to prepare for worse; for there shall also "be earthquakes in divers places," which shall bury multitudes in the ruins of their own houses, "and there shall be famines," by which many of the poor shall perish for want of bread, and troubles and commotions, so that there shall be no peace to him that goes out, or comes in. The world shall be full of troubles, but "be not ye troubled;" without are fightings, within are fears, but fear not ye their fear. Note, The disciples of Christ, if it be not their own fault, may enjoy a holy security and serenity of mind, when all about them is in the greatest disorder.

Thirdly. They must take heed that they be not drawn away from Christ, and from their duty to him by the sufferings they should meet with for Christ's sake. Again, he saith, "Take heed to yourselves," ver. 9: though you may escape the sword of war better than some of your neighbours, because you interest not yourself in the public quarrels, yet be not secure; you will be exposed to the sword of justice more than others, and the parties that contend with one another will unite against you. Take heed, therefore, lest you deceive yourselves with the hopes of outward prosperity, and such a temporal kingdom as you have been dreaming of, when it is through many tribulations that you must enter into the kingdom of God. Take heed, lest you needlessly expose yourselves to trouble, and pull it upon your own head. Take heed what you say and do, for you will have many eyes upon you. Observe,

1. What the trouble is they must expect. 1st. They "shall be hated of all men;" trouble enough! The thoughts of being hated are grievous to a tender spirit, and the fruits of that hatred must needs be a constant vexation; those that are malicious will be mischievous. It was not for any thing amiss in them, or done amiss by them, that they were hated, but for Christ's name's sake; because they were called by his name, called upon his name, preached his name, and wrought miracles in his name: the world hated them because he loved them.

2nd. Their own relations shall betray them, those to whom they were most nearly allied, and on whom therefore they depended for protection; they shall betray you, shall inform against you, and be your prosecutors. If a father has a child that is a Christian, he shall become void of natural affection; it shall all be swallowed up in bigotry, and he shall betray his own child to the persecutors, as if he were a worshipper of other gods, Deu. xiii. 6.

3rd. Their church rulers shall inflict their censures upon them. You shall be delivered up to the great Sanhedrim at Jerusalem, and to the inferior courts and consistories in other cities, and shall be beaten in the synagogues with forty stripes at a time, as offenders against the law, which was read in the synagogue. It is no new thing for the church's artillery, through the treachery of its officers, to be turned against some of its best friends.

4th. Governors and kings shall use their power against them. Because the Jews have not power to put them to death, they shall incense the Roman powers against them, as they did Herod against James and Peter, and they shall cause you to be put to death, as enemies to the empire. They must resist unto blood, and still resist.

2. What they shall have to comfort themselves with in the midst of these great and sore troubles.

1st. That the work they were called to should be carried on and prosper, notwithstanding all this opposition they should meet with in it, ver. 10: "The Gospel" shall, for all this, "be published among all nations;" and, before the destruction of Jerusalem, the sound of it shall go forth into all the earth; not only through all the nation of the Jews, but to all the nations of the earth. It is comfort to those who suffer for the Gospel, that though they may be crushed, and borne down, the Gospel cannot; it shall keep its ground and carry the day.

2nd. That their sufferings, instead of obstructing their work, should forward it; your being "brought before governors and kings" shall be "for a testimony to them," so some read it, ver. 9. It shall give you an opportunity of preaching the Gospel to those before whom you are brought as criminals, to whom otherwise you could not have access. Thus St. Paul being brought before Felix, and Festus, and Agrippa, and Nero, was a testimony to them concerning Christ and his Gospel. Or, as we read it, it shall be for a testimony against them, against both the judges and the prosecutors, who pursue those with the utmost rage that appear upon examination to be not only innocent, but excellent persons. The Gospel is a testimony to us concerning Christ and heaven; if we receive it, it will be a testimony for us, it will justify and save us; if not, it will be a testimony against us in the great day.

3rd. That when they were brought before kings and governors for Christ's sake, they should have special assistance from heaven to plead Christ's cause and their own, ver. 11: "Take no thought beforehand what ye shall speak;" "Be not solicitous how to address yourselves to great men, so as to obtain their favour; your cause is just and glorious, and needs not to be supported by premeditated speeches and harangues;" "but whatsoever shall be given you in that hour," whatsoever shall be suggested to you, and put into your minds, and into your mouths, pro re nata,—"on the spur of the occasion," "that speak ye," and fear not the success of it because it is off hand, "for it is not ye that speak," purely by the strength of your own wisdom, consideration and resolution, "but it is the Holy Ghost." Note, Those whom Christ calls out to be advocates for him, shall be furnished with full instructions; and when we are engaged in the service of Christ, we may depend upon the aids of the Spirit of Christ.

4th. That heaven at last would make amends for all. "You will meet with a great deal of hardship in your way, but have a good heart on it, your warfare xiii. 14. The words "spoken of by Daniel the prophet" are omitted by the Sinaitic, Vatican, and Cambridge MSS., and some modern editions, the Latin Vulgate, and other authorities; but they are found in the Alexandrian and other MSS., as well as in the Syriac versions, and elsewhere. By the mountains to which they who were in Judea were to flee, we may understand the hilly regions to the south and east of Judea.

xiii. 18. It is supposed that the words "neither on the Sabbath-day," which Matthew has, are omitted by Mark because he wrote chiefly for Gentile readers.

xiii. 20. By the shortening of the days we must understand their being restricted in number.

xiii. 22. The words "false Christs and" are omitted here by some MSS., and Tischendorf thinks they have been inserted from St. Matthew; but they occur in the Alexandrian, Cambridge, Vatican, and other MSS., and in the Syriac and Vulgate versions, &c.

will be accomplished, and your testimony finished, and "he that shall endure to the end, the same shall be saved," ver. 13: perseverance gains the crown. The salvation here promised is more than a deliverance from evil, it is an everlasting blessedness, which will be an abundant recompense for all their services and sufferings. All this we have, Mat. x. 17, &c.

14 But when ye shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, standing where it ought not, (let him that readeth understand,) then let them that be in Judæa flee to the mountains: 15 And let him that is on the housetop not go down into the house, neither enter therein, to take any thing out of his house: 16 And let him that is in the field not turn back again for to take up his garment. 17 But woe to them that are with child, and to them that give suck in those days! 18 And pray ye that your flight be not in the winter. 19 For in those days shall be affliction, such as was not from the beginning of the creation which God created unto this time, neither shall be. 20 And except that the Lord had shortened those days, no flesh should be saved: but for the elect's sake, whom he hath chosen, he hath shortened the days. 21 And then if any man shall say to you, Lo, here is Christ; or, lo, he is there; believe him not: 22 For false Christs and false prophets shall rise, and shall shew signs and wonders, to seduce, if it were possible, even the elect. 23 But take ye heed: behold, I have foretold you all things.

The Jews, in rebelling against the Romans, and in persecuting the Christians, were hastening their own ruin apace; both efficiently and meritoriously were setting both God and man against them: see 1 Thess. ii. 15. Now here we have a prediction of that ruin which came upon them, within less than forty years after this: we had it before, Mat. xxiv. 15, &c. Observe,

First. What is here foretold concerning it.

1. That the Roman armies should make a descent upon Judæa, and invest Jerusalem, the holy city. These were "the abomination of desolation," which the Jews did abominate, and by which they should be made desolate. The country of thine enemy is called the "land which thou abhorrest," Isa. vii. 16. Therefore it was an abomination, because it brought with it nothing but desolation. They had rejected Christ as an abomination, who would have been their salvation; and now God brought upon them an abomination that would be their desolation, thus spoken of by Daniel the prophet, Dan. ix. 27, as that by which this sacrifice and offering should be made to cease. This army stood "where it ought not," in and about the holy city, which the heathen ought not to have approached, nor should have been suffered to do, if Jerusalem had not first profaned the crown of their holiness. This the church complains of, Lam. i. 10; "the heathen entered into her sanctuary, whom thou didst command that they should not enter into the congregation;" but sin made the breach, at which the glory went out, and the abomination of desolation broke in, and stood "where it ought not." Now "let him that readeth" this "understand" it, and endeavour to take it right. Prophecies should not be too plain, and yet intelligible to those that search them; and they are best understood, by comparing them first with one another, and at last with the event.

2. That when the Roman army should come into the country, there would be no safety any where but by quitting the country, and that with all possible expedition; it will be in vain to fight, the enemies will be too hard for them; in vain to abscond, the enemies will find them out; and in vain to capitulate, the enemies will give them no quarter: a man cannot have so much as his life given him for a prey, but by fleeing "to the mountains," out of Judæa; and let him take the first alarm, and make the best of his way. If he be "on the housetop," trying from thence to discover the motions of the enemy, and spies them coming, "let him not go down to take any thing out of the house," for it will lose time, which is more precious than his best goods, and will but encumber him, and embarrass his flight; if he be in the field, and there discovers the approach of the enemy, let him get away as he is, and "not turn back again to take up his garment," ver. 16. If he can save his life, let him reckon it a good bargain, though he can save nothing else; and be thankful to God, that though he is cut short, he is not cut off.

3. That it would go very hard at that time, with poor mothers and nurses, ver. 17: "Woe to them that are with child, that dare not go into strange places, that cannot shift for themselves, nor make haste, as others can; and woe to them that give suck," that know not how either to leave the tender infants behind them, or to carry them along with them. Such is the vanity of the creature, that the time may often be, when the greatest comforts may prove the greatest burthens. It would likewise be very uncomfortable, if they should be forced to flee "in the winter," ver. 18, when the weather and ways were bad, when the roads would be scarce passable, especially in those mountains to which they must flee. If there be no remedy, but that trouble must come, yet we may desire and pray that, if it be God's will, the circumstances of it may be so ordered as to be a mitigation of the trouble; and when things are bad, we ought to consider they might have been worse. It is bad to be forced to flee, but it would have been worse if it had been "in the winter."

4. That throughout all the country of the Jews there should be such destruction and desolation made as could not be paralleled in any history, ver. 19: "In those days shall be affliction, such as was not from the beginning of time," that is, "of the creation which God created," for time and the creation are of equal date, "unto this day, neither shall be" to the end of time, such a complication of miseries, and of such continuance. The destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans was very terrible, but this exceeded it. It threatened an universal slaughter of all the people of the Jews; so barbarously did they devour one another, and the Romans devour them all, that if their wars had continued a little longer, "no flesh could have been saved," not one Jew could have been left alive; but in the midst of wrath God remembered mercy; and, 1st. He "shortened the days," he let fall his controversy before he had "made a full end." As a church and nation, the ruin was complete; but many particular persons had their lives given them for a prey, by the storm taking up when it did. 2nd. It was "for the elect's sake" that those days were shortened; many among them fared the better for the sake of the few among them that believed in Christ, and were faithful to him. There was a promise that "a remnant should be saved," Isa. x. 22; and that God would not, for his servants' sakes, "destroy them all," Isa. lxv. 9; and these promises must be fulfilled; "God's own elect cry day and night to him," and their prayers must be answered, Luk. xviii. 7.

Secondly. What directions are given to the disciples with reference to it.

1. They must shift for the safety of their lives. "When you see the country invaded, and the city invested, flatter not yourselves with thoughts that the enemy will retire, or that you may be able to make your part good with them; but, without farther deliberation or delay, 'let them which be in Judæa flee to the mountains,' ver. 14. Meddle not with strife that belongs not to you; 'let the potsherders strive with the potsherders of the earth;' but do you go out of the ship when you see it sinking, that you die not the death of the uncircumcised in heart."

2. They must provide for the safety of their souls; seducers will be busy at that time, for they love to fish in troubled waters, and therefore then you must double your guard; "then if any man shall say unto you, Lo, here is Christ, or, lo, he is there," you know he is in heaven, and will come again, at the end of time, to judge the world, and therefore "believe them not;" having received Christ, be not drawn into the snares of any antichrist; "for false Christs, and false prophets shall arise," ver. 22. When the gospel kingdom was in the setting up, Satan mustered all his force to oppose it, and made use of all his wiles; and God permitted it for the trial of the sincerity of some, and the discovery of the hypocrisy of others, and the confusion of those who rejected Christ when he was offered to them. False Christs shall arise, and false prophets, that shall preach them up; or such as, though they pretend not to be Christs, set up for prophets, and undertake to foretell things to come, and they shall shew signs and lying wonders; so early did the mystery of iniquity begin to work, 1 Thess. i. 7. They shall seduce, if it were possible, the very elect; "so plausible shall their pretences be, and so industrious shall they be to impose upon people, that they shall draw away many that were forward and zealous professors of religion, many that were very likely to have persevered; for nothing will be effectual to secure men but that foundation of God which stands immovably sure; 'the Lord knows them that are his,' who shall be preserved, when the faith of some is overthrown, 2 Tim. ii. 18, 19. They shall seduce, if it were possible, the very elect;" but it is not possible to seduce them; "the election shall obtain," whoever "are blinded," Rom. xi. 7. But in consideration hereof, let the disciples be cautious who they give credit to, ver. 23: "But take ye heed." Christ knew they were of the elect, who could not possibly be seduced, and yet he said to them, "take heed." An assurance of persevering and cautious against apostasy will very well consist. Though Christ said to them "take heed," it doth not therefore follow that their perseverance was doubtful, for they were kept by the power of God; and though their perseverance was secured, yet it doth not therefore follow that this caution was needless, because they must be kept in the use of proper means; God will keep them, but they must keep themselves. "I have foretold you all things;" I have foretold you this danger, that being forewarned, you may be forearmed; I have foretold all things which you needed to have foretold to you, and therefore take heed of hearkening to such as pretend to be prophets, and to foretell more than I have foretold. The sufficiency of the Scripture is a good argument against listening to such as pretend to inspiration.

24 But in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, 25 And the stars of heaven shall fall, and the powers that are in heaven shall be shaken. 26 And then shall they see the Son of man coming in the clouds with great power and glory. 27 And then shall he send his angels, and shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from the uttermost part of the earth to the uttermost part of heaven.

These verses seem to point at Christ's second coming, to judge the world. The disciples, in their question, had confounded the destruction of Jerusalem and the end of the world, Mat. xxiv. 3; which was built upon a mistake, as if the temple must needs stand as long as the world stands; this mistake Christ rectifies, and shews that the end of the world, "in those days," those other days you inquire about, the day of Christ's coming, and the day of judgment, shall be "after that tribulation," and not coincident with it; let those that live to see the Jewish nation destroyed take heed of thinking that because the Son of man doth not visibly come in the clouds then, he will never so come; no, he will come after that. And here he foretells,

First. The final dissolution of the present frame and fabric of the world; even of that part of it which seems least liable to change, even the upper part, the purer and more refined part; "the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall no more give her light;" for they shall be quite outshone by the glory of the Son of man, Isa. xxiv. 23. "The stars of heaven," that from the beginning had kept their place and regular motion, shall fall as leaves in autumn; "and the powers that are in heaven," the heavenly bodies, the fixed stars, "shall be shaken."

Secondly. The visible appearance of the Lord Jesus, to whom the judgment of that day shall be committed, ver. 26. "Then shall they see the Son of man coming in the clouds;" probably over that very place where he sat when he said this, for the clouds are in the lower region of the air. He shall come "with great power and glory," such as will be suited to the errand on which he comes. "Every eye shall then see him."

xiii. 25. The first clause should be rendered, "and the stars shall fall from heaven;" literally, "shall be falling." This is the reading of several MSS.

xiii. 28. Translate, "Now from the fig-tree learn the parable: When now her branch becometh tender, and produceth the leaves."

xiii. 32. Translate, "But of that day and hour no one knoweth, neither the angels who are in heaven, nor the Son, but the Father."

xiii. 33. The words "and pray" are not found in the Vatican and Cambridge MSS., but they occur in other important MSS. and ancient versions.

xiii. 34. The words "for the Son of Man is" are not in the Greek, which is "like a man going from home, leaving his house, and giving authority," &c.

xiv. 1. In Matt. xxvi. 2 we read, "Ye know that after two days is the Passover." Here the sense is generally similar: It was the Passover, and the feast of unleavened bread after two days; i.e.,

Thirdly The gathering together of all the elect to him, ver. 27: "He shall send his angels, and gather together the elect" to him, to meet him in the air, 1 Thes. iv. 17. They shall be fetched from one end of the world to the other, so that none shall be missing from that general assembly; they shall be fetched "from the uttermost parts of the earth," most remote from the place where Christ's tribunal shall be set, and shall be brought "to the uttermost part of heaven;" so sure, so swift, so easy shall their conveyance be, that there shall none of them miscarry, though they were to be brought from the uttermost part of the earth one way to the uttermost part of the heaven another way. A faithful Israelite shall be carried safely, though it were from the utmost border of the land of bondage to the utmost border of the land of promise.

28 Now learn a parable of the fig tree; When her branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is near: 29 So ye in like manner, when ye shall see these things come to pass, know that it is nigh, even at the doors. 30 Verily I say unto you, that this generation shall not pass, till all these things be done. 31 Heaven and earth shall pass away: but my words shall not pass away. 32 But of that day and that hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father. 33 Take ye heed, watch and pray: for ye know not when the time is. 34 For the Son of man is as a man taking a far journey, who left his house, and gave authority to his servants, and to every man his work, and commanded the porter to watch. 35 Watch ye therefore: for ye know not when the master of the house cometh, at even, or at midnight, or at the cockrowing, or in the morning: 36 Lest coming suddenly he find you sleeping. 37 And what I say unto you I say unto all, Watch.

We have here the application of this prophetic sermon: Now learn to look forward in a right manner.

First. As to the destruction of Jerusalem, expect it to come very shortly; as when the branch of the fig tree becomes soft, and the leaves sprout forth, ye expect that summer will come shortly, ver. 28. When second causes begin to work, ye expect their effects in their proper order and time; so when "ye see these things come to pass," when you see the Jewish nation embroiled in wars, distracted by false Christs and prophets, and drawing upon them the displeasure of the Romans, especially when you see them persecuting you for your Master's sake, and thereby standing to what they did when they put him to death, and repeating it, and so filling up the measure of their iniquity, then say that their ruin "is nigh, even at the door" and provide for yourselves accordingly. The disciples themselves were indeed all of them, except John, taken away from the evil to come, but the next generation whom they were to train up would live to see it, and by these instructions Christ left behind him would be kept from sharing in it. "This generation that is now rising up, shall not all be worn off before all these things come to pass, which I have told you of, relating to Jerusalem, and they shall begin to take effect now shortly." And as this destruction is near and within ken, so it is sure; the decree is gone forth, it is a consumption determined, Dan. ix. 27. Christ doth not speak these things only to frighten them; no, they are the declarations of God's fixed purpose: "heaven and earth shall pass away," at the end of time, "but my words shall not pass away," ver. 31, not one of these predictions shall fail of a punctual accomplishment.

Secondly. As to the end of the world, do not inquire when it will come; for it is not a question fit to be asked; "for of that day and that hour knoweth no man;" it is a thing at a great distance, the exact time is fixed in the counsel of God, but is not revealed by any word of God, either to men on earth or to angels in heaven; the angels shall have timely notice to prepare to attend in that day, and it shall be published when it comes to the children of men with sound of trumpet; but at present men and angels are kept in the dark concerning the precise time of it, that they both attend to their proper services in the present day. But it follows, "neither the Son;" but is there any thing which the Son is ignorant of? We read indeed of a book which was sealed till the Lamb opened the seals; but did not he know what was in it before the seals were opened? Was not he conscious to the writing of it? There were those in the primitive times who taught, from this text, that there were some things that Christ, as man, was ignorant of, and from thence were called Agnotes; they said it was no more absurd to say so, than to say that his human soul suffered grief and fear; and many of the orthodox fathers approved of this. Some would evade it, by saying that Christ spoke this in a way of prudential economy, to divert the disciples from farther inquiry; but to this, one of the ancients answers, that "it is not fit to speak too nicely in this matter,"—οὐ δὲ τὴν ἀκριβολογίαν, so Leontius, in Dr. Hammond. "It is certain (saith Archbishop Tillotson) that Christ, as God, could not be ignorant of any thing; but the Divine wisdom which dwelt in our Saviour did communicate itself to his human soul according to the Divine pleasure; so that his human nature might at some times not know some things; therefore Christ is said to grow in wisdom, Luke ii. 52, which he could not be said to do, if the human nature of Christ did necessarily know all things, by virtue of its union with the Divinity." Dr. Lightfoot explains it thus: Christ calls himself the Son, as Messiah. Now the Messiah, as such, was the Father's servant, Isa. xlii. 1; sent and deputed by him, and as such an one, he refers himself often to his Father's will and command, and owns he did nothing of himself, John v. 19; and in like manner he might be said to know nothing of himself. The revelation of Jesus Christ was what God gave unto him, Rev. i. 1; he thinks therefore we are to distinguish between those excellences and perfections of his which resulted from the personal union between the Divine and human nature, and those which flowed from the anointing of the Spirit; from the former flowed the infinite dignity of his person, and his perfect freedom from all sin; but from the latter flowed his power of working miracles, and his foreknowledge of things to come: what therefore (saith he) were to be revealed by him to his church, he was pleased to take, not from the union of the human nature with the Divine, but from the revelation of the Spirit, by which he yet knew not this. "But the Father" only knows it; that is, God only, the Deity; for (as Archbishop Tillotson explains it) it is not used here personally, in distinction from the Son and the Holy Ghost, but as the Father is fons et principium Deitatis,—"the fountain of Deity."

Thirdly. As to both, their duty is to "watch and pray." Therefore the time is kept a secret, that we might be engaged to stand always upon our guard, ver. 33. "Take ye heed" of every thing that would indispose you for your Master's coming, and would render your accounts perplexed, and your spirits so too; watch for his coming, that it may not at any time be a surprise to you, and pray for that grace which is necessary to qualify you for it, "for ye know not when the time is;" and we are concerned to be ready for that every day which may come any day. This he illustrates in the close by a parable.

1. Our Master is gone away, and left us something in trust, in charge, which we must give account of, ver. 34. He is "as a man taking a far journey," for he is gone to be away a great while, he has "left his house" on earth, and left his servants in their offices; gave authority to some, who were to be overseers, and work to others, that were to be labourers: they that have authority given them, in that had work assigned them, for those that have the greatest power have the most business; and to them to whom he gave work, he gave some sort of authority to do that work. And when he took his last leave, he appointed "the porter to watch," to be sure to be ready to open to him at his return; and in the mean time to take care to whom he opened his gates; not to thieves and robbers, but only to his master's friends and servants. Thus our Lord Jesus, when he ascended on high, left something for all his servants to do, expecting they should all do him service in his absence, and be ready to receive him at his return. All are appointed to work, and some authorized to rule.

2. We ought to be always upon our watch, in expectation of his return, ver. 35–37. 1st. Our Lord will come, and will come as the Master of the house, to take account of his servants, and of their work, and of the improvement they have made. 2nd. We know not when he will come; and he has very wisely kept us at uncertainty, that we might be always ready. We know not when he will come, just at what precise time; the Master of the house perhaps will come at even, at nine at night; or it may be at midnight; or at cockrowing, at three in the morning; or perhaps not till six. This is applicable to his coming to us in particular at our death, as well as to the general judgment. Our present life is a night, a dark night, compared with the other life; we know not in which watch of the night our Master will come, whether in the days of youth, or middle age, or old age; but as soon as we are born we begin to die; and therefore as soon as we are capable of expecting any thing, we must expect death. 3rd. Our great care must be that, whenever our Lord comes, he do not find us sleeping, secure in ourselves, off our guard, indulging ourselves in ease and sloth, mindless of our work and duty, and thoughtless of our Lord's coming; ready to say, He will not come, and unready to meet him. 4th. His coming will indeed be coming suddenly; it will be a great surprise and terror to those that are careless and asleep; it will come upon them as a thief in the night. 5th. It is therefore the indispensable duty of all Christ's disciples to watch, to be awake, and keep awake: "What I say unto you" four, ver. 3, "I say unto all" the twelve, or rather to you twelve, I say unto all my disciples and followers; what I say to you of this generation, I say to all that shall believe in me, through your word, in every age, Watch, watch; expect my second coming, prepare for it, that you may be found in peace, without spot, and blameless.

CHAPTER XIV.

At this chapter begins the account which this evangelist gives of the death and sufferings of our Lord Jesus, which we are all concerned to be acquainted not only with the history of, but with the mystery of. Here is, I. The plot of the chief priests and scribes against Christ, ver. 1, 2. II. The anointing of Christ's head at a supper in Bethany, two days before his death, ver. 3–9. III. The contract Judas made with the chief priests to betray him, ver. 10, 11. IV. Christ's eating the passover with his disciples, his instituting the Lord's supper, and his discourse with his disciples, at and after supper, ver. 12–31. V. Christ's agony in the garden, ver. 32–42. VI. The betraying of him by Judas, and the apprehending of him by the chief priests' agents, ver. 43–52. VII. His arraignment before the high priest, his conviction, and the indignities done him at that bar, ver. 53–65. VIII. Peter's denying him, ver. 66–72. Most of which passages we had before, Mat. xxvi.

FFTER two days was the feast of the passover, and of unleavened bread: and the chief priests and the scribes sought how they might take him by craft, and put him to death. 2 But they said, Not on the feast day, lest there be an uproar of the people. 3 And being in Bethany in the house of Simon the leper, as he sat at meat, there came a woman having an alabaster box of ointment of spikenard very precious; and she brake the box, and poured it on his head. 4 And there were some that had indignation within themselves, and said, what is here recorded took place two days before the festival, at which the Passover was eaten, and unleavened bread alone used. The removal of leaven, as is well known, took place at least the day before the Passover.

xiv. 2. Here, as in Matt. xxvi. 5, the words rendered "not on the feast day" must be translated "not at the feast," or "during the feast."

xiv. 3–9. Groswell adopts the opinion that these verses are not in their chronological order, and assigns them to a date a few days earlier. A reference to John xii. 1, &c., shows that Jesus went to Bethany six days before the Passover, and that Jesus was then anointed by the woman. In Luke vii. 36, &c., there is an account of another and an earlier anointing, as even Strauss is compelled to admit, though he tries hard to prove that the one recorded by John is different from that set forth by Matthew and Mark. His objection that these evangelists place the occurrence four days later than John

Why was this waste of the ointment made? 5 For it might have been sold for more than three hundred pence, and have been given to the poor. And they murmured against her. 6 And Jesus said, Let her alone; why trouble ye her? she hath wrought a good work on me. 7 For ye have the poor with you always, and whensoever ye will ye may do them good: but me ye have not always. 8 She hath done what she could: she is come aforehand to anoint my body to the burying. 9 Verily I say unto you, Wheresoever this gospel shall be preached throughout the whole world, this also that she hath done shall be spoken of for a memorial of her. 10 And Judas Iscariot, one of the twelve, went unto the chief priests, to betray him unto them. 11 And when they heard it, they were glad, and promised to give him money. And he sought how he might conveniently betray him.

We have here instances, First. Of the kindness of Christ's friends, and the provision made of respects and honours for him; and some friends he had, even in and about Jerusalem, that loved him, and never thought they could do enough for him, among whom, though Israel be not gathered, he is and will be glorious.

1. Here was one friend that was so kind as to invite him to sup with him, and he was so kind as to accept the invitation, ver. 3. Though he had a prospect of his death approaching, yet he did not abandon himself to a melancholy retirement from all company, but conversed as freely with his friends as usual.

2. Here was another friend that was so kind as to anoint his head with very precious ointment, "as he sat at meat." This was an extraordinary piece of respect paid him by a good woman, that thought nothing too good to bestow upon Christ, and to do him honour. Now the scripture was fulfilled, "when the king sits at his table, my spikenard sendeth forth the smell thereof," Cant. i. 12. Let us anoint Christ as our beloved, kiss him with a kiss of affection; and anoint him as our sovereign, kiss him with a kiss of allegiance. Did he pour out his soul unto death for us, and shall we think any box of ointment too precious to pour out upon him? And it is observable she took care to pour it all out upon Christ's head; "she brake the box," so we read it; but because it was "an alabaster box," not easily broken, nor was it necessary it should be broken to get out the ointment, some read it, she shook the box, or knocked it to the ground, to loosen what was in it, that it might be got out the better; or, she rubbed and scraped out all that stuck to the sides of it. Christ must be honoured with all we have, and we must not think to keep back any part of the price. Do we give him the precious ointment of our best affections?—let him have them all; love him with all the heart.

Now, 1st. There were those that put a worse construction upon this than it deserved; they called it a "waste of the ointment," ver. 4. Because they could not have found in their hearts to put themselves to such an expense for the honouring of Christ, they thought she was prodigal that did. Note, As the vile person ought not to be called liberal, nor the churl said to be bountiful, Isa. xxxii. 5, so the liberal and bountiful ought not to be called wasteful. They pretended it might have been sold and given to the poor, ver. 5. But as a common piety to the Corban will not excuse from a particular charity to a poor parent, ch. vii. 11, so a common charity to the poor will not excuse from a particular act of piety to the Lord Jesus: "What thy hand finds to do" that is good, "do it with thy might."

2nd. Our Lord Jesus put a better construction upon it than for aught appears was designed. Probably she intended no more but to shew the great honour she had for him before all the company, and to complete his entertainment. But Christ makes it to be an act of great faith, as well as great love; ver. 8, "she is come aforehand to anoint my body to the burying," as if she foresaw that my resurrection would prevent her doing it afterwards. This funeral rite was a kind of preface of, or prædium to, his death approaching. See how Christ's heart was filled with the thoughts of his death, how every thing was construed with a reference to that, and how familiarly he spoke of it upon all occasions. It is usual for those who are condemned to die to have their coffins prepared, and other provision made for their funerals, while they are yet alive; and so Christ accepted this. Christ's death and burial were the lowest steps of his humiliation; and therefore, though he cheerfully submitted to them, yet he would have some marks of honour to attend them, which might help to take off the offence of the cross, and be an intimation how "precious in the sight of the Lord the death of his saints is." Christ never rode in triumph into Jerusalem but when he came thither to suffer, nor had ever his head anointed but for his burial.

3rd. He recommended this piece of heroic piety to the applause of the church in all ages: "Wherever this Gospel shall be preached, it shall be spoken of for a memorial of her," ver. 9. Note, The honour which attends well-doing, even in this world, is sufficient to balance the reproach and contempt that is cast upon it. "The memory of the just is blessed," and they that had "trial of cruel mockings" yet "obtained a good report," Heb. xi. 36, 39. Thus was this good woman repaid for her box of ointment, nec oleum perdidit nec operam,—she lost neither her oil nor her labour; she got by it that good name which is better than precious ointment. Those that honour Christ he will honour.

Secondly. Of the malice of Christ's enemies, and the preparation made by them to do him mischief.

1. The chief priests, his open enemies, consulted how they might "put him to death," ver. 1. 2. The feast of the passover was now at hand, and at that feast he must be crucified. 1st. That his death and sufferings might be the more public, and that all Israel, even those of the dispersion, who came from all parts to the feast, might be witnesses of it, and of the wonders that attended it. 2nd. That the antitype might answer the type. Christ, our passover, was sacrificed for us, and brought us out of the house of bondage, at the same time that the paschal lamb was sacrificed, and Israel's deliverance out of Egypt commemorated. Now see, First. How spiteful Christ's enemies were; they did not think it enough to banish or imprison him; for they aimed not only to silence him, and stop his progress for the future, but to be revenged on him for all the good he had done. Secondly. How subtle they were: "Not on the feast-day," when the people are together: they do not say, lest they should be disturbed in their devotions, and diverted from them, but "lest there should be an uproar," ver. 2; lest they should rise and rescue him, and fall foul upon those that attempt any thing against him. They who desired nothing more than the praise of men, dreaded nothing more than the rage and displeasure of men.

2. Judas, his disguised enemy, contracted with them for the betraying of him, ver. 10, 11. He is said to be "one of the twelve," that were Christ's family, intimate with him, trained up for the service of his kingdom, and he "went to the chief priests" to tender his service in this affair.

1st. That which he proposed to them was to betray Christ to them, to give them notice when and where they might find him, and seize him without making "an uproar among the people," which they were afraid of, if they should seize him when he appeared in public in the midst of his admirers. Did he know, then, what help it was they wanted, and where they were run aground in their counsels? It is like he did not, for the debate was held in their close cabal; did they know that he had a mind to serve them, and make court to him? No; they could not imagine that any of his intimates should be so base; but Satan, who was entered into Judas, knew what occasion they had for him, and could guide him to be guide to them, who were contriving to take Jesus. Note, The spirit that works in all the children of disobedience knows how to bring them in to the assistance of one another in a wicked project, and then to harden them in it with the fancy that Providence favours them.

2nd. That which he proposed to himself was to get money by the bargain; he had what he aimed at, when "they promised to give him money." Covetousness was Judas' master-lust, "his own iniquity," and that betrayed him to the sin of betraying his Master; the devil suited his temptation to that, and so conquered him. It is not said they promised him preferment, (he was not ambitious of that,) but they promised him money. See what need we have to double our guard against the sin that most easily besets us. Perhaps it was Judas' covetousness that brought him at first to follow Christ, having a promise that he should be cash-keeper or purser to the society, and he loved in his heart to be fingering money; and now there was money to be got on the other side, he was as ready to betray him as ever he had been to follow him. Note, Where the principle of men's profession of religion is carnal and worldly, and the serving of a secular interest, the very same principle, whenever the wind turns, will be the bitter root of a vile and scandalous apostasy.

3rd. Having secured the money, he set himself to make good his bargain. "He sought how he might conveniently betray him," how he might seasonably deliver him up, so as to answer the intention of those who had hired him. See what need we have to be careful that we do not ensnare ourselves in sinful engagements. If at any time we be so ensnared in the words of our mouths, we are concerned to deliver ourselves by a speedy retreat, Pr. vi. 1–5. It is a rule in our law, as well as in our religion, that an obligation to do an evil thing is null and void; it binds to repentance, not to performance. See how the way of sin is down-hill, when men are in, they must on; and what wicked contrivances many have, in their sinful pursuits, to compass their designs conveniently; but such conveniences will prove mischiefs in the end.

12 And the first day of unleavened bread, when they killed the passover, his disciples said unto him, Where wilt thou that we go and prepare that thou mayest eat the passover? 13 And he sendeth forth two of his disciples, and saith unto them, Go ye into the city, and there shall meet you a man bearing a pitcher of water: follow him. 14 And wheresoever he shall go in, say ye to the goodman of the house, The Master saith, Where is the guestchamber, where I shall eat the passover with my disciples? 15 And he will shew you a large upper room furnished and prepared: there make ready for us. 16 And his disciples went forth, and came into the city, and found as he had said unto them: and they made ready the passover. 17 And in the evening he cometh with the twelve. 18 And as they sat and did eat, Jesus said, Verily I say unto you, One of you which eateth with me shall betray me. 19 And they began to be sorrowful, and to say unto him one by one, Is it I? and another said, Is it I? 20 And he answered and said unto them, It is one of the twelve, that dippeth with me in the dish. 21 The Son of man indeed goeth, as it is written of him: but woe to that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed! good were it for that man if he had never been born. 22 And as they did eat, Jesus took bread, and blessed, and brake it, and gave to them, and said, Take, eat: this is my body. 23 And he assumes a chronological order which is not maintained by critics, nor required by the text. As Ebrard says, "The visit to Bethany had no immediate connection with the chain of events under review, but is introduced parenthetically, for the purpose of showing that the near approach of Christ's death in Matt. xxvi. 12 and Mark xiv. 8 was not first uttered after the resolution of the Sanhedrim, but before it, and was, therefore, truly prophetic." There are some differences of detail, but none of sufficient importance to be regarded as essential, or involving discrepancies which cannot be reconciled. There is some doubt as to the meaning of the words rendered "spikenard, very precious," in verse 3. Some take it to be "liquid spikenard, very costly," while others think it is "pure spikenard, very costly." Whatever the precise sense, the thing itself was a well-known product, brought from India.

xiv. 12. Matthew and Mark both call the day the first of unleavened bread; but Luke simply speaks of it as the day of un-took the cup, and when he had given thanks, he gave it to them: and they all drank of it. 24 And he said unto them, This is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for many. 25 Verily I say unto you, I will drink no more of the fruit of the vine, until that day that I drink it new in the kingdom of God. 26 And when they had sung an hymn, they went out into the mount of Olives. 27 And Jesus saith unto them, All ye shall be offended because of me this night: for it is written, I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered. 28 But after that I am risen, I will go before you into Galilee. 29 But Peter said unto him, Although all shall be offended, yet will not I. 30 And Jesus saith unto him, Verily I say unto thee, That this day, even in this night, before the cock crow twice, thou shalt deny me thrice. 31 But he spake the more vehemently, If I should die with thee, I will not deny thee in any wise. Likewise also said they all.

BLESSING WINE.—ver. 23.

In these verses we have,

First. Christ's eating the passover with his disciples the night before he died, with the joys and comforts of which ordinance he prepared himself for his approaching sorrows, the full prospect of which did not indispose him for that solemnity. Note, No apprehension of trouble, come or coming, should put us by, or put us out of frame for our attendance on holy ordinances, as we have opportunity for it.

1. Christ ate the passover at the usual time, when the other Jews did, as Dr. Whitby has fully made out, and not, as Dr. Hammond would have it, the night before. It was on the first day of that feast which (taking in all the eight days of the feast) was called "the feast of unleavened bread," even that day "when they killed the passover," ver. 12.

2. He directed his disciples how to find the place where he intended to eat the passover; and hereby gave such another proof of his infallible knowledge of things distant and future, which to us seem altogether contingent, as he had given when he sent them for the ass on which he rode in triumph, ch. xi. 6: "Go into the city" (for the passover must be eaten in Jerusalem), "and there shall meet you a man bearing a pitcher of water,"—a servant sent for water to clean the rooms in his master's house,— "follow him," go in where he goes, inquire for his master, "the goodman of the house," ver. 14, and desire him to shew you a room. No doubt the inhabitants of Jerusalem had rooms fitted up to be let out for this occasion to those that came up out of the country to keep the passover, and one of those Christ made use of; not any friend's house, nor any house he had formerly frequented, for then he would have said, Go to such a friend; or, You know where we used to be, go thither, and prepare. Probably he went where he was not known, that he might be undisturbed with his disciples. Perhaps he notified it by a sign to conceal it from Judas, that he might not know till he came to the place; and by such a sign to intimate that he will dwell in the clean heart, that is washed as with pure water. Where he designs to come, a pitcher of water must go before him: see Isa. i. 16—18.

3. He ate the passover in an "upper room furnished," εστρωμένον, "laid with carpets," so Dr. Hammond. It would seem to have been a very handsome dining-room. Christ was far from affecting any thing that looked stately in eating his common meals; on the contrary, he chose that which was homely, sat down on the grass; but when he was to keep a sacred feast, in honour of that, he would be at the expense of as good a room as he could get. God looks not at outward pomp, but he looks at the tokens and expressions of inward reverence for a Divine institution, which it is to be feared those want who, to save charges, deny themselves decencies in the worship of God.

4. He ate it "with the twelve," who were his family, to teach those who have the charge of families, not only families of children, but families of servants, or families of scholars or pupils, to keep up religion among them, and worship God with them. If Christ came "with the twelve," then Judas was with them, though he was at this time contriving to betray his Master; and it is plain, by what follows, ver. 20, that he was there. He did not absent himself, lest he should have been suspected. Had his seat been empty at this feast, they would have said, as Saul of David, "He is not clean; surely he is not clean;" 1 Sam. xx. 26. Hypocrites, though they know it is at their peril, yet crowd into special ordinances, to keep up their reputation, and palliate their secret wickedness. Christ did not exclude him from the feast, though he knew his wickedness, for it was not as yet become public and scandalous. Christ, designing to put the keys of the kingdom of heaven into the hands of men, who can but judge according to outward appearance, he would hereby both direct and encourage them, in their admissions to his table, to be satisfied with a justifiable profession, because they cannot discern the root of bitterness till it springs up.

Secondly. Christ's discourse with his disciples as they were eating the passover. It is likely they had discourse, according to the custom of the feast, of the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, and the preservation of the firstborn, and were as pleasant as they used to be together on this occasion, till Christ told them that which would mix trembling with their joys.

1. They were pleasing themselves with the society of their Master; but he tells them they must now presently lose him, "the Son of man is betrayed;" and they knew, for he had often told them, what followed. If he be betrayed, the next news you will hear of him is, that he is crucified and slain. God hath determined it concerning him, and he agrees to it; "the Son of man goes, as it is written of him," ver. 21. It was written in the counsels of God, and written in the prophecies of the Old Testament, not one jot or tittle of either of which can fall to the ground.

2. They were pleasing themselves with the society one of another; but Christ casts a damp upon the joy of that, by telling them, "One of you that eateth with me shall betray me," ver. 18. Christ said this, if it might be, to startle the conscience of Judas, and to awaken him to repent of his wickedness, and to draw back (for it was not yet too late) from the brink of the pit. But, for aught appears, he was most concerned in the warning was least concerned at it. All the rest were affected with it. 1st. "They began to be sorrowful." As the remembrance of our former falls into sin, so the fear of the like again doth oftentimes much embitter the comfort of our spiritual feasts, and damp our joy. Here were the bitter herbs with which this passover feast was taken. 2nd. They began to be suspicious of themselves; they said "one by one, Is it I? and another said, Is it I?" They are to be commended for their charity, that they were more jealous of themselves than of one another. It is the law of charity to hope the best, 1 Cor. xiii. 5, 7. Because we assuredly know, therefore we may justly suspect, more evil by ourselves than by our brethren. They are also to be commended for their acquiescence in what Christ said; they trusted more to his words than to their own hearts; and therefore do not say, "I am sure it is not I;" but, "Lord, Is it I?" See if there be such a way of wickedness in us, such a root of bitterness, and discover it to us, that we may pluck up that root, and stop up that way.

Now, in answer to their inquiry, Christ saith that, First. Which would make them easy; It is not you, nor you; it is this that now "dips with me in the dish;" the adversary and enemy is this wicked Judas. Secondly. Which, one would think, should make Judas very uneasy. If he go on in his undertaking, it is upon the sword's point; for "woe to that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed;" he is undone, for ever undone; his sin will soon find him out; and it were better for him that he had never been born, had never had a being, than such a miserable one as he must have. It is very probable Judas encouraged himself in it with this thought, that his Master had often said he must be betrayed, and if it must be done, surely God will not find fault with him that doth it, for who has resisted his will? as that objector argues, Rom. ix. 19; but Christ tells him this will be no shelter or excuse to him: "The Son of man indeed goes, as it is written of him," as a lamb to the slaughter; "but woe to that man by whom he is betrayed." God's decrees to permit the sins of men, and bring glory to himself out of them, do neither necessitate their sins nor determine to them, nor will they be any excuse of the sin or mitigation of the punishment. Christ was delivered indeed "by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God;" but, notwithstanding that, it is "with wicked hands that he is crucified and slain," Acts ii. 23.

Thirdly. The institution of the Lord's supper.

1. It was instituted in the close of a supper, when they were sufficiently fed with the paschal lamb, to shew that in the Lord's supper there is no bodily repast intended; to preface it with such a thing is to revive Moses again. But it is food for the soul only; and therefore a very little of that which is for the body, as much as will serve for a sign, is enough. It was at the close of the passover supper, which by this was evangelized, and then superseded and set aside. Much of the doctrine and duty of the eucharist is illustrated to us by the law of the passover, Ex. xii.; for the Old Testament institutions, though they do not bind us, yet instruct us, by the help of a gospel key to them. And these two ordinances lying here so near together, it may be good to compare them, and observe how much shorter and plainer the institution of the Lord's supper is, than that of the passover was; Christ's yoke is easy, in comparison with that of the ceremonial law, and his ordinances more spiritual.

2. It was instituted by the example of Christ himself, not with the ceremony and solemnity of a law, as the ordinance of baptism was, after Christ's resurrection, Mat. xxviii. 19, with "Be it enacted by the authority aforesaid," by a power given to Christ "in heaven and on earth," ver. 18, but by the practice of our Master himself, because intended for those who are already his disciples, and taken into covenant with him: but it has the obligation of a law, and was intended to remain in full force, power, and virtue till his second coming.

3. It was instituted with blessing and giving of thanks; the gifts of common providence are to be so received, 1 Tim. iv. 4, 5; much more the gifts of special grace. "He blessed," ver. 22, "and gave thanks," ver. 23. At his other meals, he was wont to bless and give thanks, ch. vi. 41; viii. 7; so remarkably that he was known by it, Lu. xxiv. 30, 31; and he did the same at this meal.

4. It was instituted to be a memorial of his death; and therefore he broke the bread, to shew how it pleased the Lord to bruise him: and he called the wine, which is the blood of the grape, "the blood of the new testament." The death Christ died was a bloody death; and frequent mention is made of the blood, the precious blood, as the price of our redemption; for the blood is the life, and made "atonement for the soul," Lev. xvii. 11, 14. The pouring out of the blood was the most sensible indication of the pouring out of his soul, Isa. liii. 12. Blood has a voice, Gen. iv. 10; and therefore the blood is so often mentioned, because it was to speak, Heb. xii. 24. It is called "the blood of the new testament," for the covenant of grace became a testament, and of force by the death of Christ the testator, Heb. ix. 16. It is said to be "shed for many;" to justify many, Isa. liii. 12; to bring many sons to glory, Heb. ii. 10. It was sufficient for many, being of infinite value; it has been of use to many. We read of a great multitude, which no man could number, that had all "washed their robes, and made them white, in the blood of the Lamb," Rev. vii. 9, 14; and still it is a fountain opened. How comfortable is this to poor repenting sinners, that the blood of Christ is shed for many; and if for many, why not for me? If for sinners, sinners of the Gentiles, the chief of sinners, then why not for me?

5. It was instituted to be a ratification of the covenant made with us in him, leavened bread. All mean the same day. Mark speaks of it as the time when they killed the Passover, while Luke speaks of it as the day on which the Passover ought to be killed. Luke adds the names of the two disciples whom Jesus sent to make preparations, namely, Peter and John. It is apparent from all three of the accounts that our Lord was not in Jerusalem when he gave the instructions here reported.

xiv. 17. Both Matthew and Mark intimate that the evening was come, but Luke only says "when the hour was come." It was evening, of course, as the correct time for eating the Passover. John alone adds here the account of washing the feet of the disciples by their Master.

xiv. 22. This verse is transposed by Greswell, who, in his "Harmony," places it between verses 17 and 18.

xiv. 24. Both here and in Matthew xxvi. 28, the expression, "This is my blood of the New Testament," is better rendered, "This is my and a sign of the conveyance of those benefits to us which were purchased for us by his death; and therefore he broke the bread to them, ver. 22, and said, "Take, eat" of it; he gave the cup to them, and ordered them to drink of it, ver. 23. Apply the doctrine of Christ crucified to yourselves, and let it be meat and drink to your souls, strengthening, and nourishing, and refreshing to you, and the support and comfort of your spiritual life.

6. It was instituted with an eye to the happiness of heaven, and to be an earnest and foretaste of that, and thereby to put our mouths out of taste to all the pleasures and delights of sense, ver. 25: "I will drink no more of the fruit of the vine," as it is a bodily refreshment; I have done with it. No one having tasted spiritual delights, straightway desires sensitive ones, for he saith the spiritual is better, Lu. v. 39. But every one that hath tasted spiritual delights, straightway desires eternal ones, for he saith those are better still; and therefore let me drink no more of the fruit of the vine; it is dead and flat to those that have been made to drink of the river of God's pleasures; but, Lord, hasten the day when I shall drink it new and fresh "in the kingdom of God," where it shall be for ever new, and in perfection.

Fourthly, Christ's discourse with his disciples as they were returning to Bethany by moonlight. When they had sung the hymn, presently they went out; it was now pretty near bedtime, but our Lord Jesus had his heart so much upon his suffering, that he would "not come into the tabernacle of his house, nor go up into his bed, nor give sleep to his eyes," when that work was to be done, Ps. cxxxii. 3, 4. The Israelites were forbidden to go out of their houses that night that they ate the passover, for fear of the sword of the destroying angel, Ex. xii. 22, 23; but because Christ the great Shepherd was to be smitten, he went out purposely to expose himself to the sword as a champion; they evaded the destroyer, but Christ conquered him, and brought destructions to a perpetual end.

1. Christ here foretells, that in his sufferings he should be deserted by all his disciples; "You will all be offended because of me this night." "I know you will," ver. 27, and "what I tell you now, is no other but what the Scripture has told you before, I will smite the shepherd, and then the sheep will be scattered." Christ knew this before, and yet welcomed them at his table; he foresees the falls and miscarriages of his disciples, and yet doth not refuse them. Nor should we be discouraged from coming to the Lord's supper by the fear of relapsing into sin afterward; but the greater our danger is, the more need we have to fortify ourselves by the diligent, conscientious use of holy ordinances. Christ tells them they would be offended in him, would begin to question whether he were the Messiah or not, when they saw him overpowered by his enemies. Hitherto they had continued with him in his temptations; though they had sometimes offended him, yet they had not been offended in him, nor turned the back upon him; but now the storm would be so great, that they would all slip their anchors, and be in danger of shipwreck. Some trials are more particular, as Rev. ii. 10, "the devil shall cast some of you into prison;" but others are more general, an "hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world," Rev. iii. 10. The smiting of the shepherd is often the scattering of the sheep: magistrates, ministers, masters of families, if these are, as they should be, shepherds to those under their charge, when any thing comes amiss to them, the whole flock suffers for it, and is endangered by it. But Christ encourages them with a promise that they shall rally again, shall return both to their duty and to their comfort, ver. 28: "After I am risen," I will "gather you in from all the places whither you are scattered," Eze. xxxiv. 12; "and will go before you into Galilee;" will see our friends, and enjoy one another there.

2. He foretells that he should be denied, particularly by Peter. When they went out to go to the mount of Olives, we may suppose they dropped Judas, he stole away from them, whereupon the rest began to think highly of themselves, that they stuck to their Master when Judas quitted him. But Christ tells them, that though they should be kept by his grace from Judas's apostasy, yet they would have no reason to boast of their constancy. Note, Though God keeps us from being as bad as the worst, yet we may well be ashamed to think that we are not better than we are. 1st. Peter is confident that he should not do so ill as the rest of the disciples, ver. 29: "Though all should be offended," all his brethren here present, "yet will not I." He supposeth himself not only stronger than others, but so much stronger as to be able to receive the shock of a temptation, and bear up against it, all alone; to stand, though nobody stood by him. It is bred in the bone with us to think well of ourselves, and trust to our own hearts. 2nd. Christ tells him he will do worse than any of them. They will all desert him, but he will deny him, not once, but thrice; and that presently; "this day, even this night, before the cock crow twice," thou wilt deny that ever thou hadst any knowledge of me or acquaintance with me, as one ashamed and afraid to own me. 3rd. He stands to his promise: "If I should die with thee, I will not deny thee;" I will stick to thee, though it cost me my life, and no doubt he thought as he said. Judas said nothing like this, when Christ told him he would betray him; he sinned by contrivance, Peter, by surprise. He devised the wickedness, Mic. ii. 1; Peter was overtaken in this fault, Gal. vi. 1. It was ill done of Peter to contradict his Master; if he had said, with fear and trembling, "Lord, give me grace to keep me from denying thee, lead me not into this temptation, deliver me from this evil," it might have been prevented. But they were all thus confident; they who said "Lord, is it I?" now said, "It shall never be I;" being acquitted from their fear of betraying Christ, they were now secure. But he that thinks he stands, must learn to take heed lest he fall; and he that girdeth on the harness, not boast as though he had put it off.

32 And they came to a place which was named Gethsemane: and he saith to his disciples, Sit ye here, while I shall pray. 33 And he taketh with him Peter and James and John, and began to be sore amazed, and to be very heavy; 34 And saith unto them, My soul is exceeding sorrowful unto death: tarry ye here, and watch. 35 And he went forward a little, and fell on the ground, and prayed that, if it were possible, the hour might pass from him. 36 And he said, Abba, Father, all things are possible unto thee; take away this cup from me: nevertheless not what I will, but what thou wilt. 37 And he cometh, and findeth them sleeping, and saith unto Peter, Simon, sleepest thou? couldest not thou watch one hour? 38 Watch ye and pray, lest ye enter into temptation. The spirit truly is ready, but the flesh is weak. 39 And again he went away, and prayed, and spake the same words. 40 And when he returned, he found them asleep again, (for their eyes were heavy,) neither wist they what to answer him. 41 And he cometh the third time, and saith unto them, Sleep on now, and take your rest: it is enough, the hour is come; behold, the Son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners. 42 Rise up, let us go; lo, he that betrayeth me is at hand.

GARDEN OF GETHSEMANE.

Christ is here entering upon his sufferings, and begins with those which were the sorest of all his sufferings, in his soul. Here we have him in his agony; this melancholy story we had in Matthew; this agony in soul was the wormwood and the gall in the affliction and misery; and thereby it appeared no sorrow was forced upon him, but it was what he freely admitted.

First. He retired for prayer: "Sit ye here," saith he to his disciples, while I go a little farther, and pray. He had lately prayed with them, Jno. xvii., and now he appoints them to withdraw, while he goes to his Father, upon an errand peculiar to himself. Note, Our praying with our families will not excuse our neglect of secret worship: when Jacob entered into his agony, he first sent over all that he had, and was left alone, and then there wrestled a man with him," Gen. xxxii. 23, 24; though he had been at prayer before, ver. 9, it is likely, with his family.

Secondly. Even into that retirement he took "with him Peter and James and John," ver. 33; three competent witnesses of this part of his humiliation; and though great spirits care not how few know any thing of their agonies, he was not ashamed they should see. These three had bragged most of their ability and willingness to suffer with him; Peter here, in this chapter, and James and John, ch. x. 39; and therefore Christ takes them to stand by, and see what a struggle he had with the bloody baptism and the bitter cup, to blood, that of the new covenant;" for such is the meaning and force of the original Greek.

xiv. 27. The words "because of me this night" are omitted by some of the best ancient MSS., and several modern editions.

xiv. 30. In Matthew we read "before the cock crow," omitting the word "twice." The sense is, "before the second cock-crowing."

xiv. 36. The word "Abba" inserted here signifies "Father" in Aramaic, words from which language are elsewhere used by Mark.

xiv. 41. On "it is enough" Dr. Doddridge's paraphrase is, "I have been calling you to watch; but it is now enough; for this season of watching is over, and I have no further need to press you to it." In much the same sense the phrase is understood by others; though some refer it to sleep, which must be wrong, as appears from the preceding words, "Sleep on now, and take your rest." Further watching was needless.

xiv. 45. For "Master, Master," the original has "Rabbi, Rabbi," convince them they knew not what they said. It is fit that they who are most confident should be first tried, that they may be made sensible of their folly and weakness.

Thirdly. There he was in a mighty toss, ver. 33: "He began to be sore amazed," ἐκθαμβήσας, a word not used in Matthew, but very significant; it speaks something like that "horror of great darkness," which fell upon Abraham, Gen. xv. 12; or rather, something much worse, and more frightful. The "terrors of God set themselves in array against him," and he allowed himself the actual and intent contemplation of them. Never was sorrow like unto his at that time; never any had such experience as he had had from eternity of Divine favours, and therefore never any had, or could have, such a sense as he had of Divine frowns; yet there was not the least disorder or irregularity in this commotion of his spirits: his affections rose not tumultuously, but under direction, and as they were called up, for he had no corrupt nature to mix with them, as we have. If water have a sediment at the bottom, though it may be pretty clear while it stands still, yet shake it, and it goes muddy; so it is with our affections; but pure water, in a clean glass, though never so much stirred, continues clear; and so it was with Christ. Dr. Lightfoot thinks it very probable that the devil did now appear to our Saviour in a visible shape, in his own shape and proper colour, to terrify and affright him, and to drive him from his hope in God, (which he aimed at in persecuting Job, a type of Christ, to make him curse God and die,) and to deter him from the farther prosecution of his undertaking; and whatever hindered him from that, he looked upon as coming from Satan, Mat. xvi. 23. When the devil had tempted him in the wilderness, it is said, he "departed from him for a season," Lu. iv. 3: intending another grapple with him, and in another way: finding that he could not by his flatteries allure him into sin, he would try by his terrors to affright him into it, and so make void his design.

Fourthly. He made a sad complaint of this toss he was in: he said, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful." 1. He was made sin for us, and therefore was thus sorrowful; he fully knew the malignity of the sins he was to suffer for, and having the highest degree of love to God, who was offended by them, and of love to man, who was damaged and endangered by them, now those were set in order before him, no marvel that his soul was "exceeding sorrowful." Now he was made to serve with our sins, and was thus wearied with our iniquities. 2. He was made a curse for us; the curses of the law were transferred to him, as our surety and representative, not as originally bound with us, but as bail to the action. And when his soul was thus exceeding sorrowful, he did as it were yield to them, and lie down under the load, until by his death he had satisfied for sin, and so for ever abolished the curse; he now tasted death, as he is said to do, Heb. ii. 9; which is not an extenuating expression, as if he did but taste it; no, he drank up even the dregs of the cup; but it is rather aggravating, it did not go down by wholesale, but he tasted all the bitterness of it. This was that fear the apostle speaks of, Heb. v. 7; a natural fear of pain and death, which it is natural to human nature to startle at. Now the consideration of Christ's sufferings in his soul, and his sorrows for us, should be of use to us.

1st. To embitter our sins. Can we ever think a favourable or so much as a flighty thought of sin, when we see what impression sin (though but imputed) made upon the Lord Jesus? Shall that sit light upon our souls, which sat so heavy upon his? Was Christ in such an agony for our sins, and shall we never be in an agony about them? How should we look upon him whom we have pressed, whom we have pierced, and mourn, and be in bitterness! It becomes us to be exceeding sorrowful for sin, because Christ was so, and never to make a mock at it. If Christ thus suffered for sin, "let us arm ourselves with the same mind."

2nd. To sweeten our sorrows. If our souls be at any time "exceeding sorrowful," through the afflictions of this present time, let us remember that our Master was so before us, "and the disciple is not greater than his Lord." Why should we affect to drive away sorrow, when Christ for our sakes courted it, and submitted to it, and thereby not only took out the sting of it, and made it tolerable, but put virtue into it, and made it profitable? for "by the sadness of the countenance the heart is made better;" nay, and put sweetness into it, and made it comfortable. Blessed Paul was sorrowful, and yet always rejoicing. If we be exceeding sorrowful, it is but unto death; that will be the period of all our sorrows, if Christ be ours; when the eyes are closed, all tears are wiped away from them.

Fifthly. He ordered his disciples to stick to him, not because he needed their help, but because he would have them to look upon him, and receive instruction. He said to them, "Tarry ye here, and watch:" he had bid the other disciples only "sit ye here," ver. 32; but these three he bids to tarry, "and watch," as expecting more from them than from the rest.

Sixthly. He addressed himself to God by prayer, ver. 35: He "fell on the ground and prayed." It was but a little before this that in prayer he "lift up his eyes," Jno. xvii. 1; but here, being in an agony, he "fell upon his face," accommodating himself to his present humiliation, and teaching us thus to abase ourselves before God; it becomes us to be low when we come into the presence of the Most High. 1. As man, he deprecated his sufferings, that "if it were possible, the hour might pass from him," ver. 35; this short, but sharp affliction; "that which I am now this hour to enter upon; let man's salvation be, if possible, accomplished without it." We have his very words, ver. 36, "Abba, Father," the Syriac word is here retained, which Christ used, and which signifies father, to intimate what an emphasis our Lord Jesus in his sorrows laid upon it, and would have us to lay. It is with an eye to this, that St. Paul retains this word, putting it into the mouths of all that have "the spirit of adoption;" they are taught to cry, "Abba, Father," Rom. viii. 15; Gal. iv. 6. "Father, all things are possible to thee." Note, Even that which we cannot expect should be done for us, we ought yet to believe God is able to do. And when we submit to his will, and refer ourselves to his wisdom and mercy, it must be with a believing acknowledgment of his power, that all things are possible to him. 2. As Mediator, he acquiesced to the will of God concerning him: "Nevertheless, not what I will, but what thou wilt;" "I know the matter is settled, and cannot be altered; I must suffer and die, and I bid it welcome."

Seventhly. He roused his disciples, who were dropped asleep while he was at prayer, ver. 37, 38. He comes to look after them, since they did not look after him; and he "findeth them sleeping," so little affected were they with his sorrows, his complaints, and prayers. This carelessness of theirs was a presage of their farther offence in deserting him; and it was an aggravation of it, that he had so lately commended them for continuing with him in his temptations, though they had not been without their faults. Was he so willing to make the best of them, and were they so indifferent in approving themselves to him? They had lately promised not to be offended in him. What! and yet mind him so little! He particularly upbraided Peter with his drowsiness, "Simon, sleepest thou? καὶ σὺ κοιμῇ; What thou, my son! thou that didst so positively promise thou wouldst not deny me, dost thou slight me thus? From thee I expected better things. "Couldst thou not watch one hour?" He did not require him to watch all night with him, only for one hour. It aggravates our faintness and short-spiritedness in Christ's service that he doth not over-task us nor weary us with it, Isa. xlii. 23. He puts upon us no other burthen, but to hold fast till he comes, Rev. ii. 24, 25; and behold he comes quickly, Rev. iii. 11.

As those whom Christ loves he rebukes when they do amiss, so those whom he rebukes he counsels and comforts. 1. It was a very wise and faithful word of advice which Christ here gave to his disciples, "watch, and pray, lest ye enter into temptation," ver. 38. It was bad to sleep when Christ was in his agony; but they were entering into further temptation; and if they did not stir up themselves, and fetch in grace and strength from God by prayer, they would do worse, and so they did, when "they all forsook him and fled." 2. It was a very kind and tender excuse that Christ made for them, "the spirit truly is willing;" I know it is, it is ready, it is forward; you would willingly keep awake, but you cannot. This may be taken as a reason for that exhortation, "watch, and pray;" because though "the spirit is willing," I grant it is, yet have sincerely resolved never to be offended in me; but "the flesh is weak," and if you do not "watch and pray," and use the means of perseverance, you may be overcome notwithstanding. The consideration of the weakness and infirmity of our flesh should engage and quicken us to prayer and watchfulness when we are entering into temptation.

Eighthly. He repeated his address to his Father, ver. 39: "He went again, and prayed," saying, τὸν αὐτὸν λόγον, "the same word," or matter, or business; he spoke to the same purpose, and again, "the third time." This teacheth us that "men ought always to pray, and not to faint," Lu. xviii. 1. Though the answers to our prayers do not come quickly, yet we must renew our requests, and "continue instant in prayer," for "the vision is for an appointed time, and at the end it shall speak, and not lie," Hab. ii. 3. Paul, when he was "buffeted by a messenger of Satan, besought the Lord thrice," as Christ did here, before he obtained an answer of peace, 2 Cor. xii. 8. A little before this, when Christ in the trouble of his soul prayed, "Father, glorify thy name," he had an immediate answer by a voice from heaven, "I have both glorified it, and I will glorify it yet again;" but now he must come a second and third time, for the visits of God's grace in answer to prayer come sooner or later, according to the pleasure of his will, that we may be kept depending.

Ninthly. He repeated his visits to his disciples; thus he gave a specimen of his continued care for his church on earth, even when it is half asleep, and not duly concerned for itself, while he ever lives making intercession with his Father in heaven: see how, as became a Mediator, he passeth and repasseth between both. He came the second time to his disciples, and "found them asleep again," ver. 40. See how the infirmities of Christ's disciples return upon them, notwithstanding their resolutions, and overpower them, notwithstanding their resistance; and what clogs those bodies of ours are to our souls, which should make us long for that blessed state in which they shall be no more our encumbrance. This second time he spoke to them as before, but "they wist not what to answer him;" they were ashamed of their drowsiness, and had nothing to say in excuse for it; or, they were so overpowered with it, that, like men between asleep and awake, they knew not where they were, or what they said. But the third time they were bid to sleep, if they could, ver. 41, "Sleep on now, and take your rest." I have now no more occasion for your watching; you may sleep if you will, for me. "It is enough;" we had not that word in Matthew. "You have had warning enough to keep awake, and would not take it, and now you shall see what little reason you had to be secure: 'Ameeke,' 'I discharge you from any farther attendance,' so some understand it. 'Now the hour is come in which I knew you would all forsake me, and even take your course,' as he said to Judas, 'What thou doest, do quickly.'" "The Son of man is" now "betrayed into the hands of sinners," the chief priests and elders, those worst of sinners, because they made a profession of sanctity. Come, "rise up," do not lie dozing there. "Let us go," and meet the enemy, for, "lo, he that betrayeth me is at hand," and I must now think of making an escape. When we see trouble at the door, we are concerned to stir up ourselves to get ready for it.

43 And immediately, while he yet spake, cometh Judas, one of the twelve, and with him a great multitude with swords and staves, from the chief priests and the scribes and the elders. 44 And he that betrayed him had given them a token, saying, Whomsoever I shall kiss, that same is he; take him, and lead him away safely. 45 And as soon as he was come, he goeth straightway to him, and saith, Master, master; and kissed him. 46 And they laid their hands on him, and took him. 47 And one of them that stood by drew a sword, and smote a servant of the high priest, and cut off his ear.

ARABS SALUTING.

and it is to be noted that Matthew has in the Greek text, "Hail! Rabbi."

xiv. 51, 52. Dean Alford says, "It is impossible to determine, and therefore idle to inquire, who this was." Some think it was Mark himself. Of this opinion is Olshausen. The young man appears to have been roused from his bed, and had come out hastily in his night-dress. Some, however, object to this, and suppose it was the ordinary dress of the young man. The question is a rather difficult one, but not important. The word "naked," which occurs twice, may or may not be taken literally. It is certain, however, that, like our word "stripped," it had sometimes the sense of partially unclothed, especially by the removal of outer garments. One might be called naked who only retained his tunic.

xiv. 53. In this passage the ordinary Greek term for high-priest is used both in the singular and in the plural. Our translators have rendered the former by "the high-priest," and the latter by "the 48 And Jesus answered and said unto them, Are ye come out, as against a thief, with swords and with staves to take me? 49 I was daily with you in the temple teaching, and ye took me not: but the scriptures must be fulfilled. 50 And they all forsook him, and fled. 51 And there followed him a certain young man, having a linen cloth cast about his naked body; and the young men laid hold on him: 52 And he left the linen cloth, and fled from them naked.

We have here the seizing of our Lord Jesus by the officers of the chief priests. This was what his enemies had long aimed at: they had often sent to take him, but he had escaped out of their hands, because his hour was not come; nor could they now have taken him, had he not freely surrendered himself. He began first to suffer in his soul, but afterwards suffered in his body, that he might satisfy for sin, which begins in the heart, but afterwards makes the members of the body instruments of unrighteousness.

I. Here is a parcel of rude miscreants employed to take our Lord Jesus, and make him a prisoner; "a great multitude, with swords and staves." There is no wickedness so black, no villany so horrid, but there may be found among the children of men fitting tools to be used in it, that will not boggle at it; so miserably depraved and vitiated is mankind. At the head of this rabble is "Judas, one of the twelve;" one of those that had been many years intimately conversant with our Lord Jesus, had prophesied in his name, and in his name cast out devils, and yet betrayed him. It is no new thing for a very fair and plausible profession to end in a shameful and fatal apostasy: "How art thou fallen, O Lucifer!"

II. Men of no less figure than "the chief priests, and the scribes, and the elders," sent them, and set them on work, who pretended to expect the Messiah, and to be ready to welcome him; and yet, when he is come, and has given undeniable proofs that it is he that should come, yet because he doth not make court to them, nor countenance and support their pomp and grandeur, because he appears not as a temporal prince, but sets up a spiritual kingdom, and preacheth repentance, reformation, and a holy life, and directs men's thoughts, and affections, and aims to another world, they set themselves against him, and, without giving the credentials he produceth an impartial examination, resolve to run him down.

III. Judas betrayed him with a kiss; abusing the freedom Christ used to allow his disciples, of kissing his cheek at their return, when they had been any time absent. He called him, "Master, master, and kissed him;" Rabbi, rabbi; as if he had been now more respectful to him than ever. It is enough to put one for ever out of conceit with being called of men Rabbi, rabbi, Mat. xxiii. 7, when it was with this compliment that Christ was betrayed. He bade them "take him, and lead him away safely." Some think he spoke this ironically, knowing that they could not secure him, unless he pleased; this Samson could break their bonds asunder, as threads of tow, and make his escape; and then he should get the money, and Christ the honour, and no harm done; and I should think so too, but that Satan was entered into him; so that the worst and most malicious intention of this action is not too black to be supposed. Nay, he had often heard his Master say that, being betrayed, he should be crucified, and had no reason to think otherwise.

IV. They arrested him, and made him their prisoner, ver. 46; "they laid their hands on him," rude and violent hands, "and took him" into custody; triumphing, it is likely, that they had done that which had been often before attempted in vain.

V. Peter laid about him in defence of his Master, and wounded one of the assailants; being for the present mindful of his promise to venture his life with his Master. He was "one of them that stood by," of them that were with him, so the word signifies, of those three disciples that were with him in the garden. He "drew a sword," and aimed, it is likely, to cut off the head, but missed his blow, and only cut off the ear, of a servant of the high priest's, ver. 47. It is easier to fight for Christ than to die for him; but Christ's good soldiers overcome, not by taking away other people's lives, but by laying down their own, Rev. xii. 11.

VI. Christ argues with them that had seized him, and shews them the absurdity of their proceedings against him. 1. That they came out against him as against a thief; whereas he was innocent of any crime; he taught daily in the temple, and if he had had any wicked design, there it would, some time or other, have been discovered: nay, these officers of the chief priests, being retainers to the temple, may be supposed to have heard his sermons there, "I was with you in the temple;" and had he not taught them an excellent doctrine, even his enemies themselves being judges? Were not "all the words of his mouth in righteousness?" Was there any thing "froward or perverse in them?" Pr. viii. 8. By his fruits he was known to be a good tree; why, then, did they come out against him as a thief? 2. That they came to take him thus privately; whereas he was neither ashamed nor afraid to appear publicly in the temple. He was none of those evil-doers that hate the light, neither come to the light, Jno. iii. 20. If their masters had any thing to say to him, they might meet him any day in the temple, where he was ready to answer all challenges, all charges; and there they might do as they pleased with him; for the priests had the custody of the temple, and the command of the guards about it: but to come upon him thus at midnight, and in the place of his retirement, was base and cowardly. This was to do as David's enemy, that "sate in the lurking-place of the villages to murder the innocent," Ps. x. 8. But this was not all. 3. They came "with swords and staves," as if he had been in arms against the government, and must have the pose comitatus raised to reduce him. There was no occasion for those weapons; but they made this ado, 1st. To secure themselves from the rage of some; they came armed because "they feared the people;" but thus "were they in great fear, where no fear was," Ps. liii. 5. 2nd. To expose him to the rage of others. By coming "with swords and staves to take him," they represented him to the people, who are apt to take impressions this way, as a dangerous, turbulent man; and so endeavoured to incense them against him, and make them cry out, "Crucify him, crucify him," having no other way to gain their point.

VII. He reconciled himself to all this injurious, ignominious treatment, by referring himself to the Old Testament predictions of the Messiah. I am hardly used, but I submit, for "the Scriptures must be fulfilled," ver. 49.

chief priests." The case is pointed out as an additional illustration of the looseness with which the term archiereus, or "chief priest," was then employed, and of the fact that the chief priest was only such by pre-eminence.

xiv. 54. Peter was in the court of the palace, sitting and warming himself by the fire. The latter fact is alluded to also by Luke and John. Lange observes, "It is an open hearth, which lights and heats the hall at the same time, at which they warm themselves."

1. See here what a regard Christ had to the Scriptures; he would bear any thing rather than the least jot or tittle of the Word of God should fall to the ground; and as he had an eye to them in his sufferings, so he has in his glory; for what is Christ doing in the government of the world, but fulfilling the Scriptures? 2. See what use we are to make of the Old Testament; we must search for Christ, the true treasure hid in that field: as the history of the New Testament expounds the prophecies of the Old, so the prophecies of the Old Testament illustrate the history of the New.

VIII. All Christ's disciples hereupon deserted him, ver. 50: "They all forsook him and fled." They were very confident they should stick to him; but even good men know not what they will do till they are tried. If it was such a comfort to him as he had lately intimated that they had hitherto continued with him in his lesser trials, Lu. xxii. 28, we may well imagine what a grief it was to him that they deserted him now in the greatest, when they might have done him some service; when he was abused to protect him, and when accused to witness for him. Let not those that suffer for Christ think it strange if they be thus deserted, and if all the herd shun the wounded deer; they are not better than their Master, nor can expect to be better used either by their enemies or by their friends. When St. Paul was in peril, none stood by him, but all men forsook him, 2 Tim. iv. 16.

IX. The noise disturbed the neighbourhood, and some of the neighbours were brought into danger by the riot, ver. 51, 52. This passage of story we have not in any other of the evangelists. Here is an account of "a certain young man," that, as it should seem, was no disciple of Christ, nor, as some have imagined, a servant of the house wherein Christ had eaten the passover, who followed him to see what would become of him; as the sons of the prophets, when they understood that Elijah was to be taken up, went to view afar off, 2 Kin. ii. 7; but some young man that lived near the garden, perhaps in the house to which the garden belonged. Now observe concerning him:

1. How he was frightened out of his bed, to be a spectator of Christ's sufferings. Such a multitude, so armed, and coming with so much fury, and in the dead of the night, and in a quiet village, could not but make a mighty hubbub; this alarmed our young man, who perhaps thought there was some tumult or rising in the city, some uproar among the people, and had the curiosity to go and see what the matter was; and was in such haste to inform himself, that he could not stay to dress himself, but threw a sheet about him, as if he would appear like a walking ghost in grave-clothes, to frighten those who had frightened him, and ran in among the thickest of them with this question, "What is to do here?" and being told, had a mind to see the issue; having, no doubt, heard much of the fame of this Jesus, and therefore, when all his disciples had quitted him, he continued to follow him, desirous to hear what he would say, and see what he would do. Some think his having no other garment but this linen cloth upon his naked body, intimates that he was one of those Jews who made a greater profession of piety than their neighbours; and in token of that, among other instances of austerity and mortification of the body, they used no other clothes but one linen garment, which, though contrived to be modest enough, was thin and cold: but I rather think this was not his constant wear.

2. See how he was frightened into his bed again, when he was in danger of being made a sharer in Christ's sufferings. His own disciples had outrun him; but this young man, having no concern for him, thought he might securely attend him, especially being so far from being armed that he was not so much as clothed; but "the young men," the Roman soldiers, who were called in to assist, "laid hold of him," for all was fish that came to their net. Perhaps they were now vexed at themselves that they had suffered the disciples to run away; and they being got out of their reach, they resolved to seize the first they could lay their hands on; though this young man was perhaps one of the strictest sect of the Jewish church, yet the Roman soldiers made no conscience of abusing him upon this occasion. Finding himself in danger, he "left the linen cloth," by which they had caught hold of him, "and fled away naked." This passage is recorded to shew what a barbarous crew this was that was sent to seize Christ, and what a narrow escape the disciples had of falling into their hands, out of which nothing could have kept them but their Master's care of them: "If ye seek me, let these go their way," Jno. xviii. 8. It also intimates that there is no hold of those who are led by curiosity only, and not by faith and conscience, to follow Christ.

53 And they led Jesus away to the high priest: and with him were assembled all the chief priests and the elders and the scribes. 54 And Peter followed him afar off, even into the palace of the high priest: and he sat with the servants, and warmed himself at the fire. 55 And the chief priests and all the council sought for witness against Jesus to put him to death; and found none. 56 For many bare false witness against him, but their witness agreed not together. 57 And there arose certain, and bare false witness against him, saying, 58 We heard him say, I will destroy this temple that is made with hands, and within three days I will build another made without hands. 59 But neither so did their witness agree together. 60 And the high priest stood up in the midst, and asked Jesus, saying, Answerest thou nothing? what is it which these witness against thee? 61 But he held his peace, and answered nothing. Again the high priest asked him, and said unto him, Art thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed? 62 And Jesus said, I am:

xiv. 58. The expressions "made with hands" and "made without hands" are not given in the corresponding passage of Matthew's Gospel.

xiv. 61. Hebrew writers often call God "the Blessed." This is the only place of the New Testament in which this well-known rabbinical name occurs.

xiv. 63. The word for "clothes" here is different from the one used by Matthew, and is properly applicable to under garments.

and ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven. 63 Then the high priest rent his clothes, and saith, What need we any further witnesses? 64 Ye have heard the blasphemy: what think ye? And they all condemned him to be guilty of death. 65 And some began to spit on him, and to cover his face, and to buffet him, and to say unto him, Prophecy: and the servants did strike him with the palms of their hands.

We have here Christ's arraignment, trial, conviction, and condemnation, in the ecclesiastical court, before the great Sanhedrim, of which the high priest was president, or judge of the court; the same Caiaphas that had lately adjudged it expedient he should be put to death, guilty or not guilty, Jno. xi. 50; and therefore might justly be excepted against as partial.

I. Christ was hurried away to his house; his palace it is called, such state did he live in; and there, though in the dead of the night, "all the chief priests, and elders, and scribes," that were in the secret, "were assembled," ready to receive the prey; so sure were they of it.

II. Peter followed at a distance; such a degree of cowardice was his late courage dwindled into, ver. 54; but when he came to the chief priest's palace he sneakingly went "and sat with the servants," that he might not be suspected to belong to Christ. The high priest's fireside was no proper place, nor his servants proper company for Peter, but it was his entrance into a temptation.

III. Great diligence was used to procure, for love or money, false witnesses against Christ. They had seized him as a malefactor, and now they had him they had no indictment to prefer against him; no crime to lay to his charge; but they "sought for witness against him," pumped some with ensnaring questions, offered bribes to others if they would accuse him, and endeavoured to frighten others if they would not, ver. 55, 56. The chief priests and elders were, by the law, intrusted with the prosecuting and punishing of false witnesses, Deu. xix. 16; yet those were now ringleaders in crime that tends to the overthrow of all justice. It is time to cry "Help, Lord," when the physicians of a land are its troublers, and those that should be the conservators of peace and equity are the corrupters of both.

IV. He was at length charged with words spoken some years ago, which, as they were represented, seemed to threaten the temple, which they had made no better than an idol of, ver. 57, 58. But the witnesses to this matter did not agree, ver. 59; for one swore that he said, "I am able to destroy the temple of God, and build it in three days;" so it is in Matthew; the other swore that he said "I will destroy this temple, that is made with hands, and within three days I will build, not it," but "another made without hands;" now these two differ much from each other, οὐκ ἴσθη ἢ μαρτυρία. Their testimony was not sufficient, not equal to the charge of a capital crime; so Dr. Hammond; they did not accuse him of that upon which a sentence of death might be founded; no, not by the utmost stretch of their law.

V. He was urged to be his own accuser, ver. 60. "The high priest stood up" in a heat, and said, "Answerest thou nothing?" This he said under pretence of justice and fair dealing, but really with a design to ensnare him, that they might accuse him, Lu. xi. 53, 54, and xx. 20. We may well imagine with what an air of haughtiness and disdain this proud high priest brought our Lord Jesus to this question: "Come you, the prisoner at the bar, you hear what is sworn against you, what have you now to say for yourself?" pleased to think that He seemed silent who had so often silenced those that picked quarrels with him. Still Christ "answered nothing," that he might set us an example.

I. Of patience under calumnies and false accusations; when we are reviled, let us not revile again, 1 Pet. ii. 22; and, 2. Of prudence; when a man shall be made an offender for a word, Isa. xxix. 21, and our defence made our offence; it is an evil time indeed when the prudent shall keep silence, lest they make ill worse, and commit their cause to him that judgeth righteously. But,

VI. When he was asked whether he was the Christ, he confessed, and denied not, that he was, ver. 61, 62. He asked, "Art thou the Son of the Blessed?" that is, the Son of God; for, as Dr. Hammond observes, The Jews, when they named God, generally added, "blessed for ever; and thence the Blessed is the title of God,—a peculiar title,—and applied to Christ, Rom. ix. 5; and for the proof of his being the Son of God he binds them over to his second coming, "ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power,"—that Son of man that now appears so mean and despicable, whom you see and trample upon, Isa. liii. 2, 3, you shall shortly see and tremble before. Now one would think such a word as this, which our Lord Jesus seems to have spoken with a grandeur and majesty not agreeable to his present appearance, (for through the thickest cloud of his humiliation some rays of glory were still darted forth,) should have startled the court, and at least in the opinion of some of them, should have amounted to a demurrer, or arrest of judgment, and that they should have stayed process till they had considered farther of it. When Paul at the bar reasoned of the judgment to come, the judge trembled and adjourned the trial, Acts xxiv. 25; but these chief priests were so miserably blinded with malice and rage, that like the horse rushing into the battle, they "mocked at fear, and were not affrighted, neither believed they that it was the sound of the trumpet," Job xxxix. 22, 23; and see Job xv. 25, 26.

VII. The high priest, upon this confession of his, convicted him as a blasphemer, ver. 63: "He rent his clothes," χιτῶνας αὐτοῦ; some think the word signifies his pontifical vestments, which for the greater state he had put on, though in the night, upon this occasion. As before, in his enmity to Christ, he said he knew not what, Jno. xi. 51, 52, so now he did he knew not what. If Saul's rending Samuel's mantle was made to signify the rending of the kingdom from him, 1 Sam. xv. 27, 28, much more did Caiaphas's rending his own clothes signify the rending of the priesthood from him, as the rending of the veil at Christ's death signified the throwing of all open. Christ's clothes, even when he was crucified, were kept entire, and not rent; for when the Levitical priesthood was rent in pieces, and done away, "this man, because he continues ever, has an unchangeable priesthood."

VIII. They agreed he was a blasphemer, and as such was guilty of a capital crime, ver. 64. The question seemed to be put fairly "What think ye?" but it was really prejudged, for the high priest had said, "ye have heard the blasphemy." He gave judgment first, who, as president of the court, ought to have voted last. So "they all condemned him to be guilty of death;" what friends he had in the great Sanhedrim did not appear; it is likely they had not notice.

xiv. 66. All the evangelists note the fact that it was a woman who first accused Peter of being a follower of Christ.

xiv. 67. Matthew has here "Jesus, the Galilean." The more precise appellation here is literally "the Nazarene, Jesus." Our translators give the sense.

xiv. 68. The words "I know not, neither understand I what thou sayest" are by some rendered "I know him not," &c., but we prefer our version.

IX. They set themselves to abuse him, and, as the Philistines with Samson, to make sport with him, ver. 65. It should seem some of the priests themselves that had condemned him, so far forgot the dignity as well as duty of their place, and the gravity which became them, that they helped their servants in playing the fool with a condemned prisoner. This they made their diversion, while they waited for the morning to complete their villany. The night of observations (as the passover night was called) they made a merry night of. If they did not think it below them to abuse Christ, shall we think any thing below us by which we may do him honour?

66 And as Peter was beneath in the palace, there cometh one of the maids of the high priest: 67 And when she saw Peter warming himself, she looked upon him, and said, And thou also wast with Jesus of Nazareth. 68 But he denied, saying, I know not, neither understand I what thou sayest. And he went out into the porch; and the cock crew. 69 And a maid saw him again, and began to say to them that stood by, This is one of them. 70 And he denied it again. And a little after, they that stood by said again to Peter, Surely thou art one of them: for thou art a Galilæan, and thy speech agreeth thereto. 71 But he began to curse and to swear, saying, I know not this man of whom ye speak. 72 And the second time the cock crew. And Peter called to mind the word that Jesus said unto him, Before the cock crow twice, thou shalt deny me thrice. And when he thought thereon, he wept.

We have here the story of Peter's denying Christ.

I. It began in keeping at a distance from him. Peter had followed "afar off," ver. 54, and now "was beneath in the palace," at the lower end of the hall. Those that are shy of Christ are in a fair way to deny him; that are shy of attending on holy ordinances, shy of the communion of the faithful, and loath to be seen on the side of despised godliness.

II. It was occasioned by his associating with the high priest's servants, and sitting among them. They that think it dangerous to be in company with Christ's disciples, because thence they may be drawn in to suffer for him, will find it much more dangerous to be in company with his enemies, because there they may be drawn in to sin against him.

III. The temptation was his being charged as a disciple of Christ: "Thou also wast with Jesus of Nazareth," ver. 67; "This is one of them," ver. 69; "for thou art a Galilean," one may know that by thy speaking broad, ver. 70. It doth not appear that he was challenged upon it, or in danger of being prosecuted as a criminal for it, but only bantered upon it, and in danger of being ridiculed as a fool for it. While the chief priests were abusing the Master, the servants were abusing the disciple. Sometimes the cause of Christ seems to fall so much on the losing side that every body has a stone to throw at it, and even the "abjects gather themselves together against" it. When Job was on the dunghill, he was had in derision of those that were the "children of base men," Job xxx. 8. Yet, all things considered, the temptation could not be called formidable; it was only a maid that casually cast her eye upon him, and for aught appears, without design of giving him any trouble, said, "Thou art one of them," to which he needed not to have made any reply, or might have said, "And if I be, I hope that is no treason."

IV. The sin was very great; he denied Christ before men, at a time when he ought to have confessed and owned him, and to have appeared in court a witness for him. Christ had often given notice to his disciples of his own sufferings, yet when they came they were to Peter as great a surprise and terror as if he had never heard of them before. He had often told them that they must suffer for him, must take up their cross and follow him; and yet Peter is so terribly afraid of suffering, upon the very first alarm of it, that he will lie and swear, and do any thing to avoid it. When Christ was admired and flocked after, he could readily own him; but now he is deserted, and despised, and run down, he is ashamed of him, and will own no relation to him.

V. His repentance was very speedy. He repeated his denial thrice, and the third was worst of all, for then he cursed and swore to confirm his denial; and that third blow, which one would think should have stunned him, and knocked him down, startled him and roused him up; then the cock crew the second time, which put him in mind of his Master's words, the warning he had given him, with that particular circumstance of the cock crowing twice, and by recollecting that, he was made sensible of his sin and the aggravations of it; "and when he thought thereon, he wept." Some observe that this evangelist, who wrote as some have thought by St. Peter's direction, speaks as fully of Peter's sin as any of them, but more briefly of his sorrow, which Peter in modesty would not have to be magnified, and because he thought he could never sorrow enough for so great a sin. His repentance here is thus expressed, ἐπιβαλὼν ἑλκυσά, where something must be supplied. "He added to weep," so some, making it a Hebraism: "He wept, and the more he thought of it, the more he wept;" "he continued weeping;" "he flung out and wept;" "burst out into tears;" "threw himself down and wept;" "he covered his face and wept," so some: "Cast his garment about his head that he might not be seen to weep;" "he cast his eyes upon his Master, who turned and looked upon him," so Dr. Hammond supplies it, and it is a probable conjecture. Or, as we understand it, "fixing his mind upon it, he wept." It is not a transient thought of that which is humbling that will suffice, but we must dwell upon it: or, what if this word should mean his laying load upon himself, throwing confusion into his own face; he did as the publican that smote his breast in sorrow for sin; and this amounts to his weeping bitterly.

xiv. 69. According to Matthew, it was another woman who this time saw Peter, but the common reading of Mark here seems to mean that it was the same as before; literally it is, "and the maid, seeing him again." There is some uncertainty as to the true reading, but there is good authority for omitting the word "again," as is done by Tischendorf and other editors. In Luke the word "another" is masculine, but this is not of great importance.

xiv. 70. The words "and thy speech agreeth thereto" do not

CHAPTER XV.

What we read of the sufferings of Christ in the foregoing chapter was but the prologue or introduction, here we have the completing of them. We left him condemned by the chief priests, but they could only shew their teeth, they could not bite. Here we have him, I. Arraigned and accused before Pilate the Roman governor, ver. 1—5. II. Cried out against by the common people at the instigation of the priests, ver. 6—14. III. Condemned to be crucified immediately, ver. 15. IV. Bantered and abused as a mock king by the Roman soldiers, ver. 16—19. V. Led out to the place of execution with all possible ignominy and disgrace, ver. 20—24. VI. Nailed to the cross between two thieves, ver. 25—28. VII. Reviled and abused by all that passed by, ver. 29—32. VIII. Forsaken for a time by his Father, ver. 33—36. IX. Dying and rending the veil, ver. 37, 38. X. Attested and witnessed to by the centurion, and others, ver. 39—41. XI. Buried in the sepulchre of Joseph of Arimathæa, ver. 42—47.

AND straightway in the morning the chief priests held a consultation with the elders and scribes and the whole council, and bound Jesus, and carried him away, and delivered him to Pilate. 2 And Pilate asked him, Art thou the King of the Jews? And he answering said unto him, Thou sayest it. 3 And the chief priests accused him of many things: but he answered nothing. 4 And Pilate asked him again, saying, Answerest thou nothing? behold how many things they witness against thee. 5 But Jesus yet answered nothing; so that Pilate marvelled. 6 Now at that feast he released unto them one prisoner, whomsoever they desired. 7 And there was one named Barabbas, which lay bound with them that had made insurrection with him, who had committed murder in the insurrection. 8 And the multitude crying aloud began to desire him to do as he had ever done unto them. 9 But Pilate answered them, saying, Will ye that I release unto you the King of the Jews? 10 For he knew that the chief priests had delivered him for envy. 11 But the chief priests moved the people, that he should rather release Barabbas unto them. 12 And Pilate answered and said again unto them, What will ye then that I shall do unto him whom ye call the King of the Jews? 13 And they cried out again, Crucify him. 14 Then Pilate said unto them, Why, what evil hath he done? And they cried out the more exceedingly, Crucify him.

Here we have, I. A consultation held by the great Sanhedrim, for the effectual prosecution of our Lord Jesus. They met early in the morning about it, and went into a grand committee, to find out ways and means to get him put to death; they lost no time, but followed their blow in good earnest, lest there should be an "uproar among the people." The unwearied industry of wicked people, in doing that which is evil, should shame us for our backwardness and slothfulness in that which is good. They that war against Christ and thy soul are up early: "How long then wilt thou sleep, O sluggard?"

II. The delivering of him up a prisoner to Pilate; they bound him. He was to be the great sacrifice; and sacrifices must be bound with cords, Ps. cxviii. 27. Christ was bound to make bonds easy to us, and to enable us, as Paul and Silas, to sing in bonds. It is good for us often to remember the bonds of the Lord Jesus, as bound with him who was bound for us. They led him through the streets of Jerusalem, to expose him to contempt, who, whilst he taught in the temple, but a day or two before, was had in veneration; and we may well imagine how miserably he looked, after such a night's usage as he had had; so buffeted, spit upon, and abused. Their delivering him to the Roman power was a type of the ruin of their church, which hereby they merited and brought upon themselves; it signified that the promise, and the covenant, and the oracles of God, and the visible church-state, which were the glory of Israel, and had been so long in their possession, should now be delivered up to the Gentiles. By delivering up the King, they do in effect deliver up the kingdom of God, which is therefore, as it were by their own consent, taken from them, and given to another nation. If they had delivered up Christ to gratify the desires of the Romans, or to satisfy any jealousies of theirs concerning him, it had been another matter; but they voluntarily betrayed Him that was Israel's crown, to them that were Israel's yoke.

III. The examining of him by Pilate upon interrogatories, ver. 2: "Art thou the King of the Jews?" "Dost thou pretend to be so; to be that Messiah whom the Jews expect as a temporal prince?" "Yea," saith Christ, "it is as thou sayest, I am that Messiah; but not such a one as they expect." He is the King that rules and protects his Israel according to the spirit, that are Jews inwardly by the circumcision of the spirit; and the King that will restrain and punish the carnal Jews that continue in unbelief.

IV. The articles of impeachment exhibited against him, and his silence under the charge and accusation. The chief priests forgot the dignity of their place when they turned informers, and did in person accuse Christ of many things, ver. 3, and witness against him, ver. 4. Many of the Old Testament prophets charge the priests of their times with great wickedness, in which well did they prophesy of these priests; see Eze. xxii. 26; Hos. v. 1; vi. 9; Mic. iii. 11; Zeph. iii. 4; Mal. i. 6; ii. 8. The destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans is said to be for the "iniquity of the priests, that shed the blood of the just," Lam. iv. 13. Note, Wicked priests are generally the worst of men. The better any thing is, the worse it is when it is corrupted. Lay persecutors have been generally found more compassionate than ecclesiastics. These priests were very eager and noisy in their accusation; but Christ "answered nothing," ver. 3. When Pilate urged him to clear himself, and was desirous he should, ver. 4, yet still he stood mute, ver. 5. "he answered nothing," which Pilate thought very strange. He gave Pilate a direct answer, ver. 2, but would not answer the prosecutors and witnesses, because the things they alleged were notoriously false, and he knew Pilate himself was convinced they were so. Note, As Christ spoke to admiration, so he kept silence to admiration.

V. The proposal Pilate made to the people to have Jesus released to them, since it was the custom of the feast to grace the solemnity with the release of one prisoner. The people expected and demanded that he should "do as he had ever done to them," ver. 8. It was an ill usage, but they would have it kept up. Now Pilate perceived that the chief priests delivered up Jesus for envy, because he had got such a reputation among the people as eclipsed theirs, ver. 10. It was easy to see, comparing the eagerness of the persecutors with the slenderness of the proofs, that it was not his guilt, but his goodness—not anything mischievous or scandalous, but something meritorious and glorious, that they were provoked at. And therefore, hearing how much he was the darling of the crowd, he thought he might safely appeal from the priests to the people, and that they would be proud of rescuing him out of the priests' hands; and he proposed an expedient for their doing it without danger of an uproar; let them demand him to be released, and Pilate will readily do it, and stop the mouths of the priests with it, that the people insisted upon his release. There was indeed another prisoner, one Barabbas, that had an interest, and would have some votes, but he questioned not but Jesus would outpoll him.

VI. The unanimous, outrageous clamours of the people to have Christ put to death, and particularly to have him crucified. It was a great surprise to Pilate, when he found the people so much under the influence of the priests, that they all agreed to desire that Barabbas might be released, ver. 11. Pilate opposed it all he could, "What will ye that I shall do to him whom ye call the King of the Jews?" "Would not you then have him released too?" ver. 12. "No," say they, "crucify him;" the priests having put that in their mouths, they insist upon it; when Pilate objected, "Why, what evil has he done?" a very material question in such a case, they do not pretend to answer it, but "cried out the more exceedingly," as they were more and more instigated and irritated by the priests, "Crucify him, crucify him." Now the priests, who were very busy dispersing themselves and their creatures among the mob, to keep up the cry, promised themselves that it would influence Pilate two ways to condemn him: 1. It might incline him to believe Christ guilty, when there was so general an outcry against him; Surely, might Pilate think, he must needs be an ill man whom all the world is weary of; he would now conclude he had been misinformed, when he was told what an interest he had in the people, and that the matter was not so. But the priests had hurried on the prosecution with so much expedition, that we may suppose they that were Christ's friends, and would have opposed this cry, were at the other end of the town, and knew nothing of the matter. Note, It has been the common artifice of Satan to put Christ and his religion into an ill name, and so to run them down. When once this sect, as they called it, comes to be "everywhere spoken against," though without cause, then that is looked upon as cause enough to condemn it. But let us judge of persons and things by their merits, and the standard of God's appear in some very early MSS., and are omitted by several critical editors.

xiv. 72. There has been much discussion as to the real meaning of the Greek word rendered "when he thought thereon." In position it corresponds with the "went out" of Matthew and Luke. The Syriac has "and he began to weep." Many have explained it, "he covered" his head, or face; some think it means "he went on" weeping; others suppose it signifies that "he rushed out," or went out hastily; others support our common version, and some adopt the Syriac rendering, which is also that of the Vulgate. Some think the word means that Peter cast his eyes upon the Lord at the moment, and others that "he interrupted," as it were, the crowing of the cock. On the whole, we prefer the opinion that the word refers to Peter's hasty departure.

xv. 1. "The whole council" is the entire Sanhedrim of seventy-one members, all of whom had to be present on certain occasions.

Lord, and not prejudice by common fame and the cry of the country. 2. It might induce him to condemn Christ to please the people, and indeed for fear of displeasing them. Though he was not so weak as to be governed by their opinion to believe him guilty, yet he was so wicked as to be swayed by their outrage to condemn him, though he believed him innocent; induced thereunto by reasons of state, and the wisdom of this world. Our Lord Jesus dying as a sacrifice for the sins of many, he fell a sacrifice to the rage of many.

15 And so Pilate, willing to content the people, released Barabbas unto them, and delivered Jesus, when he had scourged him, to be crucified. 16 And the soldiers led him away into the hall, called Prætorium; and they call together the whole band. 17 And they clothed him with purple, and platted a crown of thorns, and put it about his head, 18 And began to salute him, Hail, King of the Jews! 19 And they smote him on the head with a reed, and did spit upon him, and bowing their knees worshipped him. 20 And when they had mocked him, they took off the purple from him, and put his own clothes on him, and led him out to crucify him. 21 And they compel one Simon a Cyrenian, who passed by, coming out of the country, the father of Alexander and Rufus, to bear his cross.

Here, First, Pilate, to gratify the Jews' malice, delivers Christ to be crucified, ver. 15. "Willing to content the people," "to do enough" for them, so the word is, and make them easy, that he might keep them quiet, he released Barabbas unto them, that was the scandal and plague of their nation, and delivered Jesus to be crucified, who was the glory and blessing of their nation. Though he had scourged him before, hoping that would content them, and then not designing to crucify him, yet he went on to that; for he that could persuade himself to chastise one that was innocent, Lu. xxiii. 16, no wonder he could by degrees persuade himself to crucify him.

Christ was crucified, for that was, 1. A bloody death; and without blood no remission, Heb. ix. 22. "The blood is the life," Gen. ix. 4; it is the vehicle of the animal spirits, which connect the soul and body, so that the exhausting of the blood is the exhausting of the life. Christ was to lay down his life for us, and therefore shed his blood. Blood made atonement for the soul, Lev. xvii. 11; and therefore in every sacrifice of propitiation, special order was given for the pouring out of the blood, and the sprinkling of that before the Lord: now that Christ might answer all these types, he shed his blood. 2. It was a painful death; the pains were exquisite and acute, for death made its assaults upon the vitals by the exterior parts, which are quickest of sense. Christ died so that he might feel himself die, because he was to be both the priest and the sacrifice; so as that he might be active in dying, because he was to "make his soul an offering for sin." Tully calls crucifixion, teterrimum supplicium,—"a most tremendous punishment." Christ would meet death in its greatest terror, and so conquer it. 3. It was a shameful death; the death of slaves and the vilest malefactors; so it was accounted among the Romans; the cross and the shame are put together. God having been injured in his honour by the sin of man, it is in his honour that Christ makes him satisfaction, not only by denying himself in, and divesting himself of, the honours due to his Divine nature for a time, but by submitting to the greatest reproach and ignominy the human nature was capable of being loaded with. Yet this was not the worst. 4. It was a cursed death; thus it was branded by the Jewish law, Deu. xxi. 23, "He that is hanged is accursed of God;" is under a particular mark of God's displeasure. It was the death that Saul's sons were put to, when the guilt of their father's bloody house was to be expiated, 2 Sam. xxi. 6; Haman and his sons were hanged, Est. vii. 10; ix. 13. We do not read of any of the prophets of the Old Testament that were hanged; but now Christ has submitted to be hanged upon a tree, the reproach and curse of that kind of death is quite rolled away, so that it ought not to be any hindrance to the comfort of those who die either innocently or penitently, nor any diminution from, but rather an addition to, the glory of those who die martyrs for Christ, to be, as he was, hanged upon a tree.

Secondly, Pilate, to gratify the gay humour of his Roman soldiers, delivered him to them to be abused and spitefully treated, while they were preparing for the execution. They called together the whole regiment that was then in waiting, and they went into an inner hall, where they ignominiously abused our Lord Jesus as a King, just as, in the high priest's hall, his servants had ignominiously abused him as a Prophet and Saviour. 1. Do kings use to wear robes of purple or scarlet? "They clothed him with purple." This abuse done to Christ in his apparel should be an intimation to Christians not to make the putting on of apparel their adorning, 1 Pet. iii. 4. Shall a purple or scarlet robe be matter of pride to a Christian, which was matter of reproach and shame to Christ? 2. Do kings wear crowns? They "platted a crown of thorns, and put it on his head." A crown of straw or rushes would have been banter enough, but this was pain also. He wore the crown of thorns which we had deserved, that we might wear the crown of glory which he merited. Let us be taught by these thorns, as Gideon taught the men of Succoth, to hate sin, and be uneasy under them, and to be in love with Jesus Christ, who is here a lily among thorns. If we be at any time afflicted with "a thorn in the flesh," let it be our comfort that our great High Priest is touched with the feeling of our infirmities, having himself known what thorns in the flesh meant. 3. Are kings attended with the acclamations of their subjects? "O king, live for ever!" that also is mimicked; they saluted him with, "Hail, King of the Jews;" such a prince and such a people, even good enough for one another. 4. Kings use to have sceptres put into their hand, marks of dominion, as the crown is of dignity; and to resemble that they put a reed in his right hand. Those who despise the authority of the Lord Jesus, as not to be observed and obeyed, that regard not either the precepts of his word or the threatenings of his wrath, do in effect put a reed in his hand; nay, and, as these here, smite him on the head with it; such is the indignity they do him. 5. Subjects, when they swear allegiance, were wont to kiss their sovereign; and this they offered to do, but instead of that spit upon him. 6. Kings used to be addressed upon the knee, and this also they brought into the jest; they bowed the knee and worshipped him; this they did in scorn, to make themselves and one another laugh. We were by sin become liable to everlasting shame and contempt, to deliver us from which our Lord Jesus submitted to this shame and contempt for us. He was thus mocked, not in his own clothes, but in another's, to signify that he suffered not for his own sin; the crime was ours, the shame his. Those who pretend subjection to Christ, but at the same time give themselves up to the service of the world and the flesh, do in effect the same that they did who bowed the knee to him in mockery, and abused him with, "Hail, King of the Jews;" when they said, "We have no king but Cæsar." Those that bow the knee to Christ, but do not bow the soul, that "draw nigh to him with their mouths, and honour him with their lips, but their hearts are far from him," put the same affront upon him that these here did.

Thirdly, The soldiers, at the hour appointed, led him away from Pilate's judgment hall to the place of execution, ver. 20, as a sheep to the slaughter; "he was led forth with the workers of iniquity," though he did no sin. But lest his death under the load of his cross, which he was to carry, should prevent the farther cruelties they intended, they compelled one Simon of Cyrene to carry his cross for him: he "passed by, coming out of the country," or out of the fields, not thinking of any such matter. Note, We must not think it strange, if crosses come upon us suddenly, and we be surprised by them. The cross was a very troublesome, unwieldy load, but he that carried it a few minutes had the honour to have his name upon record in the book of God, though otherwise an obscure person; so that wherever this Gospel is preached there shall this be told for a memorial of him; so, though "no affliction," no cross, "for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous," yet afterwards it yields "a crown of glory" to them that are exercised thereby.

22 And they bring him unto the place Golgotha, which is, being interpreted, The place of a skull. 23 And they gave him to drink wine mingled with myrrh: but he received it not. 24 And when they had crucified him, they parted his garments, casting lots upon them, what every man should take. 25 And it was the third hour, and they crucified him. 26 And the superscription of his accusation was written over, THE KING OF THE JEWS. 27 And with him they crucify two thieves; the one on his right hand, and the other on his left. 28 And the scripture was fulfilled, which saith, And he was numbered with the transgressors. 29 And they that passed by railed on him, wagging their heads, and saying, Ah, thou that destroyest the temple, and buildest it in three days, 30 Save thyself, and come down from the cross. 31 Likewise also the chief priests mocking said among themselves with the scribes, He saved others; himself he cannot save. 32 Let Christ the King of Israel descend now from the cross, that we may see and believe. And they that were crucified with him reviled him.

xv. 5. For "yet answered nothing" we may translate "no longer answered anything." Jesus had already made one reply (verse 2).

xv. 6. The words rendered "at that feast" rather mean "during the feast," or, more precisely, "during a feast." Hence the Syriac and Arabic versions have "at every feast," which is the view of Beza. Lightfoot, however, objects, and says it was only at the Passover.

xv. 7. The details which Mark introduces respecting Barabbas show why Matthew calls him a notable prisoner. He was in prison along with his fellow-insurgents, who had committed murder; but of the sedition in which he was implicated we have no full account. But see Luke xxiii. 19.

xv. 8. This verse, which states a fact peculiar to Mark, shows that the governor had been in the habit of freeing prisoners at their request on certain occasions. While they rejected Jesus very

We have here the crucifixion of our Lord Jesus.

First. The place where he was crucified; it was called Golgotha, 'the place of a skull;' some think, because of the heads of malefactors that were there cut off; it was the common place of execution, as Tyburn for he was in all respects numbered with the transgressors. I know not how to give any credit to it, but divers of the ancients mention it as a current tradition, that in this place our first father, Adam, was buried; and they think it highly congruous that there Christ should be crucified: "for as in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive." Tertullian, Origen, Chrysostom, and Epiphanius (great names) take notice of it; nay, Cyprian adds, creditur a piis,—"many good people believe" that the blood of Christ crucified did trickle down upon the skull of Adam, who was buried in the same place. Something more credible is the tradition that this mount Calvary was "that mountain in the land of Moriah" (and the land of Moriah it is certain it was, for so the country about Jerusalem was called,) on which Isaac was to be offered, and the ram was offered instead of him; and then Abraham had an eye to this day of Christ, when he called the place "Jehovah-jireh, the Lord will provide," expecting that so it would be seen in the mount of the Lord.

Secondly. The time when he was crucified; it was the third hour, ver. 25. He was brought before Pilate about the sixth hour, Jno. xix. 14, according to the Roman way of reckoning, which John useth, with which ours at this day agrees, that is, at six o'clock in the morning; and then at the third hour, according to the Jews' way of reckoning, that is, about nine of the clock in the morning, or soon after, they nailed him to the cross. Dr. Lightfoot thinks the third hour is here mentioned to intimate an aggravation of the wickedness of the priests, that they were here prosecuting Christ to the death, though it was after the third hour, when they ought to have been attending the service of the temple, and offering the peace offerings, it being the first day of the feast of unleavened bread, when there was to be a holy convocation. At that very time, when they should have been, according to the duty of their place, presiding in the public devotions, were they here venting their malice against the Lord Jesus; yet these were the men that seemed so zealous for the temple, and condemned Christ for speaking against it. Note, There are many who pretend to be for the church, who yet care not how seldom they go to church.

Thirdly. The indignities that were done him when he was nailed to the cross; as if that had not been ignominious enough, they added several things to the ignominy of it.

1. It being the custom to give wine to persons that were to be put to death, they mingled his with myrrh, which was bitter, and made it nauseous; he tasted it, but would not drink it; was willing to admit the bitterness of it, but not the benefit of it.

2. The garments of those that were crucified being, as with us, the executioners' fee, the soldiers cast lots upon his garments, ver. 24, threw dice (as our soldiers used to do upon a drum-head) for them; so making themselves merry with his misery, and sitting at their sport while he was hanging in pain.

3. They set a superscription over his head, by which they intended to reproach him, but really did him both justice and honour, "The King of the Jews" ver. 26. Here was no crime alleged, but his sovereignty owned. Perhaps Pilate meant to cast disgrace upon Christ, as a baffled king, or upon the Jews, who, by their importunity, had forced him, against his conscience, to condemn Christ, as a people that deserved no better a king than he seemed to be. However, God intended it to be the proclaiming even of Christ upon the cross the King of Israel; though Pilate knew not what he wrote, no more than Caiaphas what he said, Jno. xi. 51. Christ crucified is King of his church, his spiritual Israel; and even then, when he hung on the cross, he was like a king conquering his and his people's enemies, and triumphing over them, Col. ii. 15. Now he was writing his laws in his own blood, and preparing his favours for his subjects. Whenever we look unto Christ crucified we must remember the inscription over his head, that he is a king, and must give up ourselves to be his subjects, as Israelites indeed.

4. They crucified two thieves with him, "one on his right hand, the other on his left," and he in the midst, as the worst of the three, ver. 27; so great a degree of dishonour did they hereby intend him. And no doubt it gave him disturbance too. Some that have been imprisoned in the common jails for the testimony of Jesus, have complained of the company of cursing, swearing prisoners, more than of any other of the grievances of their prison. Now in the midst of such our Lord Jesus was crucified. While he lived he had, as there was occasion, associated with sinners to do them good; and now, when he died, he was, for the same purpose, joined with them; for he came into the world, and went out of it, to save sinners, even the chief. But this evangelist takes particular notice of the fulfilling of the Scriptures in it, ver. 28. In that famous prediction of Christ's sufferings, Isa. liii. 12, it was foretold that he should be "numbered with the transgressors," because he was made sin for us.

5. The spectators, that is, the generality of them, instead of condoling his misery, added to it, by insulting over him. Surely never was such an instance of barbarous inhumanity towards the vilest malefactor; but thus the devil shewed the utmost rage against him, and thus he submitted to the greatest dishonours that could be done him.

1st. Even "they that passed by," that were no way concerned, yet "railed on him," ver. 29. If their hearts were so hardened that their compassions were not moved with such a spectacle, yet they should have thought it enough to have their curiosity gratified, but that will not serve; as if they were not only divested of all humanity, but were devils in human shape, they taunted him, and expressed themselves with the utmost detestation of him, and indignation at him, and shot thick at him their arrows, even bitter words. The chief priests, no doubt, put these sarcasms into their mouths: "Thou that destroyest the temple, and buildest it in three days, now," if thou canst, "save thyself, and come down from the cross." They triumph as if, now they had got him to the cross, there were no danger of his destroying the temple; whereas the temple of which he spoke he was now destroying, and did within three days build it up; and the temple of which they spake he did, by men that were his sword and his hand, destroy not many years after. When secure sinners think the danger is over, it is then most ready to seize them: the day of the Lord comes as a thief upon those that deny his coming, and say, "Where is the promise of it?" much more upon those that defy his coming, and say, "Let him make speed, and hasten his work."

2nd. Even the chief priests, who, being taken from among men, and ordained for men, should have compassion even on those that are out of the way, should be tender of those that are suffering and dying, Heb. v. 1, 2; yet they poured vinegar instead of oil into his wounds, they talked to the grief of him whom God had smitten, Ps. lxi. 26; they mocked him; they said, "He saved others," healed and helped them, but now it appears it was not by his own power, for "himself he cannot save." They challenge him to come down from the cross if he could, ver. 32. Let them but see that, and they would believe; whereas they would not believe when he gave them a more convincing sign than that, when he came up from the grave. These chief priests, one would think, might now have found themselves other work to do: if they would not go to do their duty in the temple, yet they might have been employed in an office not foreign to their profession; though they would not offer any counsel or comfort to the Lord Jesus, yet they might have given some help to the thieves in their dying moments; (the monks and priests in popish countries are very officious about criminals broken upon the wheel, a death much like that of the cross;) but they did not think that their business.

3rd. Even they that were crucified with him reviled him, ver. 32; one of them did, so wretchedly was his heart hardened even in the depth of misery, and at the door of eternity.

33 And when the sixth hour was come, there was darkness over the whole land until the ninth hour. 34 And at the ninth hour Jesus cried with a loud voice, saying, Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani? which is, being interpreted, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? 35 And some of them that stood by, when they heard it, said, Behold, he calleth Elias. 36 And one ran and filled a sponge full of vinegar, and put it on a reed, and gave him to drink, saying, Let alone; let us see whether Elias will come to take him down. 37 And Jesus cried with a loud voice, and gave up the ghost. 38 And the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom. 39 And when the centurion, which stood over against him, saw that he so cried out, and gave up the ghost, he said, Truly this man was the Son of God. 40 There were also women looking on afar off: among whom was Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James the less and of Joseph, and Salome; 41 (Who also, when he was in Galilee, followed him, and ministered unto him;) and many other women which came up with him unto Jerusalem.

Here we have an account of Christ's dying, how his enemies abused him, and God honoured him at his death.

First. There was a thick "darkness over the whole land" (some think over the whole earth) for three hours, from noon till three of the clock. Now the Scripture was fulfilled, Am. viii. 9: "I will cause the sun to go down at noon, and will darken the earth in the clear day;" and Jer. xv. 9, "Her sun is gone down while it was yet day." The Jews had often demanded of Christ a sign from heaven; and now they had one, but such a one as signified the blinding of their eyes. It was a sign of the darkness that was come, and coming, upon the Jewish church and nation. They were doing their utmost to extinguish the Sun of Righteousness, which was now setting, and the rising again of which they would never own; and what then might be expected among them but a worse than Egyptian darkness? This intimated to them that the things which belonged to their peace were now hid from their eyes, and that the day of the Lord was at hand, which should be to them a "day of darkness and gloominess," Joel ii. 1, 2. It was the power of darkness they were now under, the works of darkness they were now doing, and such as this should their doom justly be who "loved darkness rather than light."

Secondly. Towards the close of this darkness our Lord Jesus, in the agony of his soul, cried out, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" ver. 34. The darkness signified the present cloud which the human soul of Christ was under when he was making it an offering for sin. Mr. Fox, in his Acts and Monuments, vol. iii. p. 160, tells of one Mr. Hunter, a martyr in Queen Mary's time, that, being fastened to the stake to be burnt, he put up this short prayer, 'Son of God, shine upon me;' and immediately the sun in the firmament shone out of a dark cloud so full in his face, that he was forced to look another way, which was very comfortable to him. But our Lord Jesus, on the contrary, was denied the light of the sun when he was in his sufferings, to signify the withdrawing of the light of God's countenance; and this he complained of more than any thing: he did not complain of his disciples forsaking him, but of his Father's; 1. Because this wounded his spirit; and that is a thing hard to bear, Pr. xviii. 14. This brought the waters into his soul, Ps. lxi. 1-3. 2. Because in this especially he was made sin for us; our iniquities had deserved indignation and wrath upon the soul, Rom. ii. 7; and therefore Christ, being made a sacrifice, underwent as much of it as he was capable of; and it could not but bear hard indeed upon him who had lain in the bosom of the Father from eternity, and was always his delight. These symptoms of Divine wrath which Christ was under in his sufferings, were like that fire from heaven, which had been sent sometimes in extraordinary cases, to consume the sacrifices, as Lev. ix. 24; 2 Chr. vii. 1; 1 Kin. xviii. 38; and it was always a token of God's acceptance: the fire that should have fallen upon the sinner, if God had not been pacified, fell upon the sacrifice, as a token that he was so; therefore it now fell upon Christ, and extorted from him this loud and bitter cry. When Paul was to be offered as a sacrifice for the service of saints, he could joy and rejoice, Phil. ii. 17; but it is another thing to be offered as a sacrifice for the sins of sinners. Now at the sixth hour, and so to the ninth, the sun was darkened by an extraordinary eclipse; and if it be true, as some astronomers compute, that in the evening of this day on which Christ died there was an eclipse of the moon that was natural and expected, in which seven digits of the moon were darkened, and it continued from five o'clock till seven, it is remarkable, and yet farther significant of the darkness of the time that then was; when the sun shall be darkened, the moon also shall not give her light.

much on the plea of loyalty, they selected the representative of disloyalty and disorder.

xv. 16. "The hall, which is the pretorium," as the Greek has it, was an open court. In Matt. xxvii. 27 the word "pretorium" is translated "the common hall." The word "pretorium" is commonly used of the palace at Jerusalem, where the Roman procurators resided when they visited Jerusalem, but here it is best understood of that court of the palace where the procurator's guards were stationed when on duty. When the word refers to other cities, it is, of course, with a different application (Acts xxi. 35, Phil. i. 13).

xv. 17. What Matthew calls "scarlet" Mark here calls "purple." The vague use of certain words is common, and causes no difficulty.

xv. 21. The fact that this Simon was a Cyrenian is observed by Luke. Cyrene was in Northern Africa, and much frequented by Jews. This Simon was most probably a Jew, as his name suggests. For other Thirdly. Christ's prayer was bantered by them that stood by, ver. 35, 36. Because he cried, "Eli, Eli," or, as Mark has it, according to the Syriac dialect, "Eloi, Eloi," they said, "He calls for Elias," though they knew very well what he said, and what it signified, "My God, my God." Thus did they represent him as praying to saints, either because he had abandoned God, or God had abandoned him; and whereby they would make him more and more odious to the people. One of them filled a sponge with vinegar, and reached it up to him upon a reed; let him cool his mouth with that, it was drink good enough for him, ver. 36. This was intended for a farther affront and abuse to him; and whoever it was that checked him who did it, did but add to the reproach: "Let him alone," he has called for Elias; "let us see whether Elias will come to take him down;" and if not, we may conclude that he also hath abandoned him.

Fourthly. Christ did again "cry with a loud voice," and so "gave up the ghost," ver. 37. He was now commending his soul into his Father's hands; and though God is not moved with any bodily exercise, yet this loud voice signified that great strength and ardency of affection wherewith he did it, to teach us, in every thing wherein we have to do with God, to put forth our utmost vigour, and to perform all the duties of religion, particularly that of self-resignation, with our whole heart and our whole soul; and then, though speech fails, that we cannot cry with a loud voice, as Christ did, yet if God be the strength of the heart, that will not fail. Christ was really and truly dead, for he gave up the ghost; his human soul departed to the world of spirits, and left his body a breathless clod of clay.

Fifthly. Just at that instant that Christ died upon mount Calvary, "the veil of the temple was rent in twain, from the top to the bottom," ver. 38. This spoke a great deal, 1. Of terror to the unbelieving Jews, for it was a presage of the utter destruction of their church and nation, which followed not long after; it was like the cutting asunder of the staff of beauty, for this veil was exceeding splendid and glorious, Ex. xxvi. 31; and that was done at the same time when they gave for his price "thirty pieces of silver," Zec. xi. 10, 12, to "break the covenant which he had made with that people." Now it was time to cry, "Ichabod, the glory is departed from Israel." Some think that story which Josephus relates of the temple door opening of his own accord with that voice, "Let us depart hence," some years before the destruction of Jerusalem, is the same with this here; but that is not probable; however this had the same signification, according to that, Hos. v. 14, "I will tear and go away." 2. It speaks a deal of comfort to all believing Christians, for it signified the consecrating and laying open to us "a new and living way into the Holiest by the blood of Jesus."

Sixthly. The centurion who commanded that detachment which had the oversight of the execution was convinced, and confessed that this Jesus was the Son of God, ver. 39. One thing that satisfied him was, "that he so cried out and gave up the ghost." That one who was ready to give up the ghost should be able to cry out so was very surprising. Of all the sad spectacles of this kind, he never observed the like; and that one who had strength to cry so loud, should yet immediately give up the ghost, this also made him wonder, and he said, to the honour of Christ, and the shame of those who abused him, "Truly this man was the Son of God." But what reason had he to say so? I answer, 1. He had reason to say that he suffered unjustly, and had a great deal of wrong done him. Note, He suffered for saying he was the Son of God; and it was true he did say so, so that if he suffered unjustly, as it was plain by all the circumstances of his sufferings he did, then what he said was true, and he was indeed the Son of God. 2. He had reason to say that he was a favourite of Heaven, and one for whom the Almighty Power was particularly engaged, seeing how Heaven did him honour at his death, and frowned upon his persecutors. "Surely," thinks he, "this must be some Divine person, highly beloved of God." This he expresseth by such words as speak his eternal generation as God, and his special designation to the office of Mediator, though he meant not so. Our Lord Jesus, even in the depth of his sufferings and humiliation, was the Son of God, and was declared to be so with power.

Sevently. There were some of his friends, the good women especially, that attended him, ver. 40, 41: "There were women looking on afar off." The men durst not be seen at all, the mob was so very outrageous: Currenti cede furor,—"Give way to the raging torrent," they thought was good counsel now. The women durst not come near; but stood at a distance, overwhelmed with grief. Some of these women are here named: Mary Magdalene was one; she had been his patient, and owed all her comfort to his power and goodness, which rescued her out of the possession of seven devils, in gratitude for which she thought she could never do enough for him. "Mary the mother of James the little," Jacobus Parvus, so the word is; probably he was so called because he was like Zaccheus, little of stature. This Mary was the wife of Cleophas, or Alphaeus, and sister to the Virgin Mary. These women had followed Christ from Galilee, though they were not required to attend the feast, as the males were; but it is likely they came in expectation that his temporal kingdom would now shortly be set up, and big with hopes of preferment for themselves and their relations under him. It is plain the mother of Zebedee's children was so, Mat. xx. 21. And now to see Him upon a cross whom they thought to have seen upon a throne, could not but be a great balk to them. Note, Those that follow Christ in expectation of great things in this world by him, and by the profession of his religion, may probably live to see themselves sadly disappointed.

42 And now when the even was come, because it was the preparation, that is, the day before the sabbath, 43 Joseph of Arimathea, an honourable counsellor, which also waited for the kingdom of God, came, and went in boldly unto Pilate, and craved the body of Jesus. 44 And Pilate marvelled if he were already dead: and calling unto him the centurion, he asked him whether he had been any while dead. 45 And when he knew it of the centurion, he gave the body to Joseph. 46 And he bought fine linen, and took him down, and wrapped him in the linen, and laid him in a sepulchre which was hewn out of a rock, and rolled a stone unto the door of the sepulchre. 47 And Mary Magdalene and Mary the mother of Joses beheld where he was laid.

We are here attending the funeral of our Lord Jesus—a solemn, mournful funeral; O that we may by grace be planted in the likeness of it! Observe, First. How the body of Christ was begged. It was, as the dead bodies of malefactors use to be, at the disposal of the government. Those that hurried him to the cross designed he should make "his grave with the wicked," but God designed he should make it "with the rich," Isa. liii. 9, and so he did. We are here told,

1. When the body of Christ was begged, in order to its being buried, and why such haste was made with the funeral: "the even was come," and "it was the preparation, that is, the day before the sabbath," ver. 42. The Jews were more strict in the observation of the sabbath than of any other feast; and therefore, though this day was itself a feast-day, yet they observed it more religiously as the eve of the sabbath, when they prepared their houses and tables for the splendid and joyful solemnizing of the sabbath day. Note, The day before the sabbath should be a day of preparation for the sabbath, not of our houses and tables, but of our hearts, which, as much as possible, should be freed from the cares and business of the world, and fixed and put in frame for the service and enjoyment of God. Such work is to be done, and such advantages gained, on the sabbath day, that it is requisite we should get ready for it a day before; nay, the whole week should be divided between the improvement of the foregoing sabbath, and the preparation for the following sabbath.

2. Who it was that begged the body, and took care for the decent interment of it: it was "Joseph of Arimathea," who is here called "an honourable counsellor," ver. 43; a person of character and distinction, and in an office of public trust; some think in the state, and that he was one of Pilate's privy council; his post rather seems to have been in the church; he was one of the great Sanhedrim of the Jews, or one of the high priest's council. He was εὐχρίστου Βουλεύτης, a counsellor that carried himself in his place as did become him. Those are truly honourable, and those only, in places of power and trust, that make conscience of their duty, and whose deportment is agreeable to their preferment. But here is a more shining character put upon him; he was one that "waited for the kingdom of God," the kingdom of grace on earth, and of glory in heaven; the kingdom of the Messiah. Note, Those who wait for the kingdom of God, and hope for an interest in the privileges of it, must shew it by their forwardness to own Christ's cause and interest, even then when it seems to be crushed and run down. Observe, Even among the honourable counsellors there were some, there was one at least, that waited for the kingdom of God, whose faith will condemn the unbelief of all the rest. This man God raised up for this necessary service, when none of Christ's disciples could or durst undertake it, having neither purse, nor interest, nor courage for it. Joseph "went in boldly unto Pilate," though he knew how much it would affront the chief priests, who had loaded him with so much reproach, to see any honour done him, yet he put on courage; perhaps at first he was a little afraid, but τολμήσας, "taking heart on it," he determined to shew this respect to the remains of the Lord Jesus, let the worst come to the worst.

3. What a surprise it was to Pilate to hear that he was dead, perhaps expecting that he would have saved himself, and come down from the cross; especially that he was already dead; that one who seemed to have a more than ordinary vigour should so soon yield to death. Every circumstance of Christ's dying was marvellous, for, from first to last, his name was called Wonderful. Pilate doubted (so some understand it) whether he were yet dead or not, fearing lest he should be imposed upon, and the body should be taken down alive, and recovered; whereas the sentence was, as with us, to hang till the body be dead. He therefore called the centurion, his own officer, and asked him "whether he had been any while dead," ver. 44. Whether it was so long since they perceived any sign of life in him, any breath or motion, that they might conclude he was dead, past recall. The centurion could assure him of this, for he had particularly observed how he gave up the ghost, ver. 39. There was a special providence in it, that Pilate should be so strict in examining this, that there might be no pretence to say he was buried alive, and so to take away the truth of his resurrection; and so fully was this determined, that that objection was never started. Thus the truth of Christ gains confirmation sometimes even from the enemies of it.

Secondly. How the body of Christ was buried. Pilate gave Joseph leave to take down the body, and do what he pleased with it. It was a wonder the chief priests were not too quick for him, and had not first begged the body of Pilate, to expose it, and drag it about the streets; but that remainder of their wrath did God restrain, and gave that invaluable prize to Joseph, who knew how to value it; and the heads of the priests were so influenced that they did not oppose it: Sit divus modo non sit vivus,—"We care not for his being adored, provided he be not revived."

1. Joseph "bought fine linen" to wrap the body in, though in such a case, old linen, that had been worn, might have been thought sufficient. In paying respects to Christ, it becomes us to be generous, and to serve him with the best that can be got, not with that which can be got at the best hand.

2. He took down the body, mangled and macerated as it was, "and wrapped him in the linen," as a treasure of great worth. Our Lord Jesus hath commanded himself to be delivered to us, sacramentally, in the ordinance of the Lord's supper, which we should receive in such a manner as may best express our love to Him who loved us and died for us.

3. He "laid it in a sepulchre" of his own, in a private place. We sometimes find it spoken of in the story of the kings of Judah, as a slur upon the memory of the wicked kings, that they were not buried in the sepulchres of the kings; our Lord Jesus, though he did no evil, but much good, and to him was given the throne of his father David, yet was buried in the graves of the common people; for it was not in this world, but in the other, that his rest was glorious. This sepulchre belonged to Joseph. Abraham, when he had no other possession in the land of Canaan, yet had a burying-place; but Christ died not so much as that. This sepulchre was hewn out of a rock, for Christ died to make the grave a refuge and shelter to the saints; and, being hewn out of a rock, it is a strong refuge: "O that thou wouldst hide me in the grave!" Christ himself is a hiding-place to his people, that is, "as the shadow of a great rock."

4. He "rolled a stone to the door of that sepulchre," for so the manner of the Jews was to bury. When Daniel was taken into the lions' den, a stone was laid to the mouth of it, to keep him in, as here to the door of Christ's sepulchre; but neither of them could keep off the angels' visits to the prisoners.

5. Some of the good women attended the funeral, and "beheld where he was laid," that they might come, after the sabbath, to anoint the dead body, because they had not time to do it now. When Moses, the mediator and lawgiver of the Jewish church, was buried, care was taken that no man should know of his sepulchre, Deut. xxxiv. 6, because the respects of the people towards his person were to die with him; but when our great Mediator and Lawgiver was buried, references to Cyrene and Cyrenians, see Acts ii. 10, vi. 9, xi. 20, xiii. 1. The names of both Alexander and Rufus occur elsewhere in the New Testament, as in Acts xix. 33, Rom. xvi. 13, but whether the persons here named is unknown. From the way in which Mark mentions them, they seem to have been persons of some consideration, perhaps as disciples of Christ.

xv. 25. We cannot agree with those who say that this "third hour" is inconsistent with John xix. 14, where the "sixth hour" is mentioned as the time when Jesus was shown by Pilate. It is supposed by some that, according to John's reckoning, Jesus was crucified much later than other evangelists say, because many things were done between Pilate's consent to the crucifixion and the actual crucifixion. Three hours would not be too long for the intermediate transactions, and this would carry back the "sixth hour" of John to our six in the morning, or not much later. To all this there is an easy answer: during the summer solstice, the sixth hour of the special notice was taken of his sepulchre, because he was to rise again; and the care taken of his body speaks the care which he himself will take concerning his body the church; even then when it seems to be a dead body, and as a valley full of dry bones, it shall be preserved in order to a resurrection; as shall also the dead bodies of the saints, with whose dust there is a covenant in force which shall not be forgotten.

Our meditations on Christ's burial should lead us to think of our own, and should help to make the grave familiar to us, and so to make that bed easy which we must shortly make in the darkness. Frequent thoughts of it would not only take off the dread and terror of it, but quicken us, since the graves are always ready for us, to get ready for the graves, Job xvii. 1

CHAPTER XVI.

In this chapter we have a short account of the resurrection and ascension of the Lord Jesus; and the joys and triumphs which it furnisheth all believers with, will be very acceptable to those who sympathized and suffered with Christ in the foregoing chapters. Here is, I. Christ's resurrection notified by an angel to the women that came to the sepulchre to anoint him ver. 1-8. II. His appearance to Mary Magdalene, and the account she gave of it to the disciples, ver. 9-11. III. His appearance to the two disciples going to Emmaus, and the report they made of it to their brethren, ver. 12, 13. IV. His appearance to the eleven, with the commission he gave them to set up his kingdom in the world, and full instructions and credentials in order therunto, ver. 14-18. V. His ascension into heaven, and the apostles' close application to their work, and God's owning them in it, ver. 19, 20.

AND when the sabbath was past, Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James, and Salome, had bought sweet spices, that they might come and anoint him. 2 And very early in the morning the first day of the week, they came unto the sepulchre at the rising of the sun.

3 And they said among themselves, Who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the sepulchre? 4 And when they looked, they saw that the stone was rolled away: for it was very great. 5 And entering into the sepulchre, they saw a young man sitting on the right side, clothed in a long white garment; and they were affrighted. 6 And he saith unto them, Be not affrighted: Ye seek Jesus of Nazareth, which was crucified: he is risen; he is not here: behold the place where they laid him. 7 But go your way, tell his disciples and Peter that he goeth before you into Galilee: there shall ye see him, as he said unto you. 8 And they went out quickly, and fled from the sepulchre; for they trembled and were amazed: neither said they any thing to any man; for they were afraid.

Never was there such a sabbath since the sabbath was first instituted as this was, which the first words of this chapter tell us was now past; during all this sabbath our Lord Jesus lay in the grave. It was to him a sabbath of rest, but a silent sabbath; it was to his disciples a melancholy sabbath, spent in tears and fears. Never were the sabbath services in the temple such an abomination to God, though they had been often so, as they were now, when the chief priests that presided in them had their hands full of blood, the blood of Christ. Well, this sabbath is over, and the first day of the week is the first day of a new world. We have here,

First. The affectionate visit which the good women that had attended Christ now made to his sepulchre, not a superstitious one, but a pious one. They set out from their lodgings "very early in the morning," at break of day, or sooner; but either they had a long walk, or met with some hindrance, so that it was surprising by that time they got to the sepulchre. They "had bought sweet spices" too, and came not only to bedew the dead body with their tears, for nothing could more renew their grief than this, but to perfume it with their spices, ver. 1. Nicodemus had bought a very large quantity of dry spices, myrrh and aloes, which served to dry the wounds, and dry up the blood, Jno. xix. 39; but these good women did not think that enough, they bought spices, perhaps of another kind, some perfumed oils, to anoint him. Note, The respects which others have shewed to Christ's name should not hinder us from shewing our respects to it.

Secondly. The care they were in about the rolling away of the stone, and the superseding of that care, ver. 3, 4. "They said among themselves," as they were coming along, and now drew near the sepulchre, "Who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the sepulchre? for it was very great," more than they with their united strength could move. They should have thought of this before they came out, and then discretion would have bade them not go, unless they had those to go with them who could do it. And there was another difficulty, much greater than this, to be got over, which they knew nothing of, to wit, a guard of soldiers, set to keep the sepulchre, who, had they come before they were frightened away, would have frightened them away. But their gracious love to Christ carried them to the sepulchre; and see how by that time they came thither both those difficulties were removed, both the stone, which they knew of, and the guard, which they knew not of. "They saw that the stone was rolled away," which was the first thing that amazed them. Note, They who are carried by a holy zeal to seek Christ diligently, will find the difficulties that lie in their way strangely to vanish, and themselves helped over them beyond their expectation.

Thirdly. The assurance that was given them, by an angel, that the Lord Jesus was risen from the dead, and had taken leave of his sepulchre, and had left him there to tell those so who came thither to inquire after him.

1. They entered "into the sepulchre," at least a little way in, and saw the body of Jesus was not there where they left it the other night. He who by his death undertook to pay our debt, in his resurrection took out our acquaintance, for it was his discharge out of prison, and it was a fair and legal discharge, by which it appeared that his satisfaction was accepted to all the purposes for which it was intended, and the matter in dispute was determined by an incontestable evidence that he was the Son of God.

2. "They saw a young man sitting on the right side" of the sepulchre; the angel appeared in the likeness of a man, of "a young man;" for angels, though created in the beginning, grow not old, but are always in the same perfection of beauty and strength, and so shall glorified saints be, when they are as the angels. This angel was "sitting on the right hand" as they went into the sepulchre, "clothed with a long white garment," a garment down to the feet, such as great men were arrayed with. The sight of him might justly have encouraged them, but "they were affrighted." Thus many times that which should be matter of comfort to us, through our own mistakes and misapprehensions, proves a terror to us.

3. He silenceth their fears, by assuring them here was cause enough for triumph, but not for trembling, ver. 6. "He saith to them, Be not affrighted." Note, Angels, as they rejoice in the conversion of sinners, so they do also in the consolation of saints. "Be not affrighted," for,

1st. You are faithful lovers of Jesus Christ, and therefore, instead of being confounded, ought to be comforted. "Ye seek Jesus of Nazareth, which was crucified." Note, The inquiries of believing souls after Christ have a particular regard to him as crucified, 1 Cor. ii. 2, that they may know him and the fellowship of his sufferings. His being lifted up from the earth is that which draws all men unto him. Christ's cross is the ensign to which the Gentiles seek. Observe, he speaks of Jesus as one that was crucified; the thing is past, that scene is over, you must not dwell so much upon the sad circumstances of his crucifixion as to be unapt to believe the joyful news of his resurrection. He was crucified in weakness, yet that doth not hinder but that he may be raised in power, and therefore ye that seek him be not afraid of missing of him; he was crucified, but he is glorified; and the shame of his sufferings is so far from lessening the glory of his exaltation, that that glory perfectly wipes away all the reproach of his sufferings. And therefore after his entrance upon his glory he never drew any veil over his sufferings, nor was shy of having his cross spoken of. The angel here, that proclaims his resurrection, calls him "Jesus that was crucified." He himself owns, Rev. i. 18, "I am he that liveth, and was dead;" and he appears in the midst of the praises of the heavenly host "as a Lamb that had been slain," Rev. v. 6.

2nd. It will therefore be good news to you to hear, that instead of anointing him dead, you may rejoice in him living. "He is risen, he is not here," not dead, but alive again; we cannot as yet shew you him, hereafter you will see him; but you may here see "the place where they laid him," and you see he is gone hence, not stolen either by his enemies or by his friends, but risen.

4. He orders them to give speedy notice of this to his disciples; thus they were made the apostles of the apostles, which was a recompense of their affection and fidelity to him, in attending him on the cross, to the grave, and in the grave. They first came, and were first served; no other of the disciples durst come near his sepulchre, or inquire after him; so little danger was there of their coming by night to steal him away, that none came near him but a few women, who were not able so much as to roll away the stone.

1st. They must tell the disciples that he is risen. It is a dismal time with them, their dear Master is dead, and all their hopes and joys are buried in his grave; they look upon their cause as sunk, and themselves ready to fall an easy prey into the hands of their enemies, so that there remains no more spirit in them; they are perfectly at their wit's end; every one is contriving how to shift for himself. O go quickly to them, saith the angel, tell them their Master is risen; that will put some life and spirit into them, and keep them from sinking into despair. Note, First. Christ is not ashamed to own his poor disciples, no, not now he is in his exalted state; his preferment doth not make him shy of them, for he took early care to have it notified to them. Secondly. Christ is not extreme to mark what they do amiss whose hearts are upright with him. The disciples had very unkindly deserted him, and yet he testified this concern for them. Thirdly. Seasonable comforts shall be sent to those that are lamenting after the Lord Jesus, and he will find a time to manifest himself to them.

2nd. They must be sure to tell Peter. This is particularly taken notice of by this evangelist, who is supposed to have written by Peter's direction. If it were told the disciples, it would be told Peter; for, as a token of his repentance for disowning his Master, he still associated with his disciples; yet he is particularly named, tell Peter; for, First. It will be good news to him, more welcome to him than to any of them, for he is in sorrow for sin, and no tidings can be more welcome to true penitents than to hear of the resurrection of Christ, because he rose again for their justification. Secondly. He will be afraid lest the joy of this good news do not belong to him. Had the angel said only, "Go, tell his disciples," poor Peter would have been ready to sigh and say, "But I doubt I cannot look upon myself as one of them, for I disowned him, and deserve to be disowned by him." To obviate that, "Go to Peter by name, and tell him he shall be as welcome as any of the rest to see him in Galilee." Note, A sight of Christ will be very welcome to a true penitent, and a true penitent shall be very welcome to a sight of Christ, for there is joy in heaven concerning him.

3rd. They must appoint them all, and Peter by name, to give him the meeting in Galilee, "as he said unto you," Mat. xxvi. 32. In their journey down into Galilee, they would have time to recollect themselves, and call to mind what he had often said to them there, that he should suffer and die, and "the third day be raised again;" whereas while they were at Jerusalem, among strangers and enemies, they could not recover themselves from the fright they had been in, nor compose themselves to the due entertainment of better tidings. Note, First. All the meetings between Christ and his disciples are of his own appointing. Secondly. Christ never forgets his appointment, but will be sure to meet his people with the promised blessing in every place where he records his name. Thirdly. In all meetings between Christ and his disciples, he is the most forward; "he goeth before you."

Fourthly. The account which the women did bring of this to the disciples, ver. 8; "they went out quickly, and ran from the sepulchre," to make all the haste they could to the disciples, trembling and amazed. See how much

Roman day in the time of Christ began at about half-past nine a.m. Mark follows the Jewish method, therefore, and calls that the "third hour" which John, according to Roman time, describes as about the "sixth hour." As exact time-keeping is not looked for, this is sufficiently near. There is another explanation, based on a various reading in John xix. 14, where some copies read "third" for "sixth;" but this is very uncertain ground, although the "third hour" is the reading in the Peshito-Syriac, the most ancient version in existence.

xv. 28. The whole of this verse is omitted by the Alexandrian, Vatican, Cambridge, and Sinaitic MSS. It is found, however, in other good MSS., and in the Syriac and Vulgate. Tischendorf and other modern critics are of opinion that it should not be retained in the text.

xv. 32. Translate this, "Let the Christ the King of Israel come down now from the cross," &c. Some connect the first part of the verse with verse 31: "Himself he cannot save; the Christ the King are enemies to ourselves and our own comfort, in not considering and mixing faith with what Christ hath said to us. Christ had often told them that "the third day he would rise again;" had they given that its due notice and credit, they would have come to the sepulchre expecting to have found him risen, and would have received the news of it with a joyful assurance, and not with all this terror and amazement. But being or lured to tell the disciples, because they were to tell it to all the world, they would not tell it to any one else; they shewed not any thing of it to any man that they met by the way, for they were afraid, afraid it was too good news to be true. Note, Our disquieting fears often hinder us from doing that service to Christ, and to the souls of men, which if faith and the joy of faith were strong we might do.

9 Now when Jesus was risen early the first day of the week, he appeared first to Mary Magdalene, out of whom he had cast seven devils. 10 And she went and told them that had been with him, as they mourned and wept. 11 And they, when they had heard that he was alive, and had been seen of her, believed not. 12 After that he appeared in another form unto two of them, as they walked, and went into the country. 13 And they went and told it unto the residue: neither believed they them.

We have here a very short account of two of Christ's appearances, and the little credit which the report of them gained with the disciples.

First. "He appeared to Mary Magdalene," to her first in the garden, which we have a particular narrative of, Jno. xx. 14. It was she "out of whom he had cast seven devils;" much was forgiven her, and much was given her, and done for her, and she loved much; and this honour Christ did her, that she was the first that saw him after his resurrection. The closer we cleave to Christ, the sooner we may expect to see him, and the more to see of him. Now, 1. She brings notice of what she had seen to the disciples, not only to the eleven, but to the rest that followed him, "as they mourned and wept," ver. 10. Now was the time, of which Christ had told them, that they should "mourn and lament," Jno. xvi. 20; and it was an evidence of their great love to Christ, and the deep sense they had of their loss of him. But when their weeping had endured a night or two, comfort returned, as Christ had promised them, "I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice." Better news cannot be brought to disciples in tears than to tell them of Christ's resurrection. And we should study to be comforters to disciples that are mourners, by communicating to them our experiences, and what we have seen of Christ. 2. They could not give credit to the report she brought them. "They heard that he was alive, and had been seen of her." The story was plausible enough, and yet they "believed not!" they would not say that she made the story herself, or designed to deceive them; but they fear she is imposed upon, and it was but a fancy that she saw him. Had they believed the frequent predictions of it from his own mouth, they would not have been now so incredulous of the report of it.

Secondly. He appeared to two of the disciples, "as they went into the country," ver. 12. This refers no doubt to that which is largely related, Lu. xxiv. 13, of what passed between Christ and the two disciples, going to Emmaus. He is here said to have appeared to them in another form, in another dress, than what he usually wore, in the form of a traveller, as in the garden, in such a dress that Mary Magdalene took him for the gardener; but that he had really his own countenance appears by this, that "their eyes were holden that they should not know him," and when that restraint on their eyes was taken off, immediately "they knew him," Lu. xxiv. 16, 31. Now, 1. These two witnesses gave in their testimony to this proof of Christ's resurrection; "they went and told it to the residue," ver. 13; being satisfied themselves, they were desirous to give their brethren the satisfaction they had, that they might be comforted as they were. 2. This did not gain credit with all, "neither believed they them." They suspected that their eyes also deceived them. Now there was a wise providence in it, that the proofs of Christ's resurrection were given in thus gradually, and admitted thus cautiously, that so the assurance with which the apostles preached this doctrine afterwards, when they ventured their all upon it, might be the more satisfying. We have the more reason to believe those who did themselves believe so slowly; had they swallowed it presently, they might have been thought credulous, and their testimony the less to be regarded; but their disbelieving at first, shews that they did not believe it afterwards but upon a full conviction.

14 Afterward he appeared unto the eleven as they sat at meat, and upbraided them with their unbelief and hardness of heart, because they believed not them which had seen him after he was risen. 15 And he said unto them, Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. 16 He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned. 17 And these signs shall follow them that believe; In my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; 18 They shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover.

Here is, I. The conviction which Christ gave his apostles of the truth of his resurrection, ver. 14. He appeared to them himself, when they were all together, "as they sat at meat," which gave him an opportunity to eat and drink with them for their full satisfaction, see Acts x. 41; and still, when he appeared to them, he "upbraided them with their unbelief, and hardness of heart," for even at the general meeting in Galilee "some doubted," as we find Mat. xxviii. 17. Note, The evidences of the truth of the Gospel are so full, that those who receive it not may justly be upbraided with their unbelief; and it is owing not to any weakness or deficiency in the proofs, but to the hardness of the heart, and the senselessness and stupidity of that. Though they had not till now seen him themselves, they were justly blamed, "because they believed not them which had seen him after he was risen;" and perhaps it was owing in part to the pride of their hearts that they did not; for they thought, if indeed he were risen, to whom should he delight to do the honour of shewing himself but to them? And if he pass them by, and shew himself to others first, they cannot believe it is he. Thus many disbelieve the doctrine of Christ because they think it below them to give credit to such as he has chosen to be the witnesses and publishers of it. Observe, It will not suffice for an excuse of our infidelity in the great day, to say we did not see him after he was risen, for we ought to have believed the testimony of those who did see him.

II. The commission which he gave them to set up his kingdom among men by the preaching of his Gospel, the glad tidings of reconciliation to God through a Mediator. Now observe,

First. To whom they were to preach the Gospel. Hitherto they had been sent only to "the lost sheep of the house of Israel," and were forbidden to go into "the way of the Gentiles, or into any city of the Samaritans." But now their commission is enlarged, and they are authorized to "go into all the world," into all parts of the world, the habitable world, and to "preach the Gospel" of Christ "to every creature," to the Gentiles, as well as to the Jews, to every human creature that is capable of receiving it. Inform them concerning Christ; the history of his life, and death, and resurrection; instruct them in the meaning and intention of these, and of the advantages which the children of men have, or may have thereby, and invite them without exception to come and share in them. This is Gospel, let this be preached in all places, to all persons. These eleven men could not themselves preach it to all the world, much less to every creature in it; but they, and the other disciples, seventy in number, with those who should afterwards be added to them, must disperse themselves several ways, and wherever they went, carry the Gospel along with them. They must send others to those places whither they could not go themselves; and, in short, make it the business of their lives to send those glad tidings up and down the world with all possible fidelity and care, not as an amusement or entertainment but as a solemn message from God to men, and appointed means of making men happy. Tell as many as you can, and bid them tell others; it is a message of universal concern, and therefore ought to have a universal welcome, because it gives a universal welcome.

Secondly. What is the summary of the Gospel they are to preach, ver. 16. Set before the world life and death, good and evil. Tell the children of men that they are all in a state of misery and danger, condemned by their Prince, and conquered and enslaved by their enemies. This is supposed in their being saved, which they would not need to be if they were not lost. Now go and tell them, 1. That if they believe the Gospel, and give up themselves to be Christ's disciples; if they renounce the devil, the world, and the flesh, and be devoted to Christ as their prophet, priest, and king, and to God in Christ as their God in covenant, and evidence by their constant adherence to this covenant, their sincerity herein, they shall be saved from the guilt and power of sin; it shall not rule them, it shall not ruin them. He that is a true Christian shall be saved through Christ. Baptism was appointed to be the inaugurating rite by which those that embraced Christ owned him; but it is here put rather for the thing signified than for the sign; for Simon Magus believed and was baptized, yet not saved, Acts viii. 13. Believing with the heart, and confessing with the mouth the Lord Jesus, Rom. x. 9, seems to be much the same with this here; or thus, we must assent to gospel truths, and consent to gospel terms. 2. If they believe not, if they receive not the record God gives concerning his Son, they cannot expect any other way of salvation, but must inevitably perish. They "shall be damned," by the sentence of a despised Gospel, added to that of a broken law. And even this is Gospel; it is good news that nothing else but unbelief shall damn men, which is a sin against the remedy. Dr. Whitby here observes, that they who hence infer "that the infant seed of believers are not capable of baptism, because they cannot believe, must hence also infer that they cannot be saved; faith being here more expressly required to salvation than to baptism; and that in the latter clause baptism is omitted because it is not simply the want of baptism, but the contemptuous neglect of it, which makes men guilty of damnation, otherwise infants might be damned for the mistakes or profaneness of their parents."

Thirdly. What power they should be endowed with for the confirmation of the doctrine they were to preach, ver. 17: "These signs shall follow them that believe;" not that all who believe shall be able to produce these signs, but some, even as many as were employed in propagating the faith, and bringing others to it; for signs are intended for them that believe not: see 2 Cor. xiv. 22. It added much to the glory and evidence of the Gospel that the preachers not only wrought miracles themselves, but conferred upon others a power to work miracles, which power followed some of them that believed wherever they went to preach. They shall do wonders in Christ's name, the same name into which they were baptized, in the virtue of power derived from him, and fetched in by prayer. Some particular signs are mentioned: 1. "They shall cast out devils;" this power was more common among Christians than any other, and lasted longer, as appears by the testimonies of Justin Martyr, Origen, Irenaeus, Tertullian, Minutius Felix, and others, cited by Grotius on this place. 2. "They shall speak with new tongues," which they had never learned or been acquainted with; and this was both a miracle (a miracle upon the mind) for the confirming of the truth of the Gospel, and a means of spreading the Gospel among those nations that had not heard it. It saved the preachers a vast labour in learning the languages; and no doubt they who by miracle were made masters of languages, were complete masters of them, and of all their native elegances which were proper both to instruct and affect, which would very much recommend them and their preaching. 3. "They shall take up serpents." This was fulfilled in Paul, who was not hurt by the viper that fastened on his hand, which was acknowledged a great miracle by the barbarous people, Acts xxviii. 5, 6; they shall be kept unhurt by that generation of vipers among whom they live, and by the malice of the old serpent. 4. If they be compelled by their persecutors to "drink any deadly" poisonous "thing, it shall not hurt them;" of which very thing some instances are found in ecclesiastical history. 5. They shall not only be preserved from hurt themselves, but they shall be enabled to do good to others; "they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover," as multitudes had done by their Master's healing touch. Many of the elders of the church had this power, as appears by Jas. v. 14; where, as an instituted sign of this miraculous healing, they are said to "anoint the sick with oil" in the of Israel. Let him come down now," &c. On the whole we prefer the common pointing.

xv. 34. The Greek letters in "Eloi, Eloi" are doubtless put for the Aramaic "Elohi, Elohi," because the h could not be represented in the Greek. The form employed by Matthew, "Eli, Eli," exactly corresponds with the Hebrew of Ps. xxii. 1, but the "sabachthani," or "shabachthani," belongs to the Aramaic alone.

xv. 39. Here and in verse 37, for "gave up the ghost," we may translate more exactly, "expired." The words for "cried out and" are not in all the MSS.

xv. 42. This verse distinctly defines the day on which our Lord was crucified. The term rendered "preparation," adopted in Latin under the form parasceve, was the afternoon of Friday, and, as the name of Friday, is now common in Greece and Asia Minor, and wherever modern Greek is spoken. The explanation, "that is, the day before the Sabbath," seems to be added for the information of name of the Lord." With what assurance of success might they go about the executing of their commission, when they had such credentials as these to produce!

19 So then after the Lord had spoken unto them, he was received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand of God. 20 And they went forth, and preached every where, the Lord working with them, and confirming the word with signs following. Amen.

Here is, I., Christ welcomed into the upper world, ver. 19: "After the Lord had spoken," what he had to say to his disciples, he went "up into heaven," in a cloud; which we have a particular account of, Acts i. 9; and he had not only an admission, but an abundant entrance into his kingdom there; he was received up—received in state with loud acclamations of the heavenly hosts; "and he sat on the right hand of God;" sitting in a posture of rest; for now he had finished his work; and a posture of rule, for now he took possession of his kingdom; "he sat on the right hand of God," which notes the sovereign dignity he is advanced to, and the universal agency he is intrusted with. Whatever God doth concerning us, gives to us, or accepts from us, it is by his Son. Now he is glorified with the glory he had before the world.

II. Christ welcomed in this lower world. His being "believed on in the world, and received up into glory," are put together, 1 Tim. iii. 16. 1. We have here the apostles working diligently for him; "they went forth and preached every where," far and near; though the doctrine they preached was spiritual and heavenly, and directly contrary to the spirit and genius of the world, though it met with abundance of opposition, and was utterly destitute of all secular supports and advantages, yet the preachers of it were neither afraid nor ashamed; they were so industrious in spreading the Gospel, that within a few years the sound of it went forth into the ends of the earth, Rom. x. 18. 2. We have here "God working" effectually "with them," to make their labours successful, by "confirming the Word with signs following," partly by the miracles that were wrought upon the bodies of people, which were Divine seals to the Christian doctrine, and partly by the influence it had upon the minds of the people, through the operation of the Spirit of God; see Heb. ii. 4. These were properly signs following the Word,—the reformation of the world, the destruction of idolatry, the conversion of sinners, the comfort of saints; and these signs still follow it; and that they may do so more and more, for the honour of Christ, and the good of mankind, the evangelist prays, and teaches us to say Amen. Father in heaven, thus let thy name be hallowed, and let thy kingdom come.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES TO THE BOOK OF ST. MARK.

CHAP. I.—2. As it is written in the prophets. He mentions prophets, without specifying them. The places are found in Mal. iii. 1, and Isa. xl. 3; see Commentary on parallel passage in Matth. The Spirit driveth him. The word driveth does not mean that he was compelled forcibly against his will to go there, but that he was inclined thither by the Spirit, or was led there. The Spirit of God, for important purposes, caused him to go. Compare Mal. ix. 25, where the same word is used in the original. "And when they were all put forth," in Greek, all driven out. 13. And the angels ministered to him. From Lu. iv. 2, we learn that in those days he did eat nothing. When Mark says, therefore, that the angels ministered to him, it means, after the days of temptation had expired, as is said by Mat. iv. 11. 24. Let us alone. Though but one impure spirit is mentioned as possessing this man, yet that spirit speaks also in the name of others. They were leagued together, and thus one knew that if he was punished, others would share the same fate. What have we to do with thee. This seems to mean, Have we injured thee? or, we have done nothing to injure thee. See 1 Kin. xvii. 18. By this the spirit meant to say, that if Jesus cast him out, he would interfere unwarrantably. But this was untrue. The possession of the man was a direct assault on God and his works. Jesus came to destroy the works of the devil, and he had a right, therefore, to liberate the captive, and to punish him who had possessed him. So Satan still considers it an infringement of his rights, when God frees a sinner from bondage, and destroys his influence over the soul. So he still pleads to be let alone, and to be suffered to lead men captive at his will. 35. And departed into a solitary place, and there prayed. Here observe, 1. That the Saviour, though perfectly holy, regarded the duty of secret prayer as of great importance. 2. That he sought a solitary place for it—far away from the world, and even his disciples. 3. That it was early in the morning, always the best time, and a time when it should never be omitted. 4. If Jesus prayed, how much more important for us! If he did it in the morning, how much more important for us, before the world gets possession of our thoughts, before Satan fills us with unholy feelings; when we rise fresh from beds of repose, and while the world around us is still! David also thus prayed, Psa. v. 3. In short, it will be found true universally, that the religious enjoyment through the day will be according to the state of the heart in the morning, and can therefore be measured by our faithfulness in early secret prayer.

CHAP. II.—23. To pluck the ears of corn. They were hungry, see Mat., they therefore gathered the wheat, or barley, as they walked, and rubbed it in their hands to shell it, and thus to satisfy their wants. Though our Lord was with them, and though he had all things at his command, yet he permitted them to resort to this method to meet their necessity. When Jesus thus with his disciples suffered them to be poor, we may learn that poverty is not disgraceful; that God often permits it for the good of his people, and that he will take care in some way to supply their wants. It was lawful thus to provide for them. Though the property belonged to another, yet the Mosaic law allowed the poor to satisfy their wants when hungry; see Deu. xxiii. 25. 27. The sabbath was made for man. For his rest from toil, his rest from the cares and anxieties of the world, to give an opportunity to call off his attention from earthly concerns, and to direct it to the affairs of eternity. It was a kind provision for man, that he might refresh his body by relaxing his labours; that he might have undisturbed time to seek the consolations of religion to cheer him in the anxieties and sorrows of a troubled world; and that he might render to God that homage which is most justly due to him as the Creator, Preserver, Benefactor, and Redeemer of the world. And it is easily capable of proof, that no institution has been more signally blessed to man's welfare than the Christian sabbath. "To that we owe more than to any thing else, the peace and order of a civilized community." Where there is no sabbath, there is ignorance, vice, disorder, and crime. On that holy day, the poor, and the ignorant, as well as the learned, have undisturbed time to learn the requirements of religion, the nature of morals, the laws of God, and the way of salvation. On that day, man may offer his praises to the great Giver of all good, and in the sanctuary seek the blessing of Him whose favour is life. Where that day is observed in any manner as it should be, order prevails, morals are promoted, the poor are elevated in their condition, vice flies away, and the community puts on the appearance of neatness, industry, morality, and religion. The sabbath was, therefore, pre-eminently intended for man's welfare, and the best interests of mankind demand that it should be sacredly regarded as an appointment of merciful Heaven, intended for our best good; and, where improved aright, infallibly resulting in our temporal and eternal peace. Not man for the sabbath. Man was made first, and then the sabbath was appointed for his welfare, Gen. i. 11. The sabbath was not first made or contemplated, and then the man made with reference to that. Since, therefore, the sabbath was intended for man's real good, the law respecting it must not be interpreted so as to oppose his real welfare. It must be explained in consistency with a proper attention to the duties of mercy to the poor and the sick, and to those in peril. It must be, however, in accordance with man's real good on the whole, and with the law of God. The law of God contemplates man's real good on the whole; and we have no right, under the plea that the sabbath was made for man, to do any thing contrary to what the law of God admits. It would not be for our real good, but for our real and eternal injury, to devote the sabbath to vice, to labour, or to amusement. 28. Therefore the Son of man, &c. He had a right to direct the manner of its observance—undoubted proof that he is divine. See Note on Lu. vi. 5.

CHAP. III.—4. Or to do evil? to save life or to kill? It seems to have been a maxim with the Jews, that not to do good when we have an opportunity was to do evil; not to save life, was to kill, or to be guilty of murder. If one has an opportunity of saving a man's life when he is in danger, and does it not, he is evidently guilty of his death. On this principle the Lord puts this question to the Jews,—whether it was better for him, having the power to heal this man, to do it, or to allow him to remain in this suffering condition; and he illustrates it by an example, shewing that, in a matter of much less importance—than respecting their cattle—they would do on the sabbath just as he would, if he should heal this man. The same remark applies to all opportunities of doing good. "The ability to do good imposes an obligation to do it."—Cotton Mather. He who has the means of feeding the hungry, and clothing the naked, and instructing the ignorant, and sending the Gospel to the destitute, and who does it not, is guilty, for he is practically doing evil; he is suffering evils to exist which he might remove. So the wicked will be condemned, in the day of judgment, because they did it not, Mat. xxv. 45. If this be true, what an obligation rests on the rich to do good! 5. Hardness of their hearts. The heart, figuratively the seat of feeling or affection, is said to be tender, when it is easily affected by the sufferings of others; by our own sin and danger; by the love and commands of God; and especially when it is susceptible of feeling on the great subjects pertaining to our eternal interests. It is hard when nothing effectually moves it, when a man is insensible to the danger of his own condition, and the commands, the gracious invitations, and the threatenings of God. It is most tender in youth, or when we have committed fewest sins. It is made harder by indulgence in sin, by long resisting the offers of life, or by opposing any great and affecting appeals which God may make to us by his Spirit or providence, by affliction, or by a revival of religion. Hence it is that the most favourable period for securing an interest in Christ, or for becoming indeed a Christian, is in youth, the first, the tenderest, the best days of life; nay, in the days of childhood, in the sabbath school, God may be found, and the soul prepared to die. But let it ever be remembered that in all men, and at every period of life, the heart is so hard that the power of God Almighty is necessary to subdue and soften it; and blessed be his name for the gracious promise to exercise that power in us, so that the stony heart may be taken away, and the heart of flesh (or, as above, the feeling heart) be given. See Eze. xxxvi. 26, where God reveals this gracious promise, whilst, in the 37th verse, he makes known man's duty in regard to it, which is prayer for the fulfilment of that promise. Then he says, "I will do it for them," that is, "I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you an heart of flesh—and ye shall be my people, and I will be your God." If, after this assurance from the faithful and omnipotent God, any one dies with a hard heart, his blood surely will be upon him. See also Eze. xxxviii. 29—32. 11. Unclean spirits—cried—saying, Thou art the Son of God. This circumstance proves the existence of evil spirits. If these were merely diseased or deranged persons, then it is strange that they should be endowed with knowledge so much superior to those in health. But if they were under the influence of an

those who were not familiar with the other term. Lightfoot observes that this "preparation," on which Jesus was crucified, was such in a double sense:—"The whole day, especially from the third hour, was the preparation for the Passover, or the whole of the ensuing week; and the evening of the day was the preparation for the coming Sabbath."

xv. 43. Joseph is called an "honourable counsellor," or counsellor, as a member of the council, or Sanhedrim (Luke xxiii. 51).

xv. 44. 45. These verses are peculiar to Mark. The summons to the centurion suggests that the soldiers had returned to their post. We should render verse 44, "And Pilate wondered if he were already dead; and summoning the centurion, he inquired of him whether he had been dead long."

xvi. 1. The phrase, "when the Sabbath was past," must be understood of Saturday night, after the termination of the Jewish Sabbath, or after six o'clock. Matthew mentions the two Marias, but not Salome, nor does he speak of their purchasing sweet spices order of spirits superior to man, whose appropriate habitation was in another world, then it is not strange that they should know him, even in the midst of his poverty, to be the Messiah, the Son of God. 21. He is beside himself. He is delirious, or deranged. The reason why this report gained any belief was, probably, that our Lord had lived among them as a carpenter; that he was poor and unknown, and that now, at thirty years of age, he broke off from this occupation, spent much time in the deserts, denied himself the common comforts of life, and declared his claims to be the Messiah who was expected, by all the people, to come with great pomp and splendour. The charge of derangement, on account of attention to religion, has not been confined to the Saviour. Let a man be made deeply sensible of his sins, and spend much of his time in prayer, and have no relish for the ordinary amusements of life; or let a Christian be much impressed with his obligation to devote himself to God, and act as if he believed there was an eternity, and warn his neighbours of their danger; or let a minister shew uncommon zeal, and waste his strength in the service of his Maker, and the world is not slow to call it derangement. And none will be more ready to originate or believe the charge than an ungodly and infidel parent or brother, or self-righteous Pharisee or professor in the church. At the same time men may endanger themselves in the pursuit of wealth, or may plunge into the vortex of fashion, and folly, and vice, and break in upon the hours of repose, and neglect personal, domestic, and relative duties, and yet be counted of sane mind! Such is the consistency of boasted reason, such the wisdom and prudence of worldly men!

CHAP. IV.—25 That which he hath. That which he had already learned. By this we are taught the indispensable necessity of giving continued attention to the means of instruction. It is not sufficient that we have learned some things, or appear to have learned much. All will be in vain, unless we go forward and improve every opportunity of knowing the will of God and the way of salvation. So what children are taught will be of little use, unless they follow it up with endeavours after farther attainments, and with prayers for the Holy Spirit to bless these endeavours. Then may they expect to grow in grace.

CHAP. V.—15. Sitting, and clothed, and in his right mind. There could be no doubt of the reality of this miracle. The man had been well known. He had long dwelt among the tombs, an object of terror and alarm. To see him all at once peaceful, and calm, and rational, was proof that it was the power of God only that had done it. 20 In Decapolis. Decapolis was the name of a region of country in the bounds of the half tribe of Manasseh, mainly on the east of Jordan. It was so called because it included ten cities—the meaning of the word Decapolis in Greek. 30. Virtue, power to heal. The word in the original signifies power. Who touched my clothes? This he said, not to obtain information, for, having healed her, he must have known on whom the blessing was conferred; but he put the question in order that the woman herself might make a confession of the whole matter, by which the power of her faith, and the greatness of the miracle, might be manifested to the praise of God. 34. Daughter. A word of kindness, to inspire confidence and dissipate her fears. Of the plague. Thy disease, literally, 'thy scourge.' So a word from Jesus cures the moral malady of the sinner. 35, 36. Why troublest thou, &c. It seems that the people had not yet confidence that Jesus could raise the dead. He had not yet done it, and, as the child was now dead, and as they supposed that his power over her was at an end, they wished no farther to trouble him. Jesus kindly set the fears of the ruler at rest, and assured him that he had equal power over the dead as the living, and could as easily raise those who had expired, as those who were expiring. The tumult. The confusion and weeping of the assembled people. Wailed. Making inarticulate, mournful sounds; howling for the dead. This ado. This tumult, this bustle or confusion. And weep. Weep in this inordinate and improper manner. (See woodcut.) 43. Something should be given her to eat. 'He had raised her by extraordinary power, but he willed that she should be sustained by ordinary means.' He also in this gave full evidence that she was really restored to life and health. The changes were great, sudden, and certain. There could be no illusion. So, when the Saviour had risen, he gave evidence of his own resurrection, by eating with his disciples, Jno. xxi. 1—13.

CHAP. VI.—13. And anointed with oil. Used, probably, like the imposition of hands; or like our Saviour's anointing the eyes of the blind with clay, merely as a sign in expectation of imparting that aid and comfort from God which was sought, and which was represented by the natural soothing and gentle effect of oil. 20. He did many things; but he did not do the thing which was demanded of him—to break off from his sins. Probably, before John was imprisoned, he treated him kindly, or spake well of him, or aided him in his wants, and attempted in this way to silence his rebukes and destroy the effect of his faithfulness. So sinners often treat ministers kindly, and do much to make them comfortable, and hear them gladly, while they are still unwilling to do the thing which is demanded of them—to repent, and believe the Gospel. They expect that their kind attentions will be accepted in the place of what God demands—repentance and the forsaking of their sins. 52. Their heart was hardened. This does not mean that they were opposed to Jesus, or that they had what we denominate hardness of heart, but simply that they were slow to perceive,—they did not quickly learn, as they ought to have done, that he had all power, and could, therefore, allay the storm. The word heart is frequently used in this sense.—See Eph. iv. 18 in Greek; Rom. i. 21; ii. 15; 2 Cor. iv. 6.

CHAP. VII.—All meats. All food; all that is taken into the body to support life. The meaning is, that the economy, or process by which life is supported, purifies, or renders nutritious, all kinds of food. The food taken into the stomach is, by the gastric juice, converted into a thick pulp, called chyle. This is changed into blood, and the blood conveys nutriment and support to all parts of the system. The useless portions of the food are thrown off. 37. Beyond measure—exceedingly, very much; in the Greek, "very abundantly." He hath done all things well. All things in a remarkable manner; or, he has perfectly effected the cure of the deaf and dumb.

CHAP. VIII.—23. Saw aught, saw any thing. 24. I see men as trees walking. I see men walking, but see them so indistinctly that but for their motion I could not distinguish them from trees. I cannot distinctly see their shapes and figures. Probably our Lord did not at once restore him fully to sight, that he might strengthen his faith. Seeing that Jesus had partially recovered him, it was evidence that he could wholly, and it led him to exercise faith anew in him, and to feel more strikingly his dependence on him. 25. Every man clearly. Could see their form and features,—his sight was completely restored. We cannot say whether our Lord intended, by this method, to teach any lesson in regard to the way in which the mind of a sinner is enlightened; it nevertheless affords a striking illustration of it. Sinners are by nature blind, 2 Cor. iv. 4; 1 Jno. ii. 11; Rom. ix. 39. The effect of religion, or of the influence of the Holy Spirit, is to open the eyes, to shew the sinner his condition and his danger, and to lead him to look on Him whom he has pierced. Yet at first he sees indistinctly; he does not soon learn to distinguish objects. When converted he is in a new world; old things are passed away; behold all things are become new: he sees the Scriptures, the Saviour, and the works of creation—the sun, and stars, and hills, and vales, in a new light. He sees the beauty of the plan of salvation, and wonders that he has not seen it before; yet he sees at first indistinctly. It is only by repeated applications to the Source of light that he sees all things clearly. At first religion may seem full of mysteries; doctrines and facts appear on every hand that he cannot fully comprehend. His mind is still perplexed, and he may doubt whether he has ever seen aught, or has ever been renewed; yet let him not despair. Light, in due time, will be shed on these obscure and mysterious truths. Repeated applications to the Father of lights, in faith, in prayer, and in searching the Scriptures, and in the ordinances of religion, will dissipate all these doubts, and he will see all things clearly, and the universe will appear to be filled with one broad flood of light.

CHAP. IX.—29. But Jesus said, Forbid him not. There is no reason to infer that John had any improper design in opposing the man. He thought it was evidence that he could not be right, because he did not join them and follow the Saviour. Our Lord thought differently: he opposed no one who gave evidence that he loved him. Whatever he might be, or whatever his work, yet if he did it in the name of Jesus, and with the approbation of God, it was evidence sufficient that he was right. Christians should rejoice in good done by their brethren of any denomination. There are men calling themselves Christians who seem to look with doubt and suspicion on all that is done by those who do not walk with them. They undervalue their labours, attempt to lessen the evidence of their success, and to diminish their influence. True likeness to the Saviour would lead us to rejoice in all the good accomplished, by whomsoever it may be done; and to rejoice that the kingdom of Christ is advanced, whether by a Presbyterian, an Episcopalian, a Baptist, an Independent, or a Methodist; compare Phil. i. 18, 41. Whosoever shall give you a cup, &c. None are so humble in the kingdom of Christ as not to be able to do good, and none in circumstances so poor as may not shew attachment to Him. Their feeblest service will be accepted, and acts of love that may be forgotten by man, will be remembered by Him and rewarded in heaven. 44—46. Their worm. This figure is clearly taken from Isa. lxvi. 24. In describing the great prosperity of the kingdom of the Messiah, Isaiah says that the people of God shall go forth, and look upon the carcasses of men who have transgressed against God. Their enemies shall be overcome. They shall be slain. The people of God shall triumph. The figure is taken from heaps of the dead slain in battle; and the prophet says that the number shall be so great that their worm—the worm feeding on the dead—shall not die, shall live long,—as long as there are carcasses to be devoured; and that the fire which was used to burn the bodies of the dead shall continue long to burn, and shall not be extinguished till they are consumed. The figure, therefore, denotes great misery, and certain and terrible destruction. In these verses it is applied to the state beyond the grave, and is intended to denote that the destruction of the wicked will be awful, widespread, and eternal. 49. Every one shall be salted with fire. Perhaps no passage in the New Testament has given more perplexity to commentators than this; and it may be impossible now to fix its precise meaning. Probably it has no reference at all to future punishment; and the difficulty of interpreting it has arisen from supposing it connected with the 48th ver.—6, or given as a reason for what is said in that verse, rather than considering it as designed to illustrate the general design of the passage. The main scope of the passage was not to discourse of future punishment; that is brought in incidentally. The chief object of the passage was, 1st. To teach them that other men, not with them, might be true Christians, ver. 38, 39. 2nd. That they should be disposed to look favourably upon the slightest evidence that they might be, ver. 41. 3rd. That they ought to avoid giving offence to such feeble and obscure Christians, ver. 42. 4th. That every thing calculated to give offence, or to dishonour religion, should be removed, ver. 43; and 5th. That every thing which would endanger their salvation should be sacrificed; that they should deny themselves, and practise all self-denials, in order to obtain eternal life. In this way they would be preserved to eternal life. The word "fire" here, therefore, denotes self-denials, sacrifices, trials, in keeping ourselves from the gratification of the flesh; as if he had said, "Look at the sacrifice on the altar; it is an offering to God, about to be presented to him. It is sprinkled with salt, emblematic of purity, of preservation, and of fitting it, therefore, for a sacrifice. So you are devoted to God; you are sacrifices, victims, offerings to him in his service. To make you acceptable offerings, every thing must be done to preserve you from sin, to purify you, and to make you fit offerings. Self-denials, subduing the lusts, enduring trials, removing offences, are the proper preservatives in the service of God. Doing this, you will be acceptable offerings, and be saved; without this, you will be unfit for his eternal service, and will be lost." 50. Lost its saltness, that is, if it has become insipid, tasteless, or lost its preserving properties. The salt used in this country is a chemical compound—muriate of soda, and if the saltness were lost, and it were to lose its savour, there would be nothing remaining. It enters into the very nature of the substance. In Eastern countries, however, the salt used was impure, mingled with vegetable and earthy substances; so that it might lose the whole of its saltness, and a considerable quantity of earthy matter remain. This was good for nothing, except that it was used, as it is said, to place in paths or walks as we use gravel. This kind of salt is still common in the East. Have salt in yourselves. Have the preserving, purifying principle always—the principle of denying yourselves, of suppressing pride, ambition, contention, &c., and thus you will be an acceptable offering to God. Have peace. Avoid contention and quarrelling, struggling for places, honours, and office, and seek each other's welfare, and religion will be honoured and preserved in the world.

CHAP. X.—30. A hundred fold. A hundred times as much. In this time—in this life. In the time that he forsakes all. Houses, &c. This cannot be taken literally, as promising a hundred times as many mothers, sisters, &c. It means, evidently, that the loss shall be a hundred times compensated, or made up, or that in the possession of religion we have a hundred times the value of all that we forsake. This consists in the pardon of sin, in the favour of God, in peace of conscience, in support in trials and in death, and in raising up friends in the place of those who are left—spiritual brethren, and sisters, and mothers, &c. And this corresponds to the experience of all who ever became Christians. At the same time it is true that godliness is profitable for all things, having the promise of the life that is, as well as of that which is to come. The favour of God is the security for every blessing. Obedience to his law secures industry, temperance, chastity, economy, prudence, health, and the confidence of the world,—all indispensable to what is called success in life, and all connected commonly with success. Though the wicked sometimes prosper, yet the surest way of prosperity is to fear God, and keep his commandments. Thus will all needed blessings descend on us here, and eternal blessings hereafter. With persecutions. Persecutions, or the contempt of the world, and other sufferings to anoint the body. The evangelists give separate accounts of the resurrection, and its attendant circumstances, with much variation of detail. Where the same facts are reported, the verbal differences are frequently so considerable as to perplex superficial readers, and even the critics sometimes. The brevity of these notes prevents a full discussion, for which reference should be made to such a work as that of Dr. R. Macpherson, "On the Resurrection of Jesus Christ."

xvi. 8. This verse is important, as having perhaps originally formed the conclusion of this Gospel. Whether the remaining verses were added by the evangelist, or some other in the apostolic age, it is probably impossible to learn. The arguments are set forth at length by Tischendorf, who notes, "1, their omission by the Vatican and Sinaitic MSS., and others; 2, some MSS., &c., notice their occasional absence; 3, some scholars prove the same; 4, they are not reckoned by the sections of Ammonius and Eusebius." To these it is added that the verses contain various words and expressions which on account of their religion, they must meet. Jesus did not conceal this; but he ~~reassured~~ ^{reassured} them. He assured them that amidst these, or perhaps it should be rendered 'after' these, they should find friends and comfort. It is well to bear trial if God be our friend. With these promises of the Bible in our hand, we may hail persecutions, and thank God that, amidst so many sorrows, he has furnished such superabundant consolation. 46 As he went out of Jericho. This was a large town about eight miles west of the Jordan, and about nineteen miles north-east from Jerusalem. Near to it the Israelites crossed the Jordan on entering into the land of Canaan, Jos. iii. 16. It was the first city taken by Joshua, who destroyed it to the foundation, and pronounced a curse on him who should rebuild it. Jos. vi. 20, 21, 26. This curse was literally fulfilled in the days of Ahab, nearly five hundred years after, 1 Kin. xvi. 34; other references are made to it in 2 Kin. ii. 5, 21. In point of size it was second only to Jerusalem. It was sometimes called the city of palm trees, from there being many palms in the vicinity: a few of them still remain, 2 Chr. xxviii. 15; Jud. i. 16; iii. 13. At this place died Herod, Mat. ii. 19. It is now a small, wretched village, called Riha, or Rab, situated on the ruins of the ancient city, or as some think, three or four miles east of it. There are perhaps fifty houses, of rough stone, with roofs of bushes and mud, and the population, two or three hundred in number, is entirely Mohammedan.

CHAP. XI.—22. Have faith in God. Literally, Have the faith of God. This may mean, have strong faith, or have confidence in God; a strong belief that he is able to accomplish things that appear most difficult, with infinite ease, as the fig tree was made to wither by a word.

CHAP. XII.—41. Sat over against, opposite to, in full sight of. The treasury. This was in the court of the women; see note on ch. xiii. ver. 1. In that court were fixed a number of places or coffers, made with a large open mouth in the shape of a trumpet, for the purpose of receiving the offerings of the people; and the money thus contributed was devoted to the service of the temple,—to incense, sacrifices, &c.

CHAP. XIII.—1. As he went out of the temple. Temple, see notes on Mat. xxi. The word temple was given not merely to the sacred edifice or house itself, but to all the numerous chambers, courts, and rooms connected with it, on the top of mount Moriah. The temple itself was a small edifice, and was surrounded by courts and chambers half a mile in circumference. Into the sacred edifice itself our Saviour never went. The high priest only went into the holy of holies, and that but once a year; and none but priests were permitted to enter into the holy place. The Saviour was neither; he was of the tribe of Judah, and he consequently was allowed to enter no farther than the other Israelites into the temple. The works that he is said to have performed in the temple are, therefore, to be understood as having been done in the courts surrounding it. There were several such courts: the court of the Gentiles, so called because Gentiles might come into it, but durst go no farther; the court of the women, so called because women might advance thus far, but no farther,—here was the treasury where the poor widow cast in her all; it was in this court also that the Jews commonly worshipped. Besides these, was the court of the Israelites, because all the males of the Jews might advance there; and the court of the priests, because there the priests conducted the daily service of the sanctuary. What manner of stones. The temple was erected on mount Moriah. The space on the summit of the mount was not, however, large enough for the buildings necessary to be erected; it was therefore enlarged by building high walls from the valley below, and filling up the space within. One of these walls was six hundred feet in height. The stones above referred to were those used in the building of the temple; the blocks were of white marble, and of prodigious size. Josephus says, some of them were fifty feet long, twenty-four feet broad, and sixteen in thickness. The prophecy of our Lord, that "there shall not be left here one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down," has been fearfully fulfilled to the very letter; for the mosque of Omar, entirely a Moslem building, stands upon the rock Moriah, probably on the very spot occupied by the temple. But some of the stones of the wall rising up from the valley, and forming a support for the buildings connected with the temple, still remain. "We counted ten courses of these massy stones one above another. One of them measured fifteen feet long by three broad; another was eight feet square; others farther south were twenty-four feet long. There are also the singular traces of an ancient arch, which Professor Robinson had discovered to be the remains of the bridge from the temple to mount Zion, mentioned frequently by Josephus as a work of the highest antiquity. The stones in the temple wall, that form the spring of this ancient bridge, are of enormous size. The discovery of the arch itself goes to prove that the large stones, in the wall referred to as still existing, are really the work of Jewish hands, and the remains of the outer wall of the temple of Solomon." See Bonar and McCheyne's Narrative. 32. Neither the Son. This text has always presented serious difficulties. But there is no more difficulty in it than that in Luke ii. 52, where it is said that Jesus increased in wisdom and knowledge. He had a human nature. He grew as a man in knowledge. As a man his knowledge must be finite; for the faculties of the human soul are not infinite. As a man he often spoke, reasoned, inquired, felt, feared, read, learned, ate, drank, and walked. Why are not all these, which imply that he was a man—that as a man he was not infinite—why are not these as difficult as the want of knowledge respecting the particular time of a future event, especially when that time must be made known by God, and when he chose that the man Christ Jesus should grow, and think, and speak as a man? The truth is we cannot understand many things which relate to the mysterious union of his divine and human nature, and should not further presume to pry into them.—T. Scott. "The Son is here considered as the prophet sent into the world to reveal his Father's will; and, therefore, as delivering to the world, not what the Logos knew or taught, but what the Spirit of God revealed to him," (Jno. iii. 34, 35; v. 20; xii. 49; xiv. 10.)—Whitby. "This he speaks in his human nature and in his prophetic capacity. This point was not made known to him by the Spirit, nor was he commissioned to reveal it."—Bishop Porteus.

CHAP. XIV.—3. Ointment. This word does not convey quite the proper meaning. This was a perfume used only to give a pleasant odour, and was liquid. Of spikenard. The nard, from which this perfume was made, is a plant of the East Indies, with a small slender stalk, and a heavy thick root. And she brake the box. This may mean no more than that she broke the seal of the box, so that it could be poured out. Boxes of perfumes are often sealed or made fast by wax, to prevent the perfume from escaping. 32. Gethsemane. See note on Matthew xxvi. 36. 41. It is enough. There has been much difficulty in determining the meaning of this phrase. Campbell translates it, "all is over," that is, the time when you could have been of service to me is gone by. They might have aided him by watching for him when they were sleeping, but now the time was past, and he was already, as it were, in the hands of his enemies. It is not improbable, however, that after his agony, sometime elapsed before Judas came. He had required them to watch, that is, to keep awake during that season of agony; after that they might have been suffered to sleep while Jesus watched alone. As he saw Judas approach he may have roused them, saying, "It is sufficient; as much repose has been taken as is allowable; the enemy is near, and the Son of man is about to be betrayed."

CHAP. XV.—16. Called Pretorium. The hall where the pretor or Roman governor sat to administer justice. 17. They clothed him with purple. Matthew says, a scarlet robe. The ancients gave the name purple to any colour that had a mixture of red in it, whence these different colours might be sometimes called by the same name. As we cannot suppose that Pilate put on him a new and splendid robe, we must suppose that this was one which had been worn, and cast off as useless, and was now employed to array the Son of God, as an object of ridicule and scorn! Platted, here, means woven together—a crown, or perhaps rather a wreath; thorns are of that species of shrubs that has sharp points of very hard wood. 43. Joseph, an honourable counsellor. A distinguished man, who probably held a high office among the Jews, as one of their great council, or a Jewish senator. The word honourable here is not a mere title of office, but is given in reference to his personal character, as being a man of integrity, and blameless life. Waited for the kingdom of God. Waited for, or expected, the coming of the Messiah. But this expression means more than an indefinite expectation that the Messiah would come, for all the Jews expected that. It implies that he believed Jesus to be the Messiah, and that he had waited for him, to build up the kingdom of God; and this agrees with what John says, ch. xix. 38, that he was a disciple of Jesus, but secretly, for fear of the Jews. He had retained his secret belief in the hope that Jesus would be proclaimed and treated as the Messiah, and then he probably proposed openly to acknowledge his attachment to him. But God called him to a public profession of attachment in a different manner, and gave this distinguished man grace to evince it. So men often delay a profession of attachment to Christ. They cherish a secret love; they indulge a hope in the mercy of God; but they conceal it for fear of man. Whereas God requires that the attachment should be made known. He that is ashamed of me, said the Saviour, and of my words, before men, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed, when he shall come in the glory of his Father and of the holy angels. Those who love the Saviour have no right to hide their light under a bushel. As soon as they have evidence, satisfactory to their own mind, that they are Christians, or have a prevalent belief, after faithful examination, that they truly love God, and depend on the Lord Jesus for salvation, so soon are they bound to profess Christ before men. This is the command of God, and this is the way of peace. None have the prospect of comfort in religion, who do not have respect to all of the commandments of God. Went in boldly unto Pilate. God had raised up this distinguished counsellor and secret disciple for a special and most important vocation. The disciples of Jesus had fled, and if they had not, they had no influence with Pilate. Unless there had been a special application to Pilate in behalf of Jesus, his body would have been buried that night in the common grave with the malefactors; for it was a law of the Jews, that the body of an executed man should not remain on the cross on the sabbath. At this critical juncture God called forward this secret disciple—this friend of Jesus, though unknown as such to the world, and gave him confidence; he dared to express sympathy for the Saviour; he went in boldly, and begged the body of Jesus. It needed no small measure of courage to do this. Jesus had just been condemned, mocked, spit on, crucified—the death of a slave, or the most guilty wretch. To avow attachment for him now was proof of sincere affection; and the Holy Spirit has thought this worthy of special notice: and has set down this bold attachment of a senator for Jesus for our imitation. 47 Beheld where he was laid. The affection of these pious females never forsook them, in all the trials and sufferings of their Lord. They followed him to the cross; they came as near to him as they were permitted to come, in his last moments; they followed him when taken down and laid in the tomb. The strong, the mighty, the youthful, had fled; but these never forsook him, even in his deepest humiliation. This is the nature of true love. It is strongest in such scenes. While professed attachment will abound in prosperity, and live most in sunshine, it is only genuine love that will go into the dark shades of adversity, and flourish there. In scenes of poverty, want, affliction, and death, it shews its genuineness. That which lives there is genuine; that which turns away from such scenes is spurious.

CHAP. XVI.—Shall be damned. That is, condemned by God, and cast off from his presence, 2 Thes. i. 6–9. It implies that they will be adjudged to be guilty by God in the day of judgment, Rom. ii. 12, 16; Mat. xxv. 41; that they will deserve to die for ever, Rom. ii. 6, 8; and that they will be cast out into a place of woe to all eternity, Mat. xxv. 46. It may be asked how it can be just in God to condemn men for ever, for not believing the Gospel. I answer, 1st. God has a right to appoint his own terms of mercy. 2nd. Man has no claim on him for heaven. 3rd. The sinner rejects the offer of salvation knowingly, deliberately, and perseveringly. 4th. He has a special disregard and contempt for the Gospel. 5th. His unbelief is produced by the love of sin. 6th. He shews by this that he has no love for God, and his law, and for eternity. 7th. He slights the objects dearest to God, and most like him; and 8th. He must be miserable. A creature who has no confidence in God, who does not believe that he is true or worthy of his regard, and who never seeks his favour, must be wretched. He rejects God, and he must go into eternity without a Father, and without a God; and he has no source of comfort in himself, and must die for ever. There is no being in eternity but God that can make man happy; and without his favour the sinner must be wretched. Thus the condition of the man who will not believe is awful indeed. The Son of God has declared that he shall be damned. He will judge the world, and there is none that can deliver out of his hand. No excuse will be allowed for not believing. Unless a man has faith, he must be lost for ever. This is the solemn assurance of the whole Bible; and in view of this awful declaration of the merciful Redeemer, how sad is the condition of him who has no confidence in Jesus, and who has never looked to him for eternal life! And how important, that without delay he should seek peace with God, and possess that faith which is connected with eternal life, and which, blessed be his name, God is ready to bestow Mat. vii. 7.

Mark never uses. Yet the antiquity of the passage is undoubted, and it was certainly extant in the second century.

xvi. 9. The casting out of the seven devils from Mary Magdalene is incidentally mentioned by Luke (chap. viii. 2), and not elsewhere.

xvi. 11. The fact that Mary told the apostles, and that they disbelieved her words, is mentioned in Luke xxiv. 11, with some variation of detail. John records two communications made by her, one to Peter, and a second, which corresponds in substance with this, to all the disciples.

xvi. 12. This agrees with Luke xxiv. 13, &c.

xvi. 14. This also agrees with Luke xxiv. 33.

xvi. 17. The signs would not be wrought by and for all who believed, but would be the special privilege of some in apostolic times.

xvi. 19. This verse conveys no intimation as to the time and place of the Ascension, but is a simple declaration of the fact.

Additional Notes.—Chap. iv. 30. Grotius compares this with Isa. xl. 18. Dean Alford calls it a rabbinical method of questioning.

v. 22. Jairus was one of the rulers of the synagogue at Capernaum, where this miracle was wrought. Matthew (ix. 18) merely calls him a ruler, but Luke gives a fuller description, similar to the one here. A Jewish book, quoted by Lightfoot, says, "The ruler of the synagogue is he who decides the details of the synagogue, as who shall read the prophet, who shall recite the phylacteries, who shall pass before the ark." As a public official in Capernaum, Jairus must have been acquainted with the personal word and teachings of our Lord, of whom it is said Capernaum was "his own city."

GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. LUKE,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We are now entering into the labours of another evangelist; his name Luke; which some take to be a contraction of Lucilius; born at Antioch, so St. Jerome; some think the only one of all the penmen of the Scripture that was not of the seed of Israel. He was a Jewish proselyte, and, as some conjecture, converted to Christianity by the ministry of St. Paul, at Antioch; and after his coming into Macedonia, Acts xvi. 10, he was his constant companion. He had employed himself in the study and practice of physic; hence Paul calls him Luke the beloved physician, Col. iv. 14. And some of the pretended ancients tell you he was a painter, and drew a picture of the Virgin Mary. But Dr. Whitby thinks there is nothing certain to the contrary, and that therefore it is probable he was one of the seventy disciples, and a follower of Christ when he was here upon earth; and if so, he was a native Israelite: and I see not what can be objected against this, except some uncertain traditions of the ancients, which we can build nothing upon, and against which may be opposed the testimonies of Origen and Epiphanius, who both say that he was one of the seventy disciples. He is supposed to have written this Gospel when he was associated with St. Paul in his travels, and by direction from him; and some think this is the brother whom Paul speaks of, 2 Cor. viii. 18, "whose praise is in the Gospel throughout all the churches of Christ;" as if the meaning of it were, that he was celebrated in all the churches for writing this Gospel; and that St. Paul means this, when he speaks sometimes of his Gospel, as Rom. ii. 16; but there is no ground at all for that. Dr. Cave observes, that his way and manner of writing is accurate and exact, his style polite and elegant, sublime and lofty, yet perspicuous; and that he expresseth himself in a vein of purer Greek than is to be found in the other writers of the holy story: thus he relates divers things more copiously than the other evangelists; and thus he especially treats of those things which relate to the priestly office of Christ. It is uncertain where, or about what time, this Gospel was written; some think it was written in Achaia, during his travels with Paul, seventeen years (twenty-two years say others) after Christ's ascension; others, that it was written at Rome, a little before he wrote his history of the Acts of the Apostles, (which is a continuation of this,) when he was there with Paul, while he was a prisoner, and preaching in his own hired house, with which the history of the Acts concludes; and then Paul saith only Luke was with him, 2 Tim. iv. 11. When he was under that voluntary confinement with Paul, he had leisure to compile these two histories;—and many excellent writings the church has been indebted to a prison for;—if so, it was written about twenty-seven years after Christ's ascension, and about the fourth year of Nero. Jerome saith he died when he was eighty-four years of age, and was never married. Some write, that he suffered martyrdom; but if he did, where and when is uncertain. Nor indeed is there much more credit to be given to the Christian traditions concerning the writers of the New Testament than to the Jewish traditions concerning those of the Old Testament.

CHAPTER I.

The narrative which this evangelist gives us, or rather God by him, of the life of Christ, begins earlier than either Matthew or Mark. We have reason to thank God for them all, as we have for all the gifts and graces of Christ's ministers, which in one, make up what is wanting in the other, while all put together make a harmony. In this chapter we have, I. Luke's preface to his Gospel, or his epistle dedicatory to his friend Theophilus, ver. 1—4. II. The prophecy and history of the conception of John Baptist, who was Christ's forerunner, ver. 5—25. III. The annunciation of the Virgin Mary, or the notice given to her that she should be the mother of the Messiah, ver. 26—38. IV. The interview between Mary the mother of Jesus, and Elisabeth the mother of John, when they were both with child of those pregnant births, and the prophecies they both uttered upon that occasion, ver. 39—56. V. The birth and circumcision of John Baptist, six months before the birth of John, and in prospect of the birth of Jesus, ver. 57—79. VI. A short account of John Baptist's infancy, ver. 80. And these do more than give us an entertaining narrative; they will lead us into the understanding of the mystery of godliness—"God manifest in the flesh."

ORASMUCH as many have taken in hand to set forth in order a declaration of those things which are most surely believed among us, 2 Even as they delivered them unto us, which from the beginning were eye-witnesses, and ministers of the word; 3 It seemed good to me also, having had perfect understanding of all things from the very first, to write unto thee in order, most excellent Theophilus, 4 That thou mightest know the certainty of those things, wherein thou hast been instructed.

Complimental prefaces and dedications, the language of flattery, and the food and fuel of pride, are justly condemned by the wise and good; but it doth not therefore follow that such as are useful and instructive are to be run down; such is this here, in which St. Luke dedicates his Gospel to his friend Theophilus, not as to his patron, though he was a man of honour, to protect it, but as to his pupil to learn it, and hold it fast. It is not certain who this Theophilus was; the name signifies 'A friend of God;' and some think it doth not mean any particular person, but every one that is a lover of God; and Dr. Hammond quotes some of the ancients understanding it so. And then it teaches us, that those who are truly lovers of God will heartily welcome the Gospel of Christ; the design and tendency of which is to bring us to God. But it is rather to be understood of some particular person, probably a magistrate; because Luke gives him here the same title of respect which St. Paul gave to Festus the governor, κράτορε, Acts xxvi. 25, which we there translate, "most noble Festus;" and here, "most excellent Theophilus." Note, Religion doth not destroy civility and good manners, but teaches us, according to the usages of our country, to "give honour to them to whom honour is due." Now observe here,

I. Why St. Luke wrote this Gospel. It is certain he was moved by the Holy Ghost, not only to the writing, but in the writing of it; but in both he was moved as a reasonable creature, and not as a mere machine; and he was made to consider,

First. That the things he wrote of were things that were "most surely believed among" all Christians, and therefore things which they ought to be instructed in, that they may know what they believe; and things which ought to be transmitted to posterity, who are as much concerned in them as we are; and in order to that, to be committed to writing, which is the surest way of conveyance to the ages to come. He will not write about things of doubtful dispute—things about which Christians may safely differ from one another, and hesitate within themselves; but the things which are, and ought to be, "most surely believed," πράγματα πεπληροφρονούμενα; the things which were performed, so some, which Christ and his apostles did, and did with such circumstances as gave a full assurance that they were really done; so that they have gained an established lasting credit. Note, Though it is not the foundation of our faith, yet it is a support to it, that the articles of our creed are things

Title.—That the author of this Gospel bore the name of Luke, or Lucas, in the primitive Church we know from the testimony of Irenæus and others in the second century. That he has been always identified with the Luke, or Lucas, mentioned by Paul is equally certain. Little is known of him except that he was a physician (Col. iv. 14). An idle fiction regards him as a painter, to whom various pictures are ascribed. That he was the author of the Acts of the Apostles has been almost universally admitted, and also that he was associated with St. Paul for a considerable period. We have no trustworthy account of his origin, nor of the place, time, and manner of his death, all which are uncertain. It is gathered from Acts i. 1 that this Gospel was written before the Acts. There is no doubt that the original was in Greek, but we do not know when and where it was written. The probability is that it was written before A.D. 60, and in Asia Minor or Greece.

i. 1—4. This preface or introduction, recording the occasion and that have been long "most surely believed." The doctrine of Christ is what thousands of the wisest and best of men have ventured their souls upon, with the greatest assurance and satisfaction.

Secondly. That it was requisite there should be a declaration made in order of those things—tha, the history of the life of Christ should be methodized and committed to writing, for the greater certainty of the conveyance. When things are put in order, we know the better where to find them for our own use, and how to keep them for the benefit of others.

Thirdly. That there were many who had undertaken to publish narratives of the life of Christ; many well-meaning people that designed well, and did well; and what they published had done good, though not done by Divine inspiration, nor so well done as might be, nor intended for perpetuity. Note, 1. The labours of others in the Gospel of Christ, if faithful and honest, we ought to commend and encourage, and not to despise, though chargeable with many deficiencies. 2. Others' services to Christ must not be reckoned to supersede ours, but rather to quicken them.

Fourthly. That the truth of the things he had to write was confirmed by the concurring testimony of those that were competent and unexceptionable witnesses of them; what had been published in writing already, and what he was now about to publish, agreed with that which had been delivered by word of mouth, over and over, by those "who from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word," ver. 2. Note, 1. The apostles were "ministers of the word" of Christ, who is the Word, so some understand it, or, of the doctrine of Christ; they, having received it themselves, ministered it to others, 1 Jno. i. 1. They had not a Gospel to make as masters, but a Gospel to preach as ministers. 2. The ministers of the word were eye-witnesses of the things which they preached, and, which is also included, ear-witnesses; they did themselves hear the doctrine of Christ, and see his miracles, and had them not by report, at second-hand; and therefore could not but speak with the greatest assurance the things they had seen and heard. Acts iv. 20. 3. They were so from the beginning of Christ's ministry, ver. 2. He had his disciples with him when he wrought his first miracle, Jno. ii. 11; they "compared with him all the time that he went in and out among them," Acts i. 21; so that they not only heard and saw all that which was sufficient to confirm their faith, but if there had been any thing to shock it, they had opportunity to discover it. 4. The written Gospel which we have to this day exactly agrees with the Gospel that was preached in the first days of the church. 5. That he himself had a "perfect understanding of" the "things" he wrote of "from the first," ver. 3. Some think here is a tacit reflection upon those that had written before him, that they had not a "perfect understanding" of what they wrote; and therefore, "here am I, send me;" — facit indignatio versum—"my wrath impels my pen;" or rather, without reflecting on them, he asserts his own ability for this undertaking: "it seemed good to me," having attained to the exact knowledge "of all things," ἀνωθεν,—"from above," so I think it should be rendered; for if he meant the same with "from the beginning," ver. 2, as our translation intimates, he would have used the same word. 1st. He had diligently searched into these things, had followed after them, so the word is, as the Old Testament prophets are said to have "inquired and searched diligently," 1 Pet. i. 10. He had not taken things so easily and superficially as others who had written before him, but made it his business to inform himself concerning particulars. 2nd. He had received his intelligence not only by tradition, as others had done, but by revelation; confirming that tradition, and securing him from any error or mistake in the recording of it. He sought it from above, so the word intimates, and from thence he had it; thus, like Elihu, he fetched his knowledge from afar. He wrote his history, as Moses wrote his, of things reported by tradition, but ratified by inspiration. 3rd. He could therefore say that he had a "perfect understanding" of these things; he knew them, ἀκριβως,—"accurately, exactly." Now having received this from above, it seemed good to me to communicate it; for such a talent as this ought not to be buried.

11. Observe why he sent it to Theophilus. "I wrote unto thee these things in order, not that thou mayest give reputation to the work, but that thou mayest be edified by it," ver. 4, "that thou mightest know the certainty of those things wherein thou hast been instructed." 1. It is implied, that he had been instructed in these things either before his baptism or since, or both, according to the rule, Mat. xxviii. 19, 20. Probably Luke had baptized him, and knew how well instructed he was; περὶ ὧν κατήχηθης,—"concerning which thou hast been catechized;" so the word is; the most knowing Christians began with being catechized. Theophilus was a person of quality, perhaps of noble birth; and so much the more pains should be taken with such, when they are young, to teach them the principles of the oracles of God, that they may be fortified against the temptations, and furnished for the opportunities of a high condition in the world. 2. It was intended that he should "know the certainty of those things," should understand them more clearly, and believe them more firmly. There is a certainty in the Gospel of Christ, there is that in it, which we may build upon. And those who have been well instructed in the things of God when they were young, should afterwards give diligence to know the certainty of those things; to know not only what we believe, but why we believe it; that we may be able to "give a reason of the hope that is in us."

HERE was in the days of Herod, the king of Judæa, a certain priest named Zacharias, of the course of Abia: and his wife was of the daughters of Aaron, and her name was Elisabeth. 6 And they were both righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless. 7 And they had no child, because that Elisabeth was barren, and they both were now well stricken in years. 8 And it came to pass, that while he executed the priest's office before God in the order of his course, 9 According to the custom of the priest's office, his lot was to burn incense when he went into the temple of the Lord. 10 And the whole multitude of the people were praying without at the time of incense. 11 And there appeared unto him an angel of the Lord standing on the right side of the altar of incense. 12 And when Zacharias saw him, he was troubled, and fear fell upon him. 13 But the angel said unto him, Fear not, Zacharias: for thy prayer is heard; and thy wife Elisabeth shall bear thee a son, and thou shalt call his name John. 14 And thou shalt have joy and gladness; and many shall rejoice at his birth. 15 For he shall be great in the sight of the Lord, and shall drink neither wine nor strong drink; and he shall be filled with the Holy Ghost, even from his mother's womb. 16 And many of the children of Israel shall he turn to the Lord their God. 17 And he shall go before him in the spirit and power of Elias, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just; to make ready a people prepared for the Lord. 18 And Zacharias said unto the angel, Whereby shall I know this? for I am an old man, and my wife well stricken in years. 19 And the angel answering said unto him, I am Gabriel, that stand in the presence of God; and am sent to speak unto thee, and to shew thee these glad tidings. 20 And, behold, thou shalt be dumb, and not able to speak, until the day that these things shall be performed, because thou believest not my words, which shall be fulfilled in their season. 21 And the people waited for Zacharias, and marvelled that he tarried so long in the temple. 22 And when he came out, he could not speak unto them: and they perceived that he had seen a vision in the temple: for he beckoned unto them, and remained speechless. 23 And it came to pass, that, as soon as the days of his ministration were accomplished, he departed to his own house. 24 And after those days his wife Elisabeth conceived, and hid herself five months, saying, 25 Thus hath the Lord dealt with me in the days wherein he looked on me, to take away my reproach among men.

The two preceding evangelists had agreed to begin the Gospel with the baptism of John, and his ministry, which commenced about six months before our Saviour's public ministry; (and now things were near a crisis, six months was a deal of time, which before was but a little); and therefore this evangelist, designing to give a more particular account than had been given of our Saviour's conception and birth, determines to do so of John Baptist; for in both he was his harbinger and forerunner, the morning star to the Sun of Righteousness; not only because it is commonly reckoned a satisfaction and entertainment to know something of the original extraction and early days of those who afterwards prove great men, but because in the beginning of these there were many things miraculous, and presages of what they afterwards proved; in these verses our inspired historian begins as early as the conception of John Baptist. Now observe here,

First. The account given of his parents, ver. 5; they lived "in the days of Herod the king," who was a foreigner, and a deputy for the Romans, who had lately made Judæa a province of the empire. This is taken notice of to shew that the sceptre was quite departed from Judah, and therefore now was the time for Shiloh to come, according to Jacob's prophecy, Gen. xlix. 10. The family of David was now sunk, when it was to rise and flourish again in the Messiah. Note, None ought to despair of the reviving and flourishing of religion, even then when civil liberties are lost; Israel is enslaved, yet then aim of the writer, has given rise to considerable discussion. Of Theophilus, to whom both the Gospel and the Acts were addressed, we have no information. It appears that before Luke wrote many others had drawn up accounts of the same matters. Some have supposed that these other accounts were the first apocryphal Gospels; but such a view is inconsistent with the statement here made, which is rather commendatory than otherwise. Neither does the knowledge we have of early apocryphal Gospels favour the opinion that they were either trustworthy or properly narrations of what was most surely believed in the early Church. The first intimations of the existence of apocryphal Gospels are quite against the view that they were correct historical narratives, so much as fictions and fables with a certain element of truth. It may be doubted whether the narrations here mentioned were the work of actual eye-witnesses; they seem rather to have been based upon the statements of eye-witnesses. We may doubt, therefore, whether somes the glory of Israel. Now the father of John Baptist was a priest, a son of Aaron, his name Zacharias. No families in the world were ever so honoured of God as those of Aaron and David; with one was made the covenant of priesthood, with the other that of royalty; they had both forfeited their honour, yet the Gospel again puts honour upon both in their latter days; on that of Aaron in John Baptist, on that of David in Christ; and then they were both extinguished and lost. Christ was of David's house, his forerunner of Aaron's, for his priestly agency and influence opened the way to his kingly authority and dignity. This Zacharias was "of the course of Abia;" when in David's time the family of Aaron was multiplied, he divided them into twenty-four courses, for the more regular performance of their office, that it might never be either neglected, for want of hands, or engrossed by a few. The eighth of those was that of Abia, 1 Chr. xxiv. 10, who was descended from Eleazar, Aaron's eldest son. But Dr. Lightfoot suggests that many of the families of the priests were lost in the captivity; so that after their return they took in those of other families, but retaining the names of the heads of the respective courses. The wife of this Zacharias was of the daughters of Aaron too, and her name Elisabeth, the very same name with Elisheba the wife of Aaron, Ex. vi. 23. The priests, Josephus saith, were very careful to marry within their own family, that they might maintain the dignity of the priesthood, and keep it without mixture. Now that which is observed concerning Zacharias and Elisabeth is,

1. That they were a very religious couple, ver. 6, "they were both righteous before God;" they were so in his sight, whose judgment we are sure "is according to truth;" they were sincerely and really so. They are righteous indeed that are so before God, as Noah in his generation, Gen. vii. 1. They approved themselves to him, and he was graciously pleased to accept them. It is a happy thing when those that are joined to each other in marriage are both joined to the Lord. And it is especially requisite that the priests, the Lord's ministers, should with their yoke-fellows be righteous before God; that they may be examples to the flock, and rejoice their hearts. "They walked in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless." 1st. Their being "righteous before God" was evidenced by the course and tenor of their conversations; they shewed it, not by their talk, but by their works; by the way they walked in, and the rule they walked by. 2nd. They were of a piece with themselves, for their devotions and their conversations agreed; they walked not only in the "ordinances of the Lord," which related to Divine worship, but "in the commandments of the Lord," which have reference to all the instances of a good conversation, and must be regarded. 3rd. They were universal in their obedience, not that they never did in any thing come short of their duty, but it was their constant care and endeavour to come up to it. 4th. Herein though they were not sinless, yet they were blameless; nobody could charge them with any open, scandalous sin; they lived honestly and inoffensively, as ministers and their families are in a special manner concerned to do, that the ministry be not blamed in their blame.

2. That they had been long childless, ver. 7. "Children are a heritage of the Lord;" but there are many of his heirs in a married state, that yet are denied this heritage; they are valuable, desirable blessings; yet many there are who are "righteous before God," and if they had children would bring them up in his fear, that yet are not thus blessed; while the "men of this world are full of children," Psa. xvii. 14; "and send forth their little ones like a flock," Job xxi. 11. "Elisabeth was barren;" and they began to despair of ever having children, for "they were both now well stricken in years," when the women that have been most fruitful leave off bearing. Many eminent persons were born of mothers that had been long childless, as Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Samson, Samuel, and so here John Baptist, to make their birth the more remarkable, and the blessing of it the more valuable to their parents; and to shew that when God keeps his people long waiting for a mercy, he sometimes is pleased to recompense them for their patience, by doubling the worth of it when it comes.

Secondly, The appearing of an angel to his father Zacharias, as he was ministering in the temple, ver. 8, 11. Zacharias the prophet was the last of the Old Testament that was conversant with angels, and Zacharias the priest the first in the New Testament. Observe,

1. How Zacharias was employed in the service of God, ver. 8: "He executed the priest's office before God in the order of his course;" it was his week of waiting, and he was upon duty. Though his family was not built up, or made to grow, yet he made conscience of doing the work of his own place and day. Though we have not desired mercies, yet we must keep close to enjoined services; and, in our diligent and constant attendance on them, we may hope that mercy and comfort will come at last. Now it fell to Zacharias's lot to burn incense morning and evening for that week of his waiting; as other services fell to other priests by lot likewise. The services were directed by lot, that some might not decline them, and others engross them, and that, the disposal of the lot being from the Lord, they might have the satisfaction of a Divine call to the work. This was not the high priest's burning incense on the day of atonement, as some have fondly imagined, and thought by that to find out the time of our Saviour's birth; but it is plain it was the burning of the daily incense at the altar of incense, ver. 11; which was in the temple, ver. 9; not in the most holy place, into which the high priest entered. The Jews say that one and the same priest burned not incense twice in all his days, there were such a multitude of them; at least, never more than one week. It is very probable that this was upon the sabbath day, because there was a multitude of people attending, ver. 10; which ordinarily was not on a week day; and thus God usually puts honour upon his own day. And then, if, as Dr. Lightfoot reckons, with the help of the Jewish calendars, that this course of Abia fell on the seventeenth day of the third month, the month Sivan, answering to part of May and part of June, it is worth observing that the portions of the law and the prophets which were read this day in the synagogues were very agreeable to that which was doing in the temple, namely, the law of the Nazarites, Num. vi., and the conception of Samson, Jud. xiii.

While Zacharias was burning incense in the temple, "the whole multitude of the people were praying without," ver. 10. Dr. Lightfoot saith there were constantly in the temple, at the hour of prayer, the priests of that course that then served; and if it were the sabbath day, those of that course also that had been in waiting the week before; and the Levites that served under the priests, and the men of the station, as the rabbins call them; who were the representatives of the people, in putting their hands upon the head of the sacrifices; and many besides, who, moved by devotion, left their employments for that time, to be present at the service of God, and those would make up a great multitude, especially on sabbaths and feast days. Now these all addressed themselves to their devotions, (in mental prayer, for their voice was not heard), when by the tinkling of a bell they had notice that the priest was gone in to burn incense. Now observe here, 1st. That the true Israel of God always were a praying people; and prayer is the great and principal piece of service by which we give honour to God, and fetch in favours from him, and keep up our communion with him. 2nd. That then when ritual and ceremonial appointments were in full force, as this of burning incense, yet moral and spiritual duties were required to go along with them, and were principally looked at.

David knew that when he was at a distance from the altar, his prayer might be heard without incense, for it might be directed before God as incense, Psa. cxli. 2; but when he was compassing the altar, the incense could not be accepted without prayer, no more than the shell without the kernel. 3rd. That it is not enough for us to be where God is worshipped, if our hearts do not join in the worship, and go along with the minister in all the parts of it. If he burn the incense never so well, in the most pertinent, judicious, lively prayer, if we be not at the same time praying in concurrence with him, what will it avail us? 4th. All the prayers we offer up to God here, in his courts, are acceptable and successful only in virtue of the incense of Christ's intercession in the temple of God above. To this usage in the temple service there seems to be an allusion, Rev. viii. 1, 3, 4, where we find that "there was silence in heaven," as there was in the temple, "for half an hour," while the people were silently lifting up their hearts to God in prayer; and that there was an angel, the angel of the covenant, who offered up "much incense, with the prayers of all saints, before the throne." We cannot expect an interest in Christ's intercession if we do not pray, and pray with our spirits, and continue instant in prayer. Nor can we expect that the best of our prayers should gain acceptance, and bring in an answer of peace, but through the mediation of Christ, who ever lives making intercession.

2. How, when he was thus employed, he was honoured with a messenger, a special messenger sent from heaven to him, ver. 11; "there appeared unto him an angel of the Lord." Some observe, that we never read of an angel appearing in the temple with a message from God, but only this one to Zacharias; because there God had other ways of making known his mind, as the Urim and Thummim, and by a still small voice from between the cherubims. But the ark and the oracle were wanting in the second temple; and therefore, when an express is to be sent to a priest in the temple, an angel was to be employed in it, and thereby the Gospel was to be introduced; for that, as the law, was given at first very much by "the ministry of angels," the appearance of which we often read of in the Gospels and the Acts, though the design both of the law and of the Gospel, when brought to perfection, was to settle another way of correspondence, more spiritual, between God and man. This angel stood "on the right side of the altar of incense," the north side of it, saith Dr. Lightfoot, on Zacharias's right hand; compare this with Zec. iii. 1; where Satan stands at the right hand of Joshua the priest, to resist him; but Zacharias has a good angel standing at his right hand, to encourage him. Some think this angel appeared coming out of the most holy place, which led him to stand at the right side of the altar.

3. What impression this made upon Zacharias; ver. 12, "when Zacharias saw him," it was a surprise upon him, even to a degree of terror, for "he was troubled, and fear fell upon him," ver. 12. Though he was righteous before God, and blameless in his conversation, yet he could not be without some frightful apprehensions at the sight of one whose visage and surrounding lustre spoke him more than human. Ever since man sinned, his mind has been unable to bear the glory of such revelations, and his conscience afraid of evil tidings brought by them; even Daniel himself could not bear it, Dan. x. 8; and for this reason God chooseth to speak to us by men like ourselves, whose terror shall not make us afraid.

Thirdly, The message which the angel had to deliver to him, ver. 13. He began his message, as angels generally did, with "Fear not." Perhaps it had never been Zacharias's lot to burn incense before; and being a very serious, conscientious man, we may suppose him full of care to do it well, and perhaps when he saw the angel, was afraid lest he came to rebuke him for some mistake or miscarriage; 'No,' saith the angel, "Fear not," 'I have no ill tidings to bring thee from heaven.' "Fear not," but compose thyself, that thou mayest with a sedate and even spirit receive the message I have to deliver to thee. Let us see what that is.

1. The prayers he has often made shall now receive an answer of peace: "Fear not, Zacharias, for thy prayer is heard." 1st. If he means his particular prayer for a son, to build up his family, it must be the prayers he had formerly made for that mercy, when he was likely to have children; but we may suppose, now he and his wife "were both well stricken in years," as they had done expecting it, so they had done praying for it; like Moses, it sufficeth them, and they speak no more to God of that matter, Deu. iii. 26. But God will now, in giving this mercy, look a great way back, to the prayers that he had made long since, for and with his wife, as Isaac for and with his, Gen. xxv. 21. Note, Prayers of faith are filed in heaven, and are not forgotten, though the thing prayed for is not presently given in. Prayers made when we were young, and coming into the world, may be answered when we are old and going out of the world. But, 2nd. If he means the prayers he was now making, and offering up with his incense, we may suppose those were, according to the duty of his place, for the Israel of God and their welfare, and the performance of the promises made to them concerning the Messiah and the coming of his kingdom: This prayer of thine is now heard; for thy wife shall now shortly conceive him that is to be the Messiah's forerunner. Some of the Jewish writers themselves say that the priest, when he burnt incense, prayed for the salvation of the whole world; and now that prayer shall be heard. Or, 3rd. In general, the prayers thou now makest, and all thy prayers, are accepted of God, and come up for a memorial before him, as the angel said to Cornelius, when he visited him at prayer, Acts x. 30, 31. And this shall be the sign that thou art accepted of God, "Elisabeth shall bear thee a son." Note, It is very comfortable to praying people to know that their prayers are heard; and those mercies are doubly sweet that are given in answer to prayer.

2. He shall have a son in his old age, by Elisabeth his wife, who had been long barren, that by this birth, which was next due to miraculous, people might be prepared to receive and believe a virgin's bringing forth a son, which was perfectly miraculous. He is directed what name to give his son, "Call him John;" in Hebrew, Johanan, a name we often meet with in the Old Testament; it signifies "Gracious." The priests must beseech God that he will be gracious, Mal. i. 9; and must so bless the people, Num. vi. 25. Zacharias was now praying thus, and the angel tells him his prayer is heard, and he shall have a son, whom, in token of an answer to his prayer, he shall call Gracious; or, the Lord will be gracious, Isa. xxx. 18, 19.

3. This son shall be the joy of his family, and of all his relations, ver. 14; he shall be another Isaac, "thy laughter;" and some think that is partly intended in his name, John; he shall be a welcome child. "Thou" for thy part, "shalt have joy and gladness." Note, Mercies that have been long waited for, when they come at last are the more acceptable; he shall be such a son as thou shalt have reason to rejoice in. Many parents, if they could foresee what their children will prove, instead of rejoicing at their birth, would wish they had never been. But I will tell thee what thy son will be, and then thou wilt not need to rejoice with trembling at his birth, as the best must do, but mayest rejoice with triumph at it. Nay, and "many shall rejoice at his birth;" all the relations of the family will rejoice in it, and all its well-wishers, because it is for the honour and comfort of the family, ver. 58. All good people will rejoice that such a religious couple as Zacharias and Elisabeth have a son, because they will give him a good education, such as it may be hoped will make him a public blessing the narrations in question comprised any of our present extant Gospels. They were probably unofficial accounts, without authority, and as such soon sank into oblivion; so much so, that we have no trace of one of them, except in this general allusion to them. The words in verse 3 rendered "having had perfect understanding of all things from the very first," should rather be translated, "having traced down accurately all things from the very first." Indeed, Luke gives the fullest account of the earliest events connected with the life of our Lord. From the words "to write unto thee in order" we are not compelled to infer that a literally chronological method is followed. The history is a consecutive one, but there is reason to believe that the historical sequence of events is sometimes departed from. The truthfulness of the record is, however, plainly asserted. Luke does not profess to have been an eye-witness of the occurrences which form the subject-matter of his history. He obtained his information from other sources, probably in part from eye-witnesses to his generation. Yea, and perhaps many shall rejoice by an unaccountable instinct, as a presage of the joyous days the Gospel will introduce.

4. This son shall be a mighty favourite of Heaven, and a mighty blessing to the earth. The honour of having a son is nothing to the honour of having such a son.

1st. "He shall be great in the sight of the Lord," and those are great indeed that are so in God's sight, not those that are so in the eye of a vain and carnal world. God will set him before his face continually, will employ him in his work, and send him on his errands, and that shall make him truly great and honourable. He shall be a prophet, yea, more than a prophet, and upon that account as great as any that ever were born of women, Mat. xi. 11. He shall live very much retired from the world, out of men's sight, and when he makes a public appearance it will be very mean, but he shall be much, "he shall be great in the sight of the Lord."

2nd. He shall be a Nazarite, set apart to God from every thing that is polluting; and in token of that, according to the law of Nazariteship, "he shall drink neither wine nor strong drink," or rather, "neither old wine nor new;" for most think the word here translated "strong drink" signifies some sort of wine, perhaps those that we call made wines, or any thing that is intoxicating. He shall be as Samson by the Divine precept, Jud. xiii. 7, and Samuel by his mother's vow, 1 Sam. i. 11, a Nazarite for life. It is spoken of as a great instance of God's favour to his people, that he raised up of their sons for prophets, and their young men for Nazarites, Am. ii. 11; as if those that were designed for prophets were trained up under the discipline of the Nazarites. Samuel and John Baptist were; which intimates that those that would be eminent servants of God, and employed in eminent services, must learn to live a life of self-denial and mortification, must be dead to the pleasures of sense, and keep their minds from every thing that is darkening and disturbing to them.

3rd. He shall be abundantly fitted and qualified for those great and eminent services to which in due time he shall be called; "he shall be filled with the Holy Ghost, even from his mother's womb;" and as soon as it is possible he shall appear to have been so. Observe, First. Those that would be filled with the Holy Ghost must be sober and temperate, and very moderate in the use of wine and strong drink; for that is it that fits him for this: "Be not drunk with wine, but be filled with the Spirit," with which that is not consistent, Eph. v. 18. Secondly. It is possible that infants may be wrought upon by the Holy Ghost, even from their mother's womb, for John Baptist even then was filled with the Holy Ghost, who took possession of his heart betimes; and an early specimen was given of it, when he leaped in his mother's womb for joy at the approach of the Saviour; and afterwards it appeared very early that he was sanctified. God has promised to pour out his Spirit upon the seed of believers, Isa. xlv. 3; and their first springing up in a dedication of themselves betimes to God is the fruit of it, ver. 4, 5. Who then can forbid water that they should not be baptized, who for aught we know (and we can say no more of the adult, witness Simon Magus,) have received the Holy Ghost as well as we, and have the seeds of grace sown in their hearts? Acts x. 47.

4th. He shall be instrumental for the conversion of many souls to God, and the preparing of them to receive and entertain the Gospel of Christ, ver. 16, 17.

First. He shall be sent to the children of Israel, to the nation of the Jews, to whom the Messiah also was first sent, and not to the Gentiles; to the whole nation, and not to the family of the priests only; with which, though he was himself of that family, we do not find he had any particular intimacy, nor influence upon them.

Secondly. He shall go before the Lord their God, that is, before the Messiah, whom they must expect to be, not their king, in the sense wherein they commonly take it, a temporal prince to their nation, but their Lord and their God, to rule and defend, and serve them in a spiritual way, by his influences on their hearts. Thomas knew this when he said to Christ, "My Lord, and my God," better than Nathanael did, when he said, "Rabbi, thou art the king of Israel." John "shall go before him," a little before him, to give notice of his approach, and to prepare people to receive him.

Thirdly. "He shall go in the spirit and power of Elias." That is, 1st. He shall be such a man as Elias was, and do such work as Elias did; shall, like him, wear a hairy garment and a leathern girdle, and live retired from the world; shall, like him, preach the necessity of repentance and reformation to a very corrupt and degenerate age; shall, like him, be bold and zealous in re-proving sin, and witnessing against it even in the greatest; and be hated and persecuted for it, by a Herod and his Herodias, as Elijah was by an Ahab and his Jezebel. He shall be carried on in his work as Elijah was, by a Divine spirit and power, which shall crown his ministry with wonderful success. As Elias went before the writing prophets of the Old Testament, and did as it were usher in that signal period of the Old Testament dispensation, by a little writing of his own, 2 Chr. xxi. 12; so John Baptist went before Christ and his apostles, and introduced the gospel dispensation, by preaching the substance of the gospel doctrine and duty, Repent, with an eye to the kingdom of heaven. 2nd. He shall be that very person who was prophesied of by Malachi, under the name of Elijah, Mal. iv. 5, who should be sent "before the coming of the day of the Lord." "Behold! I send you a prophet, even Elias," not Elias the Tishbite, as the Septuagint have corruptly read it, to favour the Jews' traditions, but a prophet "in the spirit and power of Elias," as the angel here expounds it.

Fourthly. "He shall turn many of the children of Israel to the Lord their God," that is, shall incline their hearts to receive the Messiah, and bid him welcome, by awakening them to a sense of sin, and a desire of righteousness. Whatever has a tendency to turn us from iniquity, as John's preaching and baptism had, will turn us to Christ, as our Lord and our God; for those who through grace, are wrought upon to shake off the yoke of sin, that is, the dominion of the world and the flesh, will soon be persuaded to take upon them the yoke of the Lord Jesus.

Fifthly. Hereby he shall "turn the hearts of the fathers to the children," that is, of the Jews to the Gentiles; shall help to conquer the rooted prejudices which the Jews have against the Gentiles, which was done by the Gospel, as far as it prevailed; and was begun to be done by John Baptist, who came "for a witness, that all through him might believe," who baptized and taught Roman soldiers, as well as Jewish Pharisees; and who cured the pride and confidence of those Jews who gloried in their having Abraham to their father; and told them that God would "out of stones raise up children unto Abraham," Mat. iii. 9, which would tend to cure their enmity to the Gentiles. Dr. Lightfoot observes, that it is the constant usage of the prophets to speak of the church of the Gentiles as children to the Jewish church, Isa. liv. 5, 6, 13; lx. 4, 9; lxii. 5; lxvi. 12. When the Jews that embraced the faith of Christ were brought to join in communion with the Gentiles that did go too, then the heart of the fathers was turned to the children. And he shall "turn the disobedient to the wisdom of the just," that is, he shall introduce the Gospel, by which the Gentiles, that are now disobedient, shall be turned, not so much to their fathers, the Jews, but to the faith of Christ, here called "the wisdom of the just," in communion with the believing Jews; or thus, "He shall turn the hearts of the fathers with the children," that is, of old and young; shall be instrumental to bring some of every age to be religious, to work a great reformation in the Jewish nation, to bring them off from a ritual, traditional religion, which they had rested in, and to bring them up to substantial, serious godliness; and the effects of this will be, that enmities will be slain, and discord made to cease; and they that are at variance, being united in his baptism, will be better reconciled one to another. And this agrees with the account Josephus gives of John Baptist, Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 7, that "he was a good man, and taught the Jews the exercise of virtue, in piety towards God, and righteousness towards one another, and that they should convene and knit together in baptism." And he saith, "the people mocked after him, and were exceedingly delighted in his doctrine." Thus he turned the hearts of fathers and children to God, and one another, by "turning the disobedient to the wisdom of the just." Observe, 1st. True religion is the wisdom of just men, in distinction from the wisdom of this world. It is both our wisdom and our duty to be religious; there is both equity and prudence in it. 2nd. It is not impossible but that those who have been unbelieving and disobedient may be turned to the wisdom of the just. Divine grace can conquer the greatest ignorances and prejudices. 3rd. The great design of the Gospel is to bring people home to God, and to bring them nearer to one another; and on this errand John Baptist is sent. And in the mention that is twice made of his turning people, there seems to be an allusion to the name of the Tishbite, which is given to Elijah, which some think doth not denote the country or city he was of, but has an appellative signification; and therefore they render it Elijah the converter, one that was much employed and very successful in conversion work. The Elias of the New Testament is therefore said to turn or convert, many to the Lord their God.

5. Hereby he shall "make ready a people prepared for the Lord;" shall dispose the minds of people to receive the doctrine of Christ, that thereby they may be prepared for the comforts of his coming. Note, 1st. All that are to be devoted to the Lord, and made happy in him, must first be prepared and made ready for him. We must be prepared by grace in this world, for glory in the other; by the terrors of the law, for the comforts of the Gospel; by the spirit of bondage, for the spirit of adoption. 2nd. Nothing has a more direct tendency to prepare people for Christ than the doctrine of repentance received and submitted to. When sin is thereby made grievous, Christ will become very precious.

Fourthly. Zacharias' unbelief of the angel's prediction, and the rebuke he was laid under for that unbelief. He heard all that the angel had to say, and should have bowed his head, and worshipped the Lord, saying, "Be it unto thy servant according to the word" which thou hast spoken; but it was not so. We are here told.

1. What his unbelief spoke, ver. 18. He said to the angel, "Whereby shall I know this?" This was not a humble petition for the confirming of his faith, but a peevish objection against what was said to him, as altogether incredible; as if he should say, I can never be made to believe this. He could not but perceive that it was an angel that spake to him; the message delivered having reference to the Old Testament prophecies, carried much of its own evidence along with it. There are many instances in the Old Testament of those that had children when they were old, yet he cannot believe he shall have this child of promise, for I am an old man, and my wife "has not only been all her days barren, but is now 'well stricken in years,' and not likely ever to have children; therefore he must have a sign given him, or he will not believe. Though the appearance of an angel, which had been long disused in the church, was sign enough; though he had this notice given him in the temple, the place of God's oracles, where he had reason to think no evil angel would be permitted to come; though it was given him when he was praying, and burning incense; and though a firm belief of that great principle of religion, that God has an almighty power, and with him nothing is impossible, which he ought not only to know but to teach others, was enough to silence all objections; yet considering his own body and his wife's too much, unlike a son of Abraham, he staggered at the promise, Rom. iv. 19, 20.

2. How his unbelief was silenced, and he silenced for it. 1st. The angel stops his mouth, by asserting his authority. Doth he ask, "Whereby shall I know this?" Let him know it by this, "I am Gabriel," ver. 19. He puts his name to his prophecy, doth as it were sign it with his own hand, teste metropo.—take my word for it. Angels have sometimes refused to tell their names, as to Manoah and his wife; but this angel readily saith, "I am Gabriel," which signifies the power of God; or, the mighty one of God, intimating that the God who bade him say this was able to make it good. He also makes himself known by this name, to put him in mind of the notices of the Messiah's coming sent to Daniel by the man Gabriel, Dan. viii. 16; ix. 21: "I am the same that was sent then, and am sent now, in pursuance of the same intention." He is "Gabriel, that stands in the presence of God," an immediate attendant upon the throne of God. The prime ministers of state in the Persian court are described by this, that they saw the king's face, Est. i. 14. "Though I am now talking with thee here, yet 'I stand in the presence of God.' I know his eye is upon me; and I dare not say any more than I have warrant to say; but I declare 'I am sent to speak to thee,' sent on purpose, 'to shew thee these glad tidings,' which being so well worthy of all acceptance, thou oughtest to have received cheerfully."

2nd. The angel stops his mouth, indeed, by exerting his power: That thou mayest object no more, "Behold, thou shalt be dumb," ver. 20. If thou wilt have a sign for the support of thy faith, it shall be such a one as shall be also the punishment of thine unbelief: "thou shalt not be able to speak till the day that these things shall be performed," ver. 20. "Thou shalt be both dumb and deaf, the same words signify both; and it is plain that he lost his hearing as well as his speech, for his friends made signs to him, ver. 22, as well as he to them, ver. 22. Now, in striking him dumb, First. God dealt justly with him, because he had objected against God's word; and from hence we may take occasion to admire the patience of God, and his forbearance towards us, that we, who have so often spoke to his dishonour, yet have not been struck dumb, as Zacharias was, as we had been if God had dealt with us according to our sins. Secondly. God dealt kindly with him, and very tenderly and graciously. For 1st. Thus he prevented his speaking any more such distrustful, unbelieving words. If he have thought evil, and will not himself lay his hand upon his mouth, nor keep it as with a bridle, God will: it is better not to speak at all, than to speak wickedly. 2nd. Thus he confirmed his faith; and by his being disabled to speak, he is enabled to think the better. If, by the rebukes we are under for our sin, we be brought to give more credit to the Word of God, we have no reason to complain of them. 3rd. Thus he was kept from divulging the vision, and boasting of it, which otherwise he would have been apt to do; whereas it was designed, for the present, to be lodged as a secret with him. 4th. It was a great mercy that God's words should be fulfilled in their season, notwithstanding his sinful distrust. The unbelief of man shall not make the promises of God of none effect; they shall be fulfilled in their

and in part from sundry documents which then existed. When he wrote authentic accounts were easily accessible. We know from Acts xxi. 17 that he met with James at Jerusalem, in company with Paul. Lange says, "The conjecture of a Dutch theologian that Luke, in writing the history of the Nativity, made use of an original written narrative by James, the brother of our Lord, which was afterwards lost, and replaced by the apocryphal Gospel of James, deserves mention."

i. 5. An ancient Syrian chronicle says, "It is said that Herod was one of the Gentiles (a pagan), that he was from Ascalon, and was priest of the idol Apollo." This is mere tradition, Herod was an Idumean, and from his re-construction of the Temple, and other facts, we may conclude that he professed Judaism. The priests were divided into twenty-four courses, who ministered by turns in the Temple. The course of Abia, or Abijah, was the eighth (1 Chron. xxiv. 10). Elisabeth is the same name as Elisheba (Exod. vi. 23).

season, and he shall not be for ever dumb, but only "till the day that these things shall be performed;" and then thy lips shall be opened, that thy mouth may shew forth God's praise. Thus, though God chasten the iniquity of his people with the rod, yet his lovingkindness he will not take away.

Fifthly. The return of Zacharias to the people, and at length to his family; and the conception of this child of promise, the son of his old age.

1. The people stayed, expecting Zacharias to come out of the temple, because he was to pronounce the blessing upon them, in the name of the Lord; and though he stayed beyond the usual time, yet they did not, as is too common in Christian congregations, hurry away without the blessing, but waited for him, marvelling "that he tarried so long in the temple," and afraid lest something was amiss, ver. 21.

2. When he came out he was speechless, ver. 22. He was now to have dismissed the congregation with a blessing, but is dumb, and not able to do it, that the people may be minded to expect the Messiah, who can command the blessing, who blesteth indeed, and in whom all the nations of the earth are blessed. Aaron's priesthood is now shortly to be silenced and set aside, to make way for the bringing in of a better hope.

3. He made a shift to give them to understand that he had seen a vision, by some awful signs he made, "for he beckoned to them, and remained speechless," ver. 22. This represents to us the weakness and deficiency of the Levitical priesthood, in comparison with Christ's priesthood and the dispensation of the Gospel. The Old Testament speaks by signs, gives us some intimations of Divine and heavenly things, but imperfect and uncertain; it beckons to us, but remains speechless; it is the Gospel that speaks to us articulately, and gives us a clear view of that which in the Old Testament was seen through a glass darkly.

4. He stayed out "the days of his ministration;" for his lot being to burn incense, he could do that, though he was dumb and deaf. When we cannot perform the service of God so well as we would, yet if we perform it so well as we can, God will accept of us in it.

5. He then returned to his family, and his wife conceived, ver. 23, 24. She conceived by virtue of the promise, and being sensible of it, "she hid herself five months;" she kept house, and kept it private, and did not go abroad so much as she used to do. 1st. Lest she should do herself any prejudice, so as might occasion her miscarrying, or any hurt to the conception. 2nd. Lest she should contract any ceremonial pollution which might intrench upon the Nazariteship of her child, remembering the command given to Samson's mother, in a like case, and applying it to herself, she must not touch any unclean thing while she is with child of a Nazarite, Jud. xiii. 14. And though five months are mentioned, because of what follows in the sixth month, yet we may suppose she did in like manner take care of herself during the whole time of her being with child. 3rd. Some think it was in an excess of modesty that she hid herself, ashamed it should be said that one of her age should be with child, "Shall she have pleasure, being old, her lord being old also?" Gen. xviii. 12; or, it was in a token of her humility, that she might not seem to boast of the honour God had put upon her. 4th. She hid herself for devotion, that she might spend her time in prayer and praise. The saints are God's hidden ones; she gives this reason for her retirement, for "thus hath the Lord dealt with me;" not only thus graciously, in giving me a child, but thus honourably, in giving me such a child as is to be a Nazarite; for so her husband might by writing signify to her. He hath "taken away my reproach among men." Fruitfulness was looked upon to be so great a blessing among the Jews, because of the promises of the increase of their nation, and the rising of the Messiah among them, that it was a great reproach to be barren; and those who were so, though never so blameless, yet were concluded to be guilty of some great sin unknown, for which they were so punished. Now Elisabeth triumphs, that not only this reproach is taken away, but great glory is put upon her instead of it; "Thus hath the Lord dealt with me," beyond any thought or expectation of mine, "in the days wherein he looked on me." Note, In God's gracious dealings with us, we ought to observe his gracious regards to us. He has looked on us with compassion and favour, and therefore hath thus dealt with us.

26 And in the sixth month the angel Gabriel was sent from God unto a city of Galilee, named Nazareth, 27 To a virgin espoused to a man whose name was Joseph, of the house of David; and the virgin's name was Mary. 28 And the angel came in unto her, and said, Hail, thou that art highly favoured, the Lord is with thee: blessed art thou among women. 29 And when she saw him, she was troubled at his saying, and cast in her mind what manner of salutation this should be. 30 And the angel said unto her, Fear not, Mary: for thou hast found favour with God. 31 And, behold, thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a son, and shalt call his name JESUS. 32 He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest: and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David: 33 And he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end. 34 Then said Mary unto the angel, How shall this be, seeing I know not a man? 35 And the angel answered and said unto her, The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee: therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God. 36 And, behold, thy cousin Elisabeth, she hath also conceived a son in her old age: and this is the sixth month with her, who was called barren. 37 For with God nothing shall be impossible. 38 And Mary said, Behold the handmaid of the Lord; be it unto me according to thy word. And the angel departed from her.

We have here notice given us of all it was fit we should know concerning the incarnation and conception of our blessed Saviour, six months after the conception of John. The same angel, Gabriel, that was employed in making known to Zacharias God's purposes concerning his son, is employed in this also; for in this, the same glorious work of redemption, which was begun in that, is carried on. As bad angels are none of the redeemed, so good angels are none of the redeemers; yet they are employed by the Redeemer as his messengers, and they go cheerfully on his errands, because they are his Father's humble servants, and his children's hearty friends and wellwishers.

First, We have here an account given of the mother of our Lord, of whom he was to be born, whom though we are not to pray to, yet we ought to praise God for.

1. Her name was Mary, the same name with Miriam, the sister of Moses and Aaron; the name signifies exalted, and a great elevation it was to her indeed, to be thus favoured above all the daughters of the house of David.

2. She was a daughter of the royal family, lineally descended from David, and herself and all her friends knew it, for she went under the title and character of the house of David, though she was poor and low in the world; and she was enabled by God's providence, and the care of the Jews to preserve their genealogies, to make it out; and as long as the promise of the Messiah was to be fulfilled, it was worth keeping; but for those now, who are brought low in the world, to have descended from persons of honour, is not worth mentioning.

3. She was a virgin, a pure unspotted one, but espoused to one of the same royal stock, but, like her, of low estate; so that upon both accounts there was, as it is fit there should be, an equality among them. His name was Joseph; he also was "of the house of David," Mat. i. 20. Christ's mother was a virgin, because he was not to be born by ordinary generation, but miraculously; it was necessary he should be so, that though he must partake of the nature of man, yet not of the corruption of that nature. But he was born of a virgin espoused, made up to be married, and contracted, to put honour upon the married state, that that might not be brought into contempt, which was an ordinance in innocency, by the Redeemer's being born of a virgin.

4. She lived in Nazareth, a city of Galilee, a remote corner of the country, and in no reputation for religion or learning; but it bordered upon the heathen, and therefore was called Galilee of the Gentiles. Christ's having his relations resident there, intimates favour in reserve for the Gentile world. And Dr. Lightfoot observes, "that Jonah was by birth a Galilean, and Elijah and Elisha very much conversant in Galilee, who were all famous prophets of the Gentiles." The angel was sent to her to Nazareth. Note, No distance, or disadvantage of place, shall be a prejudice to those whom God has favours in store for. The angel Gabriel carries his message as cheerfully to Mary at Nazareth in Galilee, as to Zacharias in the temple at Jerusalem.

Secondly, The address of the angel to her, ver. 28. We are not told what she was doing, or how employed, when the angel came unto her; but he surprised her with this salutation, "Hail, thou that art highly favoured!" This was intended to raise in her, 1st. A value for herself; and though it is very rare that any need to have any sparks struck into their breast with such design, yet in some, who, like Mary, pore only upon their low estate, there is occasion for it. 2nd. An expectation of great news, not from abroad, but from above. Heaven designs, no doubt, uncommon favours for one whom an angel makes court to with such respect: "Hail, thou," Xaίρε, Rejoice thou; "it was the usual form of salutation; it expreseth an esteem of her, and goodwill to her and her posterity."

1. She is dignified: "thou art highly favoured;" God, in his choice of thee to be the mother of the Messiah, has put an honour upon thee peculiar to thyself, above that of Eve, who was the mother of all living. The vulgar Latin translates this, gratia plena,—"full of grace," and from thence gathers, that she had more of the inherent graces of the Spirit than ever any had; whereas it is certain this speaks no other than the singular favour done her in preferring her to conceive and bear our blessed Lord; an honour which, since he was to be "the seed of the woman," some woman must have; not for personal merit, but purely for the sake of free grace, and she is pitched upon; "even so, Father, because it seemed good unto thee."

2. She has the presence of God with her; "the Lord is with thee," though poor and mean, and perhaps now forecasting how to get a livelihood, and maintain a family, in the married state. The angel with this word raised the faith of Gideon, Jud. vi. 12, "the Lord is with thee." Nothing is to be despised of, not the performance of any service, not the obtaining of any favour, though never so great, if we have God with us. This word might put her in mind of the "Immanuel, God with us, which a virgin shall conceive, and bear," Isa. vii. 14; and why not she?

3. She has the blessing of God upon her; "blessed art thou among women;" not only thou shalt be accounted so by men, but thou shalt be so. Thou that art so highly favoured in this instance, mayest expect in other things to be blessed; she explains this herself, ver. 48, "All generations shall call me blessed;" compare it with that which Deborah saith of Jael, another that was the glory of her sex, Jud. v. 24: "Blessed shall she be above women in the tent."

Thirdly, The consternation she was in upon this address, ver. 29; "when she saw him," and the glories with which he was surrounded, "she was troubled" at the sight of him, and much more "at his saying." Had she been a proud, ambitious young woman, that aimed high, and flattered herself with the expectation of great things in the world, she would have been pleased at his saying, would have been puffed up with it, and, as we have reason to think she was a young woman of very good sense, would have had an answer ready, signifying so much but instead of that, she is confounded at it, as not conscious to herself of any thing that either merited, or promised any such great things. "and she cast in her mind what manner of salutation this should be;" was it from heaven, or of men? was it to amuse her? was it to ensnare her? was

She was descended from Aaron, and, therefore, like her husband, of the tribe of Levi. There is an old tradition that Zacharias was high-priest, but there is nothing to justify it.

i. 8, 9. It was decided by lot who should perform the separate portions of the Temple services, and, therefore, who should burn the incense before the Lord morning and evening. It was a special honour to burn incense; and Josephus mentions that the high priest, John Hyrcanus, was favoured with a revelation during the performance of that duty. On these occasions the priest was alone in the holy place, while the people were outside at their devotions. The altar of incense was in the holy place, which the people were not allowed to enter.

i. 19. The name of Gabriel signifies "man of God," or "hero of God," and first appears in the Old Testament, in the eighth and ninth chapters of Daniel. The rabbis say that the names of the angels were brought up from Babylon by the Jews on their return from the

It to banter her? or, was there something substantial and weighty in it? But of all the thoughts she had—what manner of salutation it should be," I believe she had not the least idea of its being ever intended, or used, for a prayer, as it is and has been for many ages by the corrupt, degenerate, and antichristian ages of the church; and to be ten times repeated for the Lord's Prayer once; so it is in the church of Rome. But her thoughtfulness upon this occasion gives a very useful intimation to young people of her sex, when addresses are made to them, to consider and cast in their minds what manner of salutations they are, whence they come, and what their tendency is, that they may receive them accordingly; and may always stand on their guard.

Fourthly, The message itself, which the angel had to deliver to her. Some time the angel gives her to pause; but observing that that did but increase her perplexity, he went on with his errand, ver. 30. To what he had said she made no reply; he therefore confirms it: "Fear not, Mary!" I have no other design but to assure thee that "thou hast found favour with God" more than thou thinkest of, as there are many who think they are more favoured of God than really they are. Note, Those that have "found favour with God" should not give way to disquieting, distrustful fears. Doth God favour thee? Fear not, though the world frown upon thee. Is he for thee? No matter who is against thee.

1. Though she is a virgin, she shall have the honour of being a mother; "thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a son;" and thou shalt have the naming of him, thou shalt call his name Jesus," ver. 31. It was the sentence upon Eve, though she should have the honour to be "the mother of all living;" yet this mortification shall be an allay to that honour, that "her desire shall be to her husband," and "he shall rule over her," Gen. iii. 16. But Mary has the honour without the allay.

2. Though she lives in poverty and obscurity, yet she shall have the honour to be the mother of the Messiah; her son shall be named Jesus, a Saviour, such a one as the world needs, rather than such a one as the Jews expect.

1st. He will be very nearly allied to the upper world; "he shall be great," truly great, uncontestedly great; for he "shall be called the Son of the Highest," the Son of God, who is the Highest; of the same nature, as the Son of the same nature with the Father; and very dear to him, as the Son is to the Father. He shall be called, and not mis-called, the Son of the Highest; for he is himself "God over all, blessed for evermore," Rom. ix. 5. Note, Those who are the children of God, though but by adoption and regeneration, are truly great, and therefore are concerned to be very good, 1 Jno. iii. 1, 2.

2nd. He will be very highly preferred in the lower world; for though born under the most disadvantageous circumstances possible, and appearing in the form of a servant, yet "the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David," ver. 32. He puts her in mind that she was "of the house of David;" and that therefore, since neither the Salique law nor the right of primogeniture took place in the entail of his throne, it was not impossible but that she might bring forth an heir to it, and therefore might the more easily believe it, when she was told, by an angel from heaven, that she should do so. That after the sceptre had been long departed from that ancient and honourable family, it should now at length return to it again, to remain in it; not by succession, but in the same hand to eternity. His people will not give him that throne, will not acknowledge his right to rule them; but the Lord God shall give him a right to rule them, and set him as his king upon the "holy hill of Zion." He assures her, First, That his kingdom shall be spiritual; "he shall reign over the house of Jacob," not Israel "according to the flesh;" for they neither came into his interests, nor did they continue long a people; it must therefore be a spiritual kingdom, the house of Israel "according to promise," that he must rule over. Secondly, That it shall be eternal: he shall reign for ever; "and of his kingdom there shall be no end," as there had been long since of the temporal reign of David's house; and would shortly be of the state of Israel; other crowns endure not to every generation, but Christ's doth, Pr. xxvii. 4. The Gospel is the last dispensation, we are to look for no other.

Fifthly, The farther information given her upon her inquiry concerning the birth of this prince.

1. It is a just inquiry which she makes, "How shall this be?" ver. 34. How can I now presently conceive a child, (for so the angel meant,) "when I know not a man?" must it therefore be otherwise than by ordinary generation? If so, let me know how? She knew that the Messiah must be born of a virgin, and if she must be his mother, she desires to know how. This was not the language of her distrust, or any doubt of what the angel said, but of a desire to be farther instructed.

2. It is a satisfactory answer that is given to it, ver. 35. 1st. She shall conceive by the power of the Holy Ghost, whose proper work and office it is to sanctify; and therefore to sanctify the virgin for this purpose: the Holy Ghost is called "the power of the Highest." Doth she ask how this shall be? This is enough to help her over all the difficulty there appears in it; a Divine power will undertake it, not the power of an angel employed in it, as in other works of wonder; but the power of the Holy Ghost himself. 2nd. She must ask no questions concerning the way and manner how it shall be wrought; for "the Holy Ghost," as "the power of the Highest, shall overshadow her," as the cloud covered the tabernacle, when the glory of God took possession of it, to conceal it from those that would too curiously observe the motions of it, and pry into the mystery of it. The formation of every babe in the womb, and the entrance of the spirit of life into it, is a mystery in nature; none knows "the way of the spirit, nor how the bones are formed in the womb of her that is with child," Eccl. xi. 5. We were "made in secret," Ps. cxxxix. 15, 16. Much more was the formation of the child Jesus a mystery; "without controversy, great was the mystery of godliness, God manifest in the flesh," 1 Tim. iii. 16. It is "a new thing created in the earth," Jer. xxxi. 22; concerning which we must not covet to be wise above what is written. 3rd. The child she shall conceive is a holy thing, and therefore must not be conceived by ordinary generation; because he must not share in the common corruption and pollution of the human nature; he is spoken of emphatically, "that holy thing," such as never was. And he shall be called the Son of God, as the Son of the Father by eternal generation; and as an indication of that, he shall now be formed by the Holy Ghost in the present conception. His human nature must be so produced as it was fit that should be which was to be taken into union with the Divine nature.

3. It was a farther encouragement to her faith to be told that her cousin Elisabeth, though stricken in years, was with child, ver. 36. Here is an age of wonders beginning, and therefore be not surprised! Here is one among thy own relations truly great, though not altogether so great as this; it is usual with God to advance in working wonders: "greater works than these shall ye do." Though Elisabeth was, on the father's side, of the daughters of Aaron, ver. 5, yet on the mother's side she might be of the house of David; for those two families often intermarried, as an earnest of the uniting of the royalty and the priesthood in the Messiah. "This is the sixth month with her that was called barren;" this intimates, as Dr. Lightfoot thinks, that all the instances in the Old Testament of those having children that had been long barren, which was above nature, were designed to prepare the world for the belief of a virgin's bearing a son, which was against nature. And, therefore, even in the birth of Isaac Abraham saw Christ's day, foresaw such a miracle in the birth of Christ. The angel assures Mary of this, to encourage her faith, and concludes with that great truth of undoubted certainty, and universal use, for "with God nothing shall be impossible," ver. 37; and if nothing, then not this. Abraham therefore staggered not at the belief of the Divine promise, because he was strong in his belief of the Divine power, Rom. iv. 20, 21. No word of God must be incredible to us, as long as no work of God is impossible to him.

Sixthly, Her acquiescence in the will of God concerning her, ver. 38. She owns herself, 1. A believing subject to the Divine authority: "Behold the handmaid of the Lord!" Lord, I am at thy service, at thy dispose, to do what thou commandest me. She objects not the danger of spoiling her marriage, and blemishing her reputation; but leaves the issue with God, and submits entirely to his will. 2. A believing expectant of the Divine favour. She is not only content it should be so, but humbly desires it may be so: "be it unto me according to thy word." Such a favour as this it was not for her to slight, or to be indifferent to; and for what God has promised, he will be sought unto; by prayer we must put our amen, or so be it, to the promise. "Remember," and perform "thy word unto thy servant, upon which thou hast caused me to hope." We must, as Mary here, guide our desires by the Word of God, and ground our hopes upon it. "Be it unto me according to thy word;" just so, and no otherwise.

Hereupon "the angel departed from her;" having completed the errand he was sent upon, returned to give account of it, and receive new instructions. Converse with angels was always a transient thing, and soon over; it will be constant and permanent in the future state. And it is generally supposed, that just at this instant the virgin conceived, by the overshadowing power of the Holy Ghost; but the Scripture being decently silent concerning that, it doth not become us to be inquisitive, much less positive.

39 And Mary arose in those days, and went into the hill country with haste, into a city of Juda; 40 And entered into the house of Zacharias, and saluted Elisabeth. 41 And it came to pass, that, when Elisabeth heard the salutation of Mary, the babe leaped in her womb; and Elisabeth was filled with the Holy Ghost: 42 And she spake out with a loud voice, and said, Blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb. 43 And whence is this to me, that the mother of my Lord should come to me? 44 For, lo, as soon as the voice of thy salutation sounded in mine ears, the babe leaped in my womb for joy. 45 And blessed is she that believed: for there shall be a performance of those things which were told her from the Lord. 46 And Mary said, My soul doth magnify the Lord, 47 And my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour. 48 For he hath regarded the low estate of his handmaiden: for, behold, from henceforth all generations shall call me blessed. 49 For he that is mighty hath done to me great things; and holy is his name. 50 And his mercy is on them that fear him from generation to generation. 51 He hath shewed strength with his arm; he hath scattered the proud in the imagination of their hearts. 52 He hath put down the mighty from their seats, and exalted them of low degree. 53 He hath filled the hungry with good things; and the rich he hath sent empty away. 54 He hath holpen his servant Israel, in remembrance of his mercy; 55 As he spake to our fathers, to Abraham, and to his seed for ever. 56 And Mary abode with her about three months, and returned to her own house.

We have here an interview between the two happy mothers, Elisabeth and Mary. The angel, by intimating to Mary the favour bestowed on her cousin Elisabeth, ver. 36, gave occasion for it; and sometimes it may prove a better piece of service than we think to bring good people together to compare notes. Here is,

First, The visit which Mary made to Elisabeth. Mary was the younger, and younger with child; and therefore, if they must come together, it was fittest that Mary should take the journey, not insisting on the preference which the greater dignity of her conception gave her, ver. 39; she arose, and left her affairs, to attend this great matter. "In those days," that is, at that time, (as it is commonly explained, Jer. xxxiii. 15; 1. 4.) in a day or two after the angel had visited her, taking some time first, as it is supposed, for her devotion, or rather hastening away to her cousin's, where she would have more leisure, and better help, in the family of a priest; she went, μετὰ σπουδῆς,—"with care and diligence, captivity; from which it has been inferred that these names are of Assyrian or pagan origin. That they are not pagan is shown by their etymology; and among all the readings of Assyrian inscriptions no such names have been discovered. These two facts are sufficient to overthrow the theory of the German rationalists; and we may conclude that, if the names were not known before the captivity, they were revealed during the captivity. These names are no more derived from the Persian system than from the Assyrian, as is shown by their etymology, which is Shemitic and not Persian. The Jews, who have no doubt invented much in regard to the angels, and who regard them as of various ranks, the chief being known as archangels, have been followed by some Christians, and Gabriel has been styled an archangel. For this there is no authority in Scripture, where the term archangel occurs but twice; once without a name (1 Thess. iv. 16), and once in connection with the name of Michael (Jude 9). The Jewish notion, adopted by many Christians, and expedition; not as young people commonly go abroad, and visit their friends, to divert herself, but to inform herself. She went "to a city of Judah in the hill country;" it is not named, but by comparing the description of it here with Jos. xxi. 10, 11, it appears to be Hebron; for that is there said to be "in the hill country of Judah," and to belong to the priests, the sons of Aaron. Thither Mary hastened, though it was a long journey, some scores of miles.

1. Dr. Lightfoot offers a conjecture, that she was to conceive of our Saviour there at Hebron; and perhaps had so much intimated to her by the angel, or some other way; and therefore she made such haste thither. He thinks it probable that Shiloh, of the tribe of Judah, and the seed of David, should be conceived in a city of Judah and of David, as he was to be born in Bethlehem, another city which belonged to them both. In Hebron, the promise was given of Isaac, circumcision was instituted. Here, saith he, Abraham had his first land, and David his first crown. Here lay interred the three couple, Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebecca, Jacob and Leah; and, as antiquity has held, Adam and Eve. He therefore thinks it suits singularly with the harmony and consent which God useth in his works, that the promise should begin to take place by the conception of the Messiah even among those patriarchs to whom it was given. I see no improbability in the conjecture, but add this for the support of it, that Elisabeth said, ver. 45, "there shall be a performance;" as if it were not performed yet, but was to be performed there.

2. It is generally supposed that she went thither for the confirming of her faith, by the sign which the angel had given her, her cousin's being with child, and to rejoice with her sister favourite. And besides, she went thither perhaps that she might be more retired from company, or else might have more agreeable company than she could have in Nazareth. We may suppose she did not acquaint any of her neighbours at Nazareth with the message she had received from heaven, yet longed to talk over a thing she had a thousand times thought over, and knew no person in the world with whom she could freely converse concerning it but her cousin Elisabeth, and therefore she hastened to her. Note, It is very beneficial and comfortable for those that have a good work of grace begun in their souls, and Christ in the forming there, to consult those who are in the same case, that they may communicate experiences one to another; and they will find that, as in water face answers to face, so doth the heart of man to man, of Christian to Christian.

Secondly, The meeting between Mary and Elisabeth. Mary entered into the house of Zacharias, but he being dumb and deaf, it is likely he kept his chamber, and saw no company, and therefore she saluted Elisabeth, ver. 40; told her she was come to make her a visit, to know her state, and rejoice with her in her joy. Now at their first coming together, for the confirmation of the faith of both of them, there was something very extraordinary. Mary knew that Elisabeth was with child; but it doth not appear that Elisabeth had been told any thing of her cousin Mary's being designed for the mother of the Messiah; and therefore what knowledge she appears to have had of it, must come by a revelation, which would be a great encouragement to Mary.

1. "The babe leaped in her womb." It is very probable she had been several weeks quick, for she was six months gone, and that she had often felt the child stir; but this was a more than ordinary motion of the child, and which alarmed her to expect something very extraordinary, anticipation. It is the same word that is used by the Seventy, Gen. xxv. 22, for the struggling of Jacob and Esau in Rebecca's womb, and the mountains skipping, Ps. cxiv. 4. The babe leaped, as it were, to give a signal to his mother that he was now at hand whose forerunner he was to be; about six months in ministry, as he was in being; or, it was the effect of some strong impression made upon the mother. Now began to be fulfilled what the angel said to his father, ver. 15, that he should be "filled with the Holy Ghost, even from his mother's womb;" and perhaps he himself had some reference to this when he said, Jno. iii. 29, "the friend of the bridegroom rejoiceth greatly because of the bridegroom's voice," heard, though not by him, yet by his mother.

2. "Elisabeth was herself filled with the Holy Ghost," or a spirit of prophecy; by which, as well as by the particular suggestions of the Holy Ghost she was filled with, she was given to understand that the Messiah was at hand, in whom prophecy should revive, and by whom the Holy Ghost should be more plentifully poured out than ever, according to the expectations of those who "waited for the consolation of Israel." The uncommon motion of the babe in her womb was a token of the extraordinary emotion of her spirit, under a Divine impulse. Note, Those whom Christ graciously visits may know it by their being "filled with the Holy Ghost;" for "if any man have not the Spirit of Christ he is none of his."

Thirdly, The welcome which Elisabeth, by the spirit of prophecy, gave to Mary, the mother of our Lord; not as to a common friend making a common visit, but as to one of whom the Messiah was to be born.

1. She congratulates her honour; and though perhaps she knew not of it till just now, she acknowledgeth it with the greatest assurance and satisfaction. "She spoke with a loud voice," which doth not at all intimate, as some think, that there was a floor or a wall between them, but that she was in a transport or exultation of joy, and said what she cared not who knew. And this she said, "Blessed art thou among women," the same word that the angel had said, ver. 28; for thus this will of God, concerning honouring the Son, should be done on earth as it is done in heaven. But Elisabeth adds a reason, therefore "blessed art thou," because "blessed is the fruit of thy womb;" thence it was that she derived this exalting dignity. Elisabeth was the wife of a priest, and in years, yet she grudgeth not that her kinswoman, who was many years younger than she, and every way her inferior, should have the honour of conceiving in her virginity, and being the mother of the Messiah; whereas the honour put upon her was much less; but rejoiceth in it, and is well pleased, as her son was afterwards, that she that cometh after her is preferred before her, Jno. i. 27. Note, While we cannot but own that we are more favoured of God than we deserve, let us by no means envy that others are more highly favoured than we are.

2. She acknowledgeth her condescension in making her this visit, ver. 43: "Whence is this to me, that the mother of my Lord should come to me?" Observe, 1st. She calls the virgin Mary the mother of her Lord, for David in spirit called the Messiah Lord, his Lord, for she knew he was to be Lord of all. 2nd. She not only bids her welcome to her house, though perhaps she came but in mean circumstances, but reckons this visit a great favour, which she thought herself unworthy of. "Whence is this to me?" It is in reality, and not in compliment, that she saith this is a greater favour than she could have expected. Note, Those that are filled with the Holy Ghost have low thoughts of their own merits, and high thoughts of God's favours. Her son, the Baptist, spoke to the same purpose with this when he said, "Comest thou to me?" Mat. iii. 14.

3. She acquaints her with the concurrence of the babe in her womb in this welcome to her, ver. 44. "Thou certainly bringest some extraordinary tidings, some extraordinary blessing with thee, for as soon as the voice of thy salutation sounded in my ears, not only my heart leaped for joy, though I knew not immediately why or wherefore, but the babe in my womb, who was not capable of knowing it, did so too." He leaped, as it were, for joy that the Messiah, whose harbinger he was to be, would himself come so soon after him. This would serve very much to strengthen the faith of the virgin, that there were such assurances as these given to others; and it would be in part the accomplishment of what had been so often foretold, that there should be a universal joy before the Lord when he cometh, Ps. cxviii. 8, 9.

4. She commends her faith, and encourageth it, ver. 45; "blessed is she that believed;" believing souls are blessed souls, and will be found so at last; this blessedness cometh through faith, even the blessedness of being related to Christ, and having him formed in the soul. They are blessed who believe the Word of God, for that word will not fail them; "there shall," without doubt, "be a performance of those things which are told her from the Lord." Note, The inviolable certainty of the promise is the undoubted felicity of those that build upon it, and expect their all from it. The faithfulness of God is the blessedness of the faith of the saints. Those that have experienced the performance of God's promises themselves, should encourage others to hope that he will be as good as his word to them also; "I will tell you what God has done for my soul."

Fourthly, Mary's song of praise upon this occasion. Elisabeth's prophecy was an echo to the virgin Mary's salutation, and this song is yet a stronger echo to that prophecy, and shews her to be no less filled with the Holy Ghost than Elisabeth was. We may suppose the blessed virgin to come in very much fatigued with her journey; yet she forgets that, and is inspired with new life and vigour and joy, upon the confirmation she here meets with of her faith; and since, by this sudden inspiration and transport, she finds that this was designed to be her errand hither, as weary as she is, like Abraham's servant, she would neither eat nor drink till she had told her errand.

1. Here are the expressions of joy and praise, and God alone the object of the praise and centre of the joy. Some compare this song with that which her namesake, Miriam, the sister of Moses, sung upon the triumphant departure of Israel out of Egypt, and their triumphant passage through the Red Sea; others think it better compared with the song of Hannah, upon the birth of Samuel, which, like this, passeth from a family mercy to a public and general one. This begins like that, "My heart rejoiceth in the Lord," 1 Sam. ii. 1. Observe how Mary here speaks of God:

1st. With great reverence of him as the Lord: "My soul doth magnify the Lord;" I never saw him so great as now I find him so good. Note, Those, and those only, are advanced in mercy, who are thereby brought to think more highly and honourably of God; whereas there are those whose prosperity and preferment makes them say, "What is the Almighty, that we should serve him?" The more honour God has any way put upon us, the more honour we must study to give to him; and then only are we accepted in magnifying the Lord, when our souls magnify him, and all that is within us. Praising work must be soul work.

2nd. With great complacency in him as her Saviour: "My spirit rejoiceth in God my Saviour." This seems to have reference to the Messiah, whom she was to be the mother of; she calls him God her Saviour, for the angel had told her that he should be "the Son of the Highest," and that his name should be Jesus, a Saviour; this she fastened upon, with application to herself; he is "God my Saviour." Even the mother of our Lord had need of an interest in him as her Saviour, and would have been undone without it; and she glories more in that happiness, which she had in common with all believers, than in being his mother, which was an honour peculiar to herself; which agrees with the preference Christ gave to obedient believers above his mother and brethren; see Mat. xii. 50; ch. xi. 27, 28. Note, Those that have Christ for their God and Saviour have a great deal of reason to rejoice, to rejoice in spirit, that is rejoicing, as Christ did, ch. x. 21, with spiritual joy.

2. Here are just causes assigned for this joy and praise:

1st. Upon her own account, ver. 48, 49. First. Her spirit rejoiceth in the Lord, because of the kind things he had done for her; his condescension and compassion to her; "he has regarded the low estate of his handmaiden" that is, he has looked upon her with pity, for so the word is commonly used. He has chosen me to this honour, notwithstanding my great meanness, poverty, and obscurity; nay, the expression seems to intimate, not only (to allude to that of Gideon, Jud. vi. 12) that her family was poor in Judah, but that she was the least in her father's house; as if she were under some particular contempt and disgrace among her relations, was unjustly neglected, and the out-cast of the family; and God put this honour upon her to balance abundantly that contempt. 1. The rather suggest this, for we find something toward such honour as this put upon others on the like consideration. Because God saw that Leah was hated he opened her womb, Gen. xxix. 31; because Hannah was provoked and made to fret, and insulted over by Peninnah, therefore God gave her a son, 1 Sam. i. 19. Whom men wrongfully depress and despise God sometimes, in compassion towards them, especially if they have borne it patiently, doth prefer and advance: see Jud. xi. 7. So in Mary's case. And if God regard her low estate, he not only thereby gives a specimen of his favour to the whole race of mankind, whom he remembers in their low estate, as the psalmist speaks, Ps. cxxvi. 23, but secures a lasting honour to her, for such the honour is that God bestows, honour that fades not away; "from henceforth all generations shall call me blessed," that is, shall think me a happy woman, and highly advanced. All that embrace Christ and his Gospel will say, "Blessed was the womb that bore him, and the paps which he sucked," ch. xi. 27. Elisabeth had once and again called her blessed; but that is not all, saith she; all generations, of Gentiles as well as Jews, shall call me so. Secondly. Her soul magnifies the Lord because of the wonderful things he has done for her, ver. 49: "He that is mighty has done to me great things." A great thing indeed that a virgin should conceive; a great thing indeed that Messiah, who had been so long ago promised to the church, and so long expected by the church, should now at length be born. It is "the power of the Highest" that appears in this. She adds, "and holy is his name;" for so Hannah saith in her song, "There is none holy as the Lord," which she explains in the next words, "for there is none beside thee," 1 Sam. ii. 2. God is a being by himself, and he manifests himself to be so, especially in the work of our redemption: "He that is mighty," even he whose name is holy, "has done to me great things." Glorious things may be expected from him that is both mighty and holy; who can do every thing, and will do every thing well and for the best.

2nd. Upon the account of others. The virgin Mary, as the mother of the Messiah, is become a kind of public person, wears a public character, and is therefore presently endued with another spirit, a more public spirit than before she had; and therefore looks abroad, looks about her, looks before her, and takes notice of God's various dealings with the children of men, ver. 50, &c.; as Hannah, 1 Sam. ii. 3; and in this she has especially an eye to the coming of the Redeemer, and God's manifesting himself therein.

First. It is a certain truth that God has mercy in store, mercy in reserve, for all that have a reverence for his majesty, and a due regard to his sovereignty and authority; but never did this appear so as in sending his Son is that there are seven archangels, whose names are variously enumerated.

i. 23. "The days of his ministration" are the week during which his attendance at the Temple was required.

i. 26. "The sixth month" is not the sixth month of the Jewish year, but the sixth month of the series mentioned in verse 24. Had it been the sixth month of the year, the question respecting the month in which Jesus was born would have been decided for ever.

i. 36. The word rendered "cousin" here signifies "kinswoman," and should be so rendered, in accordance with the modern use of the words.

i. 39. By "a city of Judah" some have thought a town called Juttah (Josh. xxi. 16) is meant; but the common explanation is preferable.

i. 48. The phrase "all generations shall call me blessed" has been much perverted, and is the basis of the expression, "the blessed into the world to save us, ver. 50. "His mercy is on them that fear him," it has always been so, he has ever looked upon them with an eye of peculiar favour who have looked up to him with an eye of filial fear. But he hath manifested this mercy so as never before, in an everlasting salvation for them that fear him; and this "from generation to generation," for there are gospel privileges transmitted by entail, and intended for perpetuity. Those that fear God as their Creator and Judge, are encouraged to hope for mercy in him, through their Mediator and Advocate; and in him mercy is settled upon all that fear God—pardoning mercy, healing mercy, accepting mercy, crowning mercy, "from generation to generation"—while the world stands. In Christ he keepeth mercy for thousands.

Secondly. It has been a common observation, that God in his providence doth put contempt upon the haughty, and honour upon the humble; and this he has done remarkably in the whole economy of the work of man's redemption. As God had, with his mercy to her, shewn himself mighty also, ver. 43, 49, so he had, with his mercy on them that fear him, shewn strength likewise with his arm.

1st. In the course of his providence it is his usual method to cross the expectations of men, and proceed quite otherwise than they promise themselves. Proud men expect to carry all before them, to have their way, and have their will; but he scatters them in the imagination of their hearts, breaks their measures, blasts their projects, nay, and brings them low, and brings them down, by those very counsels with which they thought to advance and establish themselves. The mighty think to secure themselves by might in their seats, but he puts them down, and overturns their seats; while, on the other hand, those of low degree, who despaired of ever advancing themselves, and thought of no other but of being ever low, are wonderfully exalted. And this observation concerning honour holds likewise concerning riches; many that were so poor that they had not bread for themselves and their families, by some surprising turn of providence in favour of them, come to be filled with good things; while, on the other hand, those that were rich, and thought no other but that to-morrow should be as this day, that their mountain stood strong, and should never be moved, are strangely impoverished and sent away empty. Now this is the same observation that Hannah had made, and enlarged upon in her song, with application to the case of herself and her adversary, 1 Sam. ii. 4-7, which very much illustrates this here; and compare also Ps. ciii. 33-41, cxlii. 7-9, and Ecc. xi. 11. God takes a pleasure in disappointing their expectations that promise themselves great things in the world, and in outdoing the expectations of those that promise themselves but a little. As a righteous God, it is his glory to abase those that exalt themselves, and strike terror on the secure; and, as a good God, it is his glory to exalt those that humble themselves, and to speak comfort to those that fear before him.

2nd. This doth especially appear in the methods of gospel grace. First. In the spiritual honours it dispenseth. When the proud Pharisees were rejected, and the publicans and sinners went into the kingdom of heaven before them,—when the Jews, that followed after the law of righteousness did not attain it, and the Gentiles, that never thought of it, attained to righteousness, Rom. ix. 30, 31,—when God chose not the wise men after the flesh, not the mighty or the noble, to preach the Gospel and plant Christianity in the world, but the foolish and weak things of the world, and things that were despised, 1 Cor. i. 26, 27,—then he scattered the proud and put down the mighty, but exalted them of low degree. When the tyranny of the chief priests and elders was brought down, who had long lorded it over God's heritage, and hoped always to do so, and Christ's disciples, a company of poor despised fishermen, by the power they were clothed with, were made to sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel,—when the power of the four monarchies was broken, and the kingdom of the Messiah, that stone cut out of the mountain without hands, is made to fill the earth,—then are the proud scattered, and those of low degree exalted. Secondly. In the spiritual riches it dispenseth, ver. 53. 1. Those that see their need of Christ, and are importunately desirous of righteousness and life in him, he fills those with good things, with the best things; he gives liberally to them, and they are abundantly satisfied with the blessings he gives. They that are weary and heavy laden shall find rest with Christ, and those that thirst are called to him, and drink; for they only know how to value his gifts: "to the hungry soul every bitter thing is sweet;" manna is angels' food, and to the thirsty fair water is honey out of the rock. 2. Those who are rich, who are not hungry, who, like Laodicea, think they have need of nothing, are full of themselves and their own righteousness, and think they have a sufficiency in themselves; those he sends away from his door; they are not welcome to him; he sends them empty away; they come full of self, and are sent away empty of Christ. He sends them to the gods whom they served, to their own righteousness and strength, which they trusted to.

Thirdly. It was always expected that the Messiah should be, in a special manner, the strength and glory of his people Israel, and so he is in a peculiar manner, ver. 54. "He hath helped his servant Israel," Avre'el-Nisero. He hath taken them by the hand, and helped them up that were fallen, and could not help themselves. Those that were sunk under the burthens of a broken covenant of innocence are helped up by the blessings of a renewed covenant of grace. The sending of the Messiah, on whom help was laid for poor sinners, was the greatest kindness that could be done, the greatest help that could be provided, for his people Israel; and that which magnifies it is, 1st. That it is "in remembrance of his mercy;" the mercifulness of his nature, the mercy he has in store for his servant Israel. While this blessing was deferred, his people, who waited for it, were often ready to ask, "Has God forgotten to be gracious?" But now he made it appear that he had not forgotten, but remembered his mercy. He remembered his former mercy, and repeated that to them in spiritual blessings which he had done formerly to them in temporal favours. "He remembered the days of old; where is he that brought them out of the sea?" out of Egypt? Isa. lxi. 11; and therefore he will do the like again, which that was a type of. 2nd. That it is in performance of his promise; it is a mercy not only designed but declared, ver. 55; it was what he spake to our fathers, that the seed of the woman should break the head of the serpent; that God should dwell in the tents of Shem; and particularly to Abraham, that in his seed all the families of the earth shall be blessed, with the best of blessings, with the blessings that are for ever; and to the seed that shall be for ever, that is, his spiritual seed, for his carnal seed were cut off a little after this. Note, What God hath spoken he will perform; what he hath spoken to the fathers will be performed to their seed, to their seed's seed, in blessings that shall last for ever.

Lastly. Mary's return to Nazareth, ver. 56, after she had continued with Elisabeth about three months; so long as to be fully satisfied concerning herself, that she was with child, and to be confirmed therein by her cousin Elisabeth. Some think, though her return is here mentioned before Elisabeth's being delivered, because the evangelist would finish this passage concerning Mary before he proceeded with the story of Elisabeth, yet that Mary stayed until her cousin was, as we say, down and up again; that she might attend on her, and be with her in her lying-in, and have her own faith confirmed by the full accomplishment of the promise of God concerning Elisabeth. But most bind themselves to the order of the story as it lies, and think she returned again when Elisabeth was near her time; because she still affected retirement, and therefore would not be there when the birth of this child of promise would draw a great deal of company to the house. Those in whose hearts Christ is formed take more delight than they used to do in sitting alone and keeping silence.

57 Now Elisabeth's full time came that she should be delivered; and she brought forth a son. 58 And her neighbours and her cousins heard how the Lord had shewed great mercy upon her; and they rejoiced with her. 59 And it came to pass, that on the eighth day they came to circumcise the child; and they called him Zacharias, after the name of his father. 60 And his mother answered and said, Not so; but he shall be called John. 61 And they said unto her, There is none of thy kindred that is called by this name. 62 And they made signs to his father, how he would have him called. 63 And he asked for a writing table, and wrote, saying, His name is John.

WRITING TABLETS.—ANCIENT GREEK.

And they marvelled all. 64 And his mouth was opened immediately, and his tongue loosed, and he spake, and praised God. 65 And fear came on all that dwelt round about them: and all these sayings were noised abroad throughout all the hill country of Judæa. 66 And all they that heard them laid them up in their hearts, saying, What manner of child shall this be! And the hand of the Lord was with him.

In these verses we have, First. The birth of John Baptist, ver. 57. Though he was conceived in the womb by miracle, he continued in the womb according to the ordinary course of nature. So did our Saviour. "Elisabeth's full time came that she should be delivered, and then "she brought forth a son." Promised mercies are to be expected when the full time for them is come, and not before.

Secondly. The great joy that was among all the relations of the family upon this extraordinary occasion, ver. 58. "Her neighbours and her cousins heard of it," for it would be in every body's mouth, as next to miraculous. Dr. Lightfoot observes, that Hebron was inhabited by priests of the family of Aaron, and those were the cousins here spoken of; but the fields and villages about, by the children of Judah, and those were the neighbours. Now these here discovered, 1st. A pious regard to God; they acknowledged that the Lord had magnified his mercy to her, so the word is. It was a mercy to have her reproach taken away, a mercy to have her family built up, and the more, being a family of priests, devoted to God, and employed for him. Many things concurred to make the mercy great; that she had been long barren, was now old, but especially that the child should be great in the sight of the Lord. 2nd. A friendly regard to Elisabeth; when she rejoiced, they rejoiced with her. We ought to take pleasure in the prosperity of our neighbours and friends, and to be thankful to God for their comforts as for our own.

Thirdly. The dispute that was among them concerning the naming him;

Virgin Mary." The Greek simply means "all generations will account me happy," and not that the epithet "blessed" would be specially applied to her.

i. 50. The sense here is that the mercy of the Lord is extended to them that fear him, and that it reaches from generation to generation, or never ceases.

i. 58. Here, as in verse 36, the word "cousins" is not used in what is now its common sense, but is equivalent to "kindred."

i. 63. "A writing-table" was probably a tablet of wood covered with a coat of wax, upon which anything was written with a metal point or style. Such writing could easily be executed, and as easily cancelled, and therefore the tablets were very generally in use.

i. 65. There is a different spelling here (Judæa) from that in verse 39 (Juda), not only in our version, but in the ordinary Greek text. This difference is very ancient, being found in the Sinaitic, Vatican, and other early MSS., as well as in the Latin Vulgate.

ver. 59, "on the eighth day," as God had appointed, "they came together to circumcise the child;" and it was here in Hebron that circumcision was first instituted; and Isaac, who, like John Baptist, was born by promise, was one of the first that was submitted to it, at least the chief eyed in the institution of it. They that rejoiced in the birth of the child came together to the circumcising of him. Note, The greatest comfort we can take in our children is in giving them up to God, and recognising their covenant relation to him. The baptism of our children should be more our joy than their birth. Now it was the custom, when they circumcised their children, to name them; because when Abram was circumcised, God gave him a new name, and called him Abraham; and it is not unfit that they should be left nameless until they are by name given up to God. Now,

1. Some proposed that he should be called by his father's name, Zacharias; of which we have not any instance in Scripture that the child should bear the father's name; but perhaps it was of late come into use among the Jews, as it is with us; and they intended hereby to do honour to the father, who was not likely to have another child.

2. The mother opposed it, and would have him called John; having learned, either by inspiration of the Holy Ghost, as is most probable, or by information in writing from her husband, that God appointed that should be his name; ver. 60, "he shall be called Johanan," "gracious;" because he shall introduce the Gospel of Christ, wherein God's grace shines more bright than ever.

3. The relations objected against that; ver. 61, "There is none of thy kindred," none of the relations of thy family that is "called by that name;" and therefore, if he may not have his father's name, yet let him have the name of some of his kindred, that will take it as a piece of respect to have such a child of wonders as this named from them. Note, As those that have friends must shew themselves friendly, so those that have relations must be obliging to them in all the usual regards that are paid to kindred.

4. They appealed to the father, and would try if they could possibly get to know his mind, for it was his office to name the child; ver. 62, "they made signs" to him, by which it appears he was deaf as well as dumb: nay, it should seem, mindless of anything else, one would think, they should at first have desired him to write down his child's name, if he had ever yet communicated any thing by writing since he was struck. However, they would carry the matter as far as they could, and gave him to understand what the dispute was, which he only could determine; whereupon he made signs to them to give him a table-book, such as they then used, and with the pencil he wrote these words, "His name is John," ver. 63. Note, It shall be so, or, I would have it so, but 'tis so; the matter is determined already; the angel had given him that name. Observe, When Zacharias could not speak he wrote. When ministers have their mouths stopped, that they cannot preach, yet they may be doing good, as long as they have not their hands tied, that they cannot write. Many of the martyrs in prison wrote letters to their friends, which were of great use; blessed Paul himself did so. Zacharias' pitching upon the same name that Elisabeth had chosen was a great surprise to the company, "they marvelled all;" for they knew not, that though by reason of his deafness and dumbness, they could not converse together, yet they were both guided by one and the same Spirit; or, perhaps they marvelled that he wrote so distinctly and intelligently, which the stroke he was under being somewhat like that of a palsy he had not done before.

5. He thereupon recovered the use of his speech; ver. 64, "his mouth was opened immediately." The time prefixed for his being silence was "till the day that these things shall be fulfilled," ver. 20; not all the things going before concerning John's ministry, but those which relate to his birth and name, ver. 13; and that time was now expired, whereupon the restraint was taken off, and God gave him the opening of the mouth again, as he did to Ezekiel, Eze. iii. 27. Dr. Lightfoot compares this case of Zacharias with that of Moses, Ex. iv. 24, 26. Moses, for distrust, is in danger of his life, as Zacharias, for the same fault, is struck dumb; but upon the circumcising of his child, and recovery of his faith, there, as here, the danger is removed. Infidelity closed his mouth, and now believing opens it again; he believes, therefore he speaks. David lay under guilt from the conception of his child till a few days after its birth, then the Lord takes away his sin; upon his repentance, he shall not die; so here, he shall be no longer dumb; "his mouth was opened, and he spake, and praised God." Note, When God opens our lips, our mouths must shew forth his praise. As good be without speech as not use it in praising God; for then our tongue is most our glory when it is employed for God's glory.

6. These things were told all the country over, to the great amazement of all that heard them, ver. 65, 66. The sentiments of the people are not to be slighted, but taken notice of. We are here told, 1st. That these sayings were discoursed of, and were the common talk all about the hill country of Judaea, and it was pity but a narrative of them had been drawn up and published in the world immediately. 2nd. That most people who heard of these things were put into a consternation by them; "fear came on all them that dwelt round about" there. If we have not a good hope, as we ought to have, built upon the Gospel, we may expect that the tidings of it will fill us with fear. They believed and trembled, whereas they should have believed and triumphed. 3rd. It raised the expectations of people concerning this child, and obliged them to have their eye upon him, to see what he would come to. They laid up these presages in their hearts, treasured them up in mind and memory, as foreseeing they should hereafter have occasion to recollect them. Note, What we hear that may be of use to us, we should treasure up, that we may be able to bring forth for the benefit of others things new and old, and when things come to perfection, may be able to look back upon the presages of it, and to say, "It was what we might expect." They said within themselves, and said among themselves, "What manner of child shall this be?" What will be the fruit, when these are the buds; or rather, when the root is out of such a dry ground? Note, When children are born into the world, it is very uncertain what they will prove; yet sometimes there have been early indications of something great, as in the birth of Moses, Samson, Samuel, and here, of John. And we have reason to think that there were some of those living at the time when John began his public ministry who could and did remember these things, and relate them to others, which contributed as much as any thing to the great flocking there was after him.

Lastly, It is said, "the hand of the Lord was with him;" that is, he was taken under the special protection of the Almighty from his birth, as one designed for something great and considerable, and there were many instances of it. It appeared, likewise, that the Spirit was at work upon his soul very early. As soon as he began to speak, or go, you might perceive something in him very extraordinary. Note, God has ways of operating upon children in their infancy which we cannot account for. God never made a soul but he knew how to sanctify it.

67 And his father Zacharias was filled with the Holy Ghost, and prophesied, saying, 68 Blessed be the Lord God of Israel; for he hath visited and redeemed his people, 69 And hath raised up an horn of salvation for us in the house of his servant David; 70 As he spake by the mouth of his holy prophets, which have been since the world began: 71 That we should be saved from our enemies, and from the hand of all that hate us; 72 To perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember his holy covenant; 73 The oath which he swore to our father Abraham, 74 That he would grant unto us, that we being delivered out of the hand of our enemies might serve him without fear, 75 In holiness and righteousness before him, all the days of our life. 76 And thou, child, shalt be called the prophet of the Highest: for thou shalt go before the face of the Lord to prepare his ways; 77 To give knowledge of salvation unto his people by the remission of their sins, 78 Through the tender mercy of our God; whereby the dayspring from on high hath visited us, 79 To give light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, to guide our feet into the way of peace. 80 And the child grew, and waxed strong in spirit, and was in the deserts till the day of his shewing unto Israel.

We have here the song wherewith Zacharias praised God when his mouth was opened; in it he is said to prophesy, ver. 67; and so he did, in the strictest sense of prophesying, for he foretold things to come concerning the kingdom of the Messiah, to which all the prophets are witness. Observe,

I. How he was qualified for this. He "was filled with the Holy Ghost," was endued with more than ordinary measures and degrees of it, for this purpose. He was Divinely inspired. God not only forgave him his unbelief and distrust, which was signified by discharging of him from the punishment of it, but, as a specimen of the abounding of grace towards believers, he filled him with the Holy Ghost, and put this honour upon him, to employ him for his honour.

II. What the matter of his song was. Here is nothing said of the private concerns of his own family, the rolling away the reproach from it, and putting of a reputation upon it by the birth of this child, though no doubt he found a time to give thanks to God for this with his family; but, in this song, he is wholly taken up with the kingdom of the Messiah, and the public blessings to be introduced by it. He could have little pleasure in this fruitfulness of his vine, and the hopefulness of his olive plant, if herein he had not foreseen the good of Jerusalem, peace upon Israel, and blessings on both, out of Zion, Ps. cxxviii. 3, 5, 6. The Old Testament prophecies are expressed many times in praises and new songs; so is this beginning of New Testament prophecy, "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel." "The God of the whole earth shall he be called;" yet Zacharias, speaking of the work of redemption, called him "Lord God of Israel," because to Israel the prophecies, promises, and types of the redemption had hitherto been given, and to them the first profusers and proposals of it were now to be made. Israel, as a chosen people, was a type of the elect of God out of all nations, whom God had a particular eye to in sending the Saviour; and therefore he is therein called "the Lord God of Israel." Now Zacharias here bleaseth God.

First, For the work of salvation that was to be wrought out by the Messiah himself, ver. 68—75. This is it that fills him when he is "filled with the Holy Ghost," and it is that which all that have the Spirit of Christ are full of.

1. In sending the Messiah, God has made a gracious visit to his people, whom for many ages he had seemed to neglect, and to be estranged from; he hath visited them as a friend, to take cognizance of their case. God is said to have visited his people in bondage when he delivered them, Ex. iii. 16; iv. 31; to have visited his people in famine when he gave them bread, Ruth i. 6. He had often sent to them by his prophets, and had still kept up a correspondence with them, but now he himself made them a visit.

2. He has wrought out a redemption for them; he hath "redeemed his people." This was the errand on which Christ came into the world, to redeem those that were sold for sin, and sold under sin; even God's own people, his Israel, his Son, his firstborn, his freeborn, need to be redeemed, and are undone if they be not. Christ redeems them by price out of the hands of God's justice, and redeems them by power out of the hands of Satan's tyranny, as Israel out of Egypt.

3. He has fulfilled the covenant of royalty made with the most famous Old Testament prince, that was David. Glorious things had been said of his family, that on him, as a mighty one, help should be laid, that his horn should be exalted, and his seed perpetuated, Ps. lxxxix. 19, 20, 24, 29. But that family had been long in a manner cast off and abhorred, Ps. lxxxix. 38. Now here it is gloried in, that, according to the promise, the horn of David should again be made to bud, Ps. cxxxii. 17; for he "hath raised up a horn of salvation for us in the house of his servant David," ver. 69; there where it was promised, and expected to arise. David is called God's servant, not only as a good man, but as a king that ruled for God. And he was an instrument of the salvation of Israel, by being employed in the government of Israel; so Christ is "the author of eternal redemption to those" only "that obey him." There is in Christ, and in him only, salvation for us, and it is a horn of salvation; for, 1st. It is an honourable salvation, it is raised up above all other salvations, none of which are to be compared with it. In it the glory both of the Redeemer and of the

See verse 39 with respect to the expression, "the hill country;" it is generally and rightly understood here and in verse 39 of the hill district south of Jerusalem.

i. 80. The "deserts" must here mean the wilderness region of Judaea, which bordered on the hill country referred to in the previous note.

ii. 1—3. In these verses the word for "taxed" means "enrolled" or registered, and correctly represents a census. The time intended in verse 1 must be not long before that of verse 3. There has, however, been much dispute both as to the historical accuracy of the passage and as to its real meaning. The Emperor Augustus probably issued a number of decrees, of which we have no record, and the one mentioned by the evangelist is otherwise almost unknown. The phrase "all the world" may mean the whole Roman empire, or it may mean no more than our "everybody," i.e., everybody in the Roman province of Palestine. Verse 2 is variously rendered and ex.

redeemed are advanced, and their horn exalted with honour. 2nd. It is a plentiful salvation; it is a cornucopia,—a horn of plenty; a salvation in which we are blessed with spiritual blessings in heavenly things abundantly. 3rd. It is a powerful salvation; the strength of the beast is in his horn; he has raised up such a salvation as shall pull down our spiritual enemies, and protect us from them. In the chariots of this salvation the Redeemer shall go forth, and go on conquering, and to conquer.

4. He hath fulfilled all the precious promises made to the church by the most famous Old Testament prophets, ver. 70, "as he spake by the mouth of his holy prophets." His doctrine of salvation by the Messiah is confirmed by an appeal to the prophets, and the greatness and importance of that salvation thereby evidenced and magnified; it is the same they spoke of, which therefore ought to be expected and welcomed; it is what they inquired and searched diligently after, 1 Pet. i. 10, 11, and therefore ought not to be slighted, or thought meanly of. God is now doing that which he has long ago spoken of, and therefore "be silent. O all flesh, before him," and attend to him. See 1st. How sacred the prophecies of this salvation were. The prophets who delivered them were "holy prophets," who durst not deceive, and who aimed at promoting holiness among men, and it was the holy God himself that spake by them. 2nd. How ancient they were; ever "since the world began;" God having promised, when the world began, that "the seed of the woman should break the serpent's head;" that promise was echoed to, when Adam called his wife's name Eve, "life," for the sake of that seed of hers; when Eve called her first son Cain, saying, "I have gotten a man from the Lord;" and another son, Seth, "settled;" when Noah was called "Rest," and foretold that God should dwell in the tents of Shem. And it was not long after the new world began in Noah, that the promise was made to Abraham, that in his seed the nations of the earth should be blessed. 3rd. What a wonderful harmony and concert there was among them; God spake the same thing by them all, and therefore it is said to be ὁμοῦ στοματός, not "by the mouths," but "by the mouth" of the prophets, for they all spake of Christ as it were with one mouth.

Now what is this salvation which was prophesied of?

First. It is a rescue from the malice of our enemies. It is συντριβὴν ἐξ ἐχθρῶν ἡμῶν, "a salvation out of our enemies," from among them, and "out of the power of them that hate us," ver. 71. It is a salvation from sin, and the dominion of Satan over us, both by corruptions within, and temptations without. The carnal Jews expected to be delivered from under the Roman yoke, but intimation was betimes given that it should be a redemption of another nature: "He shall save his people from their sins," that they may not have dominion over them, Mat. i. 21.

Secondly. It is a restoration to the favour of God; it is "to perform the mercy promised to our forefathers," ver. 72. The Redeemer shall not only break the serpent's head, that was the author of our ruin, but he shall reinstate us in the mercy of God, and re-establish us in his covenant; he shall bring us, as it were, into a paradise again, which was signified by the promises made to the patriarchs, and the holy covenant made with them, "the oath which he sware to our father Abraham," ver. 73. Observe, 1st. Then which was promised to the fathers, and is performed to us, is mercy, pure mercy; nothing in it is owing to our merit—we deserve wrath and the curse—but all to the mercy of God, which designed us grace and life; ex mero motu,—"of his own good pleasure;" he loved us, because he would love us. 2nd. God herein had an eye to his covenant, his holy covenant, that covenant with Abraham, "I will be a God to thee and thy seed." This his seed had really forfeited by their transgressions; this he seemed to have forgotten in the calamities brought upon them; but he will now remember it, will make it appear that he remembers it, for upon that is grounded all his returns of mercy, Lev. xxvi. 42, "then will I remember my covenant."

Thirdly. It is a qualification for, and an encouragement to, the service of God. This was "the oath he sware to our father Abraham," that he would give us power and grace to serve him, in an acceptable manner to him, and a comfortable manner to ourselves, ver. 74, 75. Here seems to be an allusion to the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, which God tells Moses was in pursuance of the covenant he made with Abraham, Ex. iii. 6-8; and that this was the design of his bringing them out of Egypt, "that they might serve God upon this mountain," Ex. iii. 12. Note, The great design of gospel grace is, not to discharge us from, but to engage us to, and encourage us in, the service of God. Under this notion Christianity was always to be looked upon as intended to make us truly religious, to admit us into the service of God, to bind us to it, and to quicken us in it. We are therefore delivered from the iron yoke of sin, that our necks may be put under the sweet and easy yoke of the Lord Jesus: the very bonds which he has loosed do bind us faster unto him, Ps. cxvi. 16; see Rom. vi. 18, 19. We are hereby enabled, 1st. To serve God "without fear," ἄφρονος; we are therefore put into a state of holy safety, that we might serve God with a holy security and serenity of mind, as those that are quiet from the fears of evil. God must be served with a filial fear, a reverent, obedient fear, an awakening, quickening fear; but not with a slavish fear, like that of the slothful servant, who represented him to himself as a hard master, and unreasonable; not with that fear that has torment and amazement in it; not with the fear of a legal spirit, a spirit of bondage, but with the boldness of an evangelical spirit, a spirit of adoption. 2nd. To serve him in holiness and righteousness, which includes the whole duty of man towards God and our neighbour. It is both the intention and the direct tendency of the Gospel to renew upon us that image of God in which man was at first made, which consisted "in righteousness and true holiness," Eph. iv. 24. Christ redeemed us that we might serve God, not in the legal services of sacrifices and offerings, but in the spiritual services of holiness and righteousness, Ps. i. 14. 3rd. To serve before him in the duties of his immediate worship, wherein we present ourselves before the Lord; to serve him as those that have an eye always upon him, and see his eye always upon us, upon our inward man; that is serving him "before him." 4th. To serve him "all the days of our life." The design of the Gospel is to engage us to constancy and perseverance in the service of God, by shewing us how much depends upon it, that we do not draw back; and by shewing us how Christ loved us to the end, and thereby engaged us to love him to the end.

Secondly. He bleaseth God for the work of preparation for this salvation, which was to be done by John Baptist; ver. 76, "Thou child," though now but a child of eight days old, "shalt be called the prophet of the Highest;" Jesus Christ is the Highest, for he is "God over all, blessed for evermore," Rom. ix. 5, equal with the Father; John Baptist was his prophet, as Aaron was Moses' prophet, Ex. vii. 1. What he said was as his mouth, what he did was as his harbingers. Prophecy had now long ceased, but in John it revived, (as it had done in Samuel, who was born of an aged mother, as John was,) after a long cessation. John's business was,

1. To prepare people for the salvation, by preaching repentance and reformation as great gospel duties: "Thou shalt go before the face of the Lord," and but a little before him, "to prepare his ways;" to call people to make room for him, and get ready for his entertainment. Let every thing that may obstruct his progress, or embarrass it, or may hinder people from coming to him, be taken away; see Isa. xl. 3, 4: Let valleys be filled, and hills be brought low.

2. To give people a general idea of the salvation, that they might know not only what to do, but what to expect; for the doctrine he preached was, that the kingdom of heaven is at hand. There are two things in which you must know this salvation consists:

1st. The forgiveness of what we have done amiss; it is salvation "by the remission of sins," those sins which stand in the way of the salvation, and by which we were all become liable to ruin and condemnation, ver. 77. John Baptist gave people to understand, that though their case was sad by reason of sin, it was not desperate, for pardon might be obtained "through the tender mercy of our God;" "the bowels of mercy," so the word is. There was nothing in us but a piteous case to recommend us to the Divine compassion.

2nd. Direction to do better for the time to come. The gospel salvation not only encourageth us to hope that the works of darkness shall be forgiven us, but sets up a clear and true light, by which we may order our steps aright. In it "the dayspring hath visited us from on high," ver. 78; and this also is owing to "the tender mercy of our God:" Christ is ἀνατολή, the morning light, the rising sun, Mal. iv. 2. The Gospel brings light with it, John. iii. 19; leaves us not to wander in the darkness of pagan ignorance, or in the moonlight of the Old Testament types or figures; but in it the day dawns; in John Baptist it began to break, but increased apace, and shone more and more to the perfect day. We have as much reason to welcome the gospel day, who enjoy it, as those have to welcome the morning who have long waited for it. First. The Gospel is discovering; it shews us that which before we were utterly in the dark about, ver. 79; it is "to give light to them that sit in darkness," "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ;" the dayspring visited this dark world to lighten the Gentiles, Acts xxvi. 18. Secondly. It is reviving; it brings light to them that sit in the shadow of death, as condemned prisoners in the dungeon, to bring them the tidings of a pardon, at least of a reprieve, and opportunity of procuring a pardon; it proclaims "the opening of the prison," Isa. lxi. 1; brings the light of life; how pleasant is that light! Thirdly. It is directing; it is "to guide our feet into the way of peace," into that way which will bring us to peace at last. It is not only a light to our eyes, but a light to our feet, Ps. cxix. 105; it guides us into the way of making our peace with God, of keeping up a comfortable communion; that way of peace which, as sinners, we have wandered from, and have not known, Rom. iii. 17, nor could ever have known of ourselves.

In the last verse we have a short account of the younger years of John Baptist. Though he was the son of a priest, he did not, like Samuel, go up when he was a child to minister before the Lord; for he was to prepare the way for a better priesthood. But we are here told,

1. Of his eminency as to the inward man. "The child grew" in parts, and the capacities of his mind, much more than other children; so that he "waxed strong in spirit" had a strong judgment, and strong resolution. Reason and conscience (both which are the candle of the Lord) were so strong in him that he had the inferior faculties of appetite and passion in complete subjection betimes. By this it appeared he was betimes "filled with the Holy Ghost;" for those that are strong in the Lord are strong in spirit.

2. Of his obscurity as to the outward man: he was "in the deserts." Not that he lived a hermit, cut off from the society of men; no, we have reason to think he went up to Jerusalem at the feasts, and frequented the synagogues on the sabbath day; but his constant residence was in some of those scattered houses that were in the wildernesses of Zuph or Maon, which we read of in the story of David. There he spent most of his time in contemplation and devotion, and had not his education in the schools, or at the feet of the rabbins. Note, There is many a one qualified for great usefulness who yet is buried alive; and many are long so, who are designed, and are thereby in the fitting for so much greater usefulness at last; as John Baptist, who was "in the desert" only "till the day of his shewing to Israel," when he was in the thirtieth year of his age. Note, There is a time fixed for the shewing of those favours to Israel, which are reserved; "the vision" of them "is for an appointed time; and at the end it shall speak, and shall not lie."

CHAPTER II.

In this chapter we have an account of the birth and infancy of our Lord Jesus: having had notice of his conception, and of the birth and infancy of his forerunner, in the former chapter. The First-begotten is here brought into the world; let us go meet him with our hosannas, "Blessed is he that cometh." Here is, I. The place and other circumstances of his birth, which spoke him the true Messiah, and such a one as we needed, but not such a one as the Jews expected, ver. 1-7. II. The notifying of his birth to the shepherds in that neighbourhood by an angel, the song of praise which the angels sung upon that occasion, and the spreading of the report of it by the shepherds, ver. 8-20. III. The circumcision of Christ, and the naming of him, ver. 21. IV. The presenting of him in the temple, ver. 22-24. V. The testimonies of Simeon, and Anna the prophetess, concerning him, ver. 25-39. VI. Christ's growth and pregnancy, ver. 40, 52. VII. His observing the passover at twelve years old, and his disputing with the doctors in the temple, ver. 41-51. And this, with what we have met with, Mat. i. and ii., is all we have concerning our Lord Jesus till he entered upon his public work, in the thirtieth year of his age.

AND it came to pass in those days, that there went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus, that all the world should be taxed. 2 (And this taxing was first made when Cyrenius was governor of Syria.) 3 And all went to be taxed, every one into his own city. 4 And Joseph also went up from Galilee, out of the city of Nazareth, into Judæa, unto the city of David, which is called Bethlehem; (because he was of the house and lineage of David:) 5 To be taxed with Mary his espoused wife, being great plained: "This census was first made when Cyrenius was governor;" "This first census was made when Cyrenius was governor;" or "This census was the first made when Cyrenius was governor." The last explanation accords with the ancient Syriac version. The Latin Vulgate has, "This first census was made by Cyrenius, governor of Syria." Modern critics have expended great labour on endeavours to make the text harmonise with the admitted fact that Cyrenius was governor several years after the birth of our Lord, who it is alleged was born when Sentius Saturninus was governor of Syria. The German critic, Dr. Zumpt, has met the problem in another way, and shown that Cyrenius was twice governor of Syria. This was, then, the first census, during his first term of office. That he held office more than once was conjectured by Baronius, but the evidence was not forthcoming until Zumpt collected it. It renders other explanations unnecessary, but we add one to the foregoing, viz., "This census was made before Cyrenius was governor of Syria."

with child. 6 And so it was, that, while they were there, the days were accomplished that she should be delivered. 7 And she brought forth her firstborn son, and wrapped him in swaddling clothes, and laid him in a manger; because there was no room for them in the inn.

BETHLEHEM.—VER. 4.

"The fulness of time" was now come, when God would send "forth his Son, made of a woman, and made under the law;" and it was foretold that he should be born at Bethlehem. Now here we have an account of the time, place, and manner of it.

First. The time when our Lord Jesus was born; and several things may be gathered out of these verses, which intimate to us that it was the proper time.

1. He was born at the time when the fourth monarchy was in its height, just when it was become, more than any of the three before it, a universal monarchy. He was born in the days of Augustus Cæsar, when the Roman empire extended itself farther than ever before or since, including Parthia one way and Britain another way; so that it was then called terrarum orbis impertum,—"the empire of the whole earth;" and here that empire is called "all the world," ver. 1; for there was scarce any part of the civilised world but what was dependent on it. Now this was the time when the Messiah was to be born, according to Daniel's prophecy, Dan. ii. 44: "In the days of these kings," the kings of the fourth monarchy, "shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed."

2. He was born when Judæa was become a province of the empire, and tributary to it; as appears evidently by this, that when all the Roman empire was taxed, the Jews were taxed among the rest; Jerusalem was taken by Pompey, the Roman general, about sixty years before this, who granted the government of the church to Hircanus, but not the government of the state; and by degrees it was more and more reduced, till now at length it was quite subdued; for Judæa was ruled by Cyrenius, the Roman governor of Syria, ver. 2: the Roman writers call him Sulpitius Quirinius. Now just at this juncture the Messiah was to be born, for so was dying Jacob's prophecy, "that Shiloh should come when the sceptre was departed from Judah, and the lawgiver from between his feet," Gen. xlix. 10. This was the first taxing that was made in Judæa, the first badge of their servitude; therefore, now Shiloh must come to set up his kingdom.

3. There is another circumstance as to the time, which is implied in this general enrolment of all the subjects of the empire; which is, that there was now a universal peace in the empire: the temple of Janus was now shut, which it never used to be, if any wars were on foot. And now it was fit for the Prince of peace to be born, in whose days swords should be beaten into ploughshares.

Secondly. The place where our Lord Jesus was born is very observable; he was born at Bethlehem; so it was foretold, Mic. v. 2; the scribes so understood it, Mat. ii. 5, 6; so did the common people, Jno. vii. 42. The name of the place was significant; Bethlehem signifies, "the house of bread;" a proper place for him to be born in, who is the bread of life, "the bread that came down from heaven." But that was not all; Bethlehem was the city of David, where he was born, and therefore there he must be born who was the Son of David. Zion was also called the city of David, 2 Sam. v. 7, yet Christ was not born there; for Bethlehem was that city of David where he was born in meanness, to be a shepherd; and that our Saviour, when he humbled himself, chose for the place of his birth; not Zion, where he ruled in power and prosperity,—that was to be a type of the church of Christ, that mount Zion. Now when the virgin Mary was with child, and near her time, Providence so ordered it, that by order from the emperor all the subjects of the Roman empire were to be taxed; that is, they were to give in their names to the proper officers, and they were to be registered and enrolled according to their families, which is the proper signification of the word here used, and their being taxed was but secondary; it is supposed they made profession of subjection to the Roman empire, either by some set form of words, or at least by payment of some small tribute, a penny suppose, in token of their allegiance, like a man's attuning tenant. Thus are they vassals upon record, and may thank themselves.

Now according to this decree, the Jews, who were now nice in distinguishing their tribes and families, provided that in their enrolments particular care should be had to preserve the memory of them. Thus foolishly are they solicitous to save the shadow when they had lost the substance.

Now that which Augustus designed, was either to gratify his pride, in knowing the numbers of his people, and proclaiming it to the world, or he did it in policy, to strengthen his interest, and make his government appear the more formidable; but Providence had another reach in it. All the world shall be at the trouble of being enrolled, only that Joseph and Mary may; this brought them up from Nazareth in Galilee, to Bethlehem in Judæa, because they were

"of the stock and lineage of David," ver. 4, 5: and perhaps being poor and low, they thought the royalty of their extraction rather a burthen and expense to them than a matter of pride. Because it is difficult to suppose that every Jew (women as well as men) was obliged to repair to the city of which their ancestors were, and there be enrolled, now at a time when they kept not to the bounds of their tribes as formerly. It may be offered as a conjecture, that this great exactness was used only with the family of David, concerning which it is probable the emperor gave particular orders, it having been the royal family; and still talked of as designed to be so, that he might know the number and strength of that. And divers ends of Providence were served by this.

1. Hereby the virgin Mary was brought big with child to Bethlehem, to be delivered there, according to the prediction; whereas she had designed to lie-in at Nazareth. See how man purposeth and God disposeth; and how Providence orders all things for the fulfilling of the Scripture; and makes use of the projects men have for the serving their own purposes, quite beyond their intention, to serve his.

2. Hereby it appeared that Jesus Christ was of the seed of David; for else what brings his mother to Bethlehem now, but because she "was of the stock and lineage of David?" And this was a material thing to be proved, and required such an authentic proof as this. Justin Martyr and Tertullian, two of the most early advocates for the Christian religion, appeal to these rolls or records of the Roman empire, for the proof of Christ's being born of the house of David.

3. Hereby it appeared that he was "made under the law;" for he became a subject of the Roman empire as soon as he was born, "a servant of rulers," Isa. xlix. 7. Many suppose, that being born during the time of the taxing, he was enrolled as well as his father and mother, that it might appear how "he made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant;" instead of having kings tributaries to him, when he came into the world he was himself a tributary.

Thirdly. The circumstances of his birth, which were very mean, and under all possible marks of contempt. He was indeed a firstborn son, but it was poor honour to be the firstborn of such a poor woman as Mary was, who had no inheritance to which he might be entitled as firstborn, but what was in nativity.

1. He was under some abasements in common with other children; he was "wrapped in swaddling clothes," as other children are, when they are new born, as if he could be bound, or needed to be kept straight. He that makes darkness a swaddling band for the sea, was himself wrapped in swaddling bands, Job xxxviii. 9. The everlasting Father became a child of time, and men said of him, whose outgoings were of old from everlasting, "We know this man whence he is," Jno. vii. 27. The Ancient of Days became an infant of a span long.

2. He was under some abasements peculiar to himself.

1st. He was born at an inn. That son of David that was the glory of his father's house, had no inheritance that he could command, no, not in the city of David; no, nor a friend that would accommodate his mother in distress with lodgings, to be brought to bed in. Christ was born in an inn, to intimate that he came into the world but to sojourn here for a while, as in an inn, and to teach us to do likewise. An inn receives all comers, and so doth Christ. He hangs out the banner of love for his sign, and whoever comes to him, he will win no wise cast out; only unlike other inns, he welcomes those that come "without money and without price," all on free cost.

2nd. He was born in a stable: so some think the word signifies which we translate a manger, a place for cattle to stand to be fed in; because there was "no room in the inn;" and for want of conveniences, nay, for want of necessities, he was laid in the manger, instead of a cradle. And the word which we render swaddling clothes, some derive from a word that signifies to rend or tear, and thence infer, that he was so far from having a good suit of childbed linen, that his very swaddles were ragged and torn. His being born in a stable, and laid in a manger, was an instance, First. Of the poverty of his parents; had they been rich, room would have been made for them; but, being poor, they must shift as they could. Secondly. Of the corruption and degeneracy of manners in that age; that a woman in reputation for virtue and honour should be used so barbarously. If there had been any common humanity among them they would not have turned a woman in travail into a stable. Thirdly. It was an instance of the humiliation of our Lord Jesus. We were become by sin like an outcast infant, helpless and forlorn; and such a one Christ was. Thus he would answer the type of Moses, the great prophet and lawgiver of the Old Testament, who was in his infancy cast out in an ark of bulrushes, as Christ in a manger. Christ would hereby put a contempt upon all worldly glory, and teach us to slight it. Since "his own received him not," let us not think strange if they receive us not.

8 And there were in the same country shepherds abiding in the field, keeping watch over their flock by night. 9 And, lo, the angel of the Lord came upon them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them: and they were sore afraid. 10 And the angel said unto them, Fear not: for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. 11 For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord. 12 And this shall be a sign unto you; Ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger. 13 And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host praising God, and saying, 14 Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men. 15 And it came to pass, as the angels were gone away from them into heaven, the shepherds said one to another, Let us now go even unto Bethlehem, which was the view adopted by Schmidius and others after him. Every difficulty is not removed by Zumpt's theory, but it has been very generally received by critics. For "all the world," in verse 1, the Syriac-Peshito has "all the people of his dominion," which is in accordance with ascertained fact.

ii. 4, 5. Hereupon Dean Alford notes the mixture of Jewish and Roman customs. The Roman census was made where people actually lived, and not at the place of their extraction. The decree included all persons, but among the Jews, "inasmuch as it was made under a Jewish king, it was done after the Jewish manner, in taking this account of each at his own place of extraction." As a married woman, Mary accompanied her husband, but she might also have gone to Bethlehem, because she was of the lineage of David also.

ii. 7. It was an ancient opinion that our Lord was born in a cave, and he may have been, as caves were often used for stables.

ii. 8. This verse renders it highly probable that Jesus was not and see this thing which is come to pass, which the Lord hath made known unto us. 16 And they came with haste, and found Mary, and Joseph, and the babe lying in a manger. 17 And when they had seen it, they made known abroad the saying which was told them concerning this child. 18 And all they that heard it wondered at those things which were told them by the shepherds. 19 But Mary kept all these things, and pondered them in her heart. 20 And the shepherds returned, glorifying and praising God for all the things that they had heard and seen, as it was told unto them.

The meanest circumstances of Christ's humiliation were all along attended with some discoveries of his glory, to balance them, and take off the offence of them; for even when he humbled himself, God did in some measure exalt him, and gave him earnest of his future exaltation. When we saw him wrapped in swaddling clothes and laid in a manger, we were tempted to say, 'Sure this cannot be the Son of God; but see his birth attended as it is here, with a choir of angels, and we shall say, 'Surely it can be no other but the Son of God, concerning whom it was said, when he was brought into the world, "Let all the angels of God worship him,"' Heb. i. 6.

We had in Matthæw an account of the notice given of the arrival of this Ambassador, this Prince from heaven, to the wise men, who were Gentiles, by a star; here we are told of the notice given of it to the shepherds, who were Jews, by an angel: to each God chose to speak in the language they were most conversant with.

First. See here how the shepherds were employed; they were "abiding in the fields" adjoining to Bethlehem, and "keeping watch over their flocks by night," ver. 5. The angel was not sent to the chief priests or the elders; they were not prepared to receive these tidings; but to a company of poor shepherds, that were, like Jacob, plain men, dwelling in tents; not like Esau, cunning hunters. The patriarchs were shepherds; Moses and David particularly were called from keeping sheep to rule God's people; and by this instance God would shew that he had still a favour for those of that innocent employment. Tidings were brought to Moses of the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, when he was keeping sheep; and to these shepherds, who it is probable were devout, pious men, the tidings were brought of a greater salvation. Observe, 1. They were not sleeping in their beds when this news was brought them, (though many had very acceptable intelligence from Heaven in slumbering upon the bed,) but abiding in the fields, and watching. Those that would hear from God, must stir up themselves. They were broad awake, and therefore could not be deceived in what they saw and heard, as those may who are half asleep. 2. They were not now employed in acts of devotion, but in the business of their calling; they were "keeping watch over their flock," to secure them from thieves and beasts of prey, it probably being in the summer time, when they kept their cattle out all night, as we do now, and did not house them. Note, We are not out of the way of Divine visits, when we are sensibly employed in an honest calling, and abide with God in it.

Secondly. How they were surprised with the appearance of an angel to them, ver. 9: "Behold an angel of the Lord came upon them," of a sudden, ἐφίπτε, 'stood over them;' most probably in the air over their heads, as coming immediately from heaven. We read it 'the angel,' as if it were the same that appeared once and again in the chapter before, the angel Gabriel, that was caused to fly swiftly, but that is not certain. The angel's coming upon them intimates that they little thought of such a thing, or expected it; for it is in a preventing way that gracious visits are made us from heaven, or ever we are aware. That they might be sure it was an angel from heaven, they saw and heard the glory of the Lord round about them, such as made the night as bright as day; such a glory as used to attend God's appearance; a heavenly glory, or, an exceeding great glory, such as they could not bear the dazzling lustre of. This made them sore afraid, put them into a mighty consternation, as fearing some evil tidings. While we are conscious to ourselves of so much guilt, we have reason to fear lest every express from heaven be a messenger of wrath.

Thirdly. What the message was which the angel had to deliver to the shepherds, ver. 10-12. 1. He gives a supersedeas to their fears; "fear not," for we have nothing to say to you that needs be a terror to you; you need not fear your enemies, and should not fear your friends. 2. He furnisheth them with abundant matter for joy: 'Behold, I evangelize to you great joy, I solemnly declare it, and you have reason to bid it welcome, for it shall bring "joy to all people," and not to the people of the Jews only; that "unto you is born this day," at this time, "a Saviour;" the Saviour that has been so long expected,

"which is Christ the Lord, in the city of David," ver. 11. Jesus is the Christ, the Messiah, the Anointed; he is the Lord, Lord of all; is a Sovereign Prince nay, he is God, for the Lord in the Old Testament answers to Jehovah. He is a Saviour, and he will be a Saviour to those only that accept of him for their Lord. The Saviour is born—he is born this day; and since it is matter of "great joy to all people," it is not to be kept secret; you may proclaim it—may tell it to whom you please. He is born in the place where it was foretold he should be born,—in the city of David: and he is born to you, to you Jews he is sent, in the first place to bless you; to you shepherds, though poor and mean in the world. This refers to Isa. ix. 6, "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given." To you men, not to us angels; he took not on him our nature. This is matter of joy indeed to all people, great joy, long looked for, come at last. Let heaven and earth rejoice before this Lord, for he cometh. 3. He gives them a sign for the confirming of their faith in this matter. 'How shall we find out this child in Bethlehem, which is now full of the descendants from David?' 'You will find him by this token; he is lying in a manger, where sure never any new-born infant was laid before.' They expected to be told, 'You shall find him, though a babe, dressed up in robes, and lying in the best house in the town, lying in state, with a numerous train of attendants in rich liveries.' No; 'you will find him wrapped in swaddling clothes, and laid in a manger.' When Christ was here upon earth he distinguished himself, and made himself remarkable, by nothing so much as the instances of his humiliation.

Fourthly. The angels' doxology to God, and congratulations of men upon this solemn occasion, ver. 13, 14. The message was no sooner delivered by one angel—that was sufficient to go express, but suddenly there was with that angel, "a multitude of the heavenly hosts;" enough, we may be sure, to make a chorus, that were heard by the shepherds praising God; and to be sure, their song was not like that, Rev. xiv. 3, which no man could learn, for it was designed we should all learn it. 1. Let God have the honour of this work; "Glory to God in the highest." God's goodwill to men, manifested in sending the Messiah, redounds very much to his praise; and angels in the highest heavens, though not immediately interested in it themselves, yet will celebrate it to his honour, Rev. v. 11, 12; "Glory to God," whose kindness and love designed this favour, and whose wisdom contrived it in such a way as that one Divine attribute should not be glorified at the expense of another, but the honour of all effectually secured and advanced. Other works of God are for his glory, but the redemption of the world is for his "glory in the highest." 2. Let men have the joy of it; "on earth peace, goodwill towards men." God's goodness in sending the Messiah introduced peace in this lower world, slew the enmity that sin had raised between God and man, and resettled a peaceable correspondence. If God be at peace with us, all peace results from thence; peace of conscience, peace with angels, peace between Jew and Gentile. Peace is here put for all good; all that good which flows to us from the incarnation of Christ: all the good we have or hope is owing to God's goodwill; and if we have the comfort of it, he must have the glory of it. Nor must any peace, any good, be expected in a way inconsistent with the glory of God; therefore not in any way of sin, nor in any way but by a Mediator. Here was the peace proclaimed with great solemnity; whoever will, let them come and take the benefit of it: it is on earth peace, 'to men of goodwill,' so some copies read it, ἐν ἀνθρώποις εὐδοκίας; to men that have a goodwill to God, and are willing to be reconciled; or, to men whom God has a goodwill to, though vessels of his mercy. See how well affected the angels are to man, and to his welfare and happiness; how well pleased they were in the incarnation of the Son of God, though he passed by their nature; and ought not we much more to be affected with it. "This is a faithful saying," attested by an innumerable company of angels, and well "worthy of all acceptance," that "the goodwill of God towards men is glory to God in the highest, and peace on the earth."

Fifthly. The visit which the shepherds made to the new-born Saviour. 1. They consulted about it, ver. 15; while the angels were singing their hymn, they could attend to that only; but "when they were gone away from them into heaven"—for angels, when they appeared, never made any long stay, but returned as soon as they had despatched their business,—the shepherds said one to another, Let us now go to Bethlehem. Note, When extraordinary messages from the upper world are no more to be expected, we must set ourselves to improve the advantages we have for the confirming of our faith, and the keeping up of our communion with God in this lower world. And it is no reflection upon the testimony of angels, no, nor upon a Divine testimony itself, to get it corroborated by observation and experience. But observe, these shepherds do not speak doubtfully, Let us go see whether it be so or no; but with assurance, "Let us go see this thing which is come to pass;" for what room was left to doubt of it, when the Lord had thus made it known to them? the word spoken by angels was steadfast and unquestionably true. 2. They immediately made the visit, ver. 16; they lost no time, but came with haste to the place, (which probably the angel directed them to more particularly than is recorded, Go to the stable of such an inn,) and there "they found Mary and Joseph, and the babe lying in a manger;" and the poverty and meanness in which they found Christ the Lord was no shock to their faith, who themselves knew what it was to live a life of comfortable communion with God, in very poor and mean circumstances. We have reason to think that the shepherds told Joseph and Mary of the vision of the angels they had seen, and the song of the angels they had heard, which was a great encouragement to them; more than if a visit had been made them by the best ladies in the town. And it is probable Joseph and Mary told the shepherds what visions they had had concerning the child; and so, by communicating their experiences to each other they greatly strengthened one another's faith.

Sixthly. The care which the shepherds took to spread the report of it; ver. 17, "when they had seen it," though they saw nothing in the child that should induce them to believe that he was "Christ the Lord;" yet the circumstances, how mean soever they were, agreeing with the sign that the angel had given them, they were abundantly satisfied; and, as the lepers argued, 2 Kin. vii. 9, this being "a day of good tidings," they dare not "hold their peace," but "make known abroad" the whole story of what was told them, both by the angels and by Joseph and Mary, concerning this child, that he was the Saviour, even Christ the Lord,—that in him there is peace on earth, and that he was conceived by the power of the Holy Ghost, and born of a virgin. This they told to every body, and agreed in their testimony concerning it; and now, if when he is in the world, the world knows him not, it is their own faults, for they have sufficient notice given them. And what impression did it make upon the people? Why truly, "all they that heard it wondered at those things told them by the shepherds," ver. 18. The shepherds were plain, downright honest men, and they could not suspect them guilty of any design to impose upon them; what they said, therefore, it is likely might be true; and if it were true, they could not but wonder at it; that the Messiah should be born in a stable, and not in a palace; that angels should bring news of it to poor shepherds, and not to the chief priests. They wondered, but never inquired any farther about the Saviour, their duty to him, or advantages by him, but let the thing drop, as a nine days' wonder. O the amazing stupidity of the men of that born in winter, but in spring or summer; because it is not the custom for shepherds to be out in the fields with their flocks in the winter months. Mr. Greswell concludes that our Lord was born in April, on the 5th of the month. Other dates have been fixed, but the only thing which can be regarded as nearly certain is that the nativity did not take place in winter. As Albert Barnes says, "God has concealed the time of his birth. There is no way to ascertain it. By different learned men it has been placed at each month in the

ii. 14. Instead of the common reading, "and on earth peace, good will toward men," some ancient authorities read, "and on earth peace to men of his good will," i.e., to men in whom God is well pleased. Whichever reading is followed, "good will" means Divine favour.

ii. 21. The rite of circumcision was ordered by the law to take generation! Justly were the things which belonged to their peace hid from their eyes, when they thus wilfully shut their eyes against them.

Seventhly. The use which those made of those things who did believe them, and receive the impression of them. 1. The virgin Mary made them the matter of her private meditation. She said little, but "kept all these things and pondered them in her heart," ver. 19; she laid the evidences together, and kept them in reserve, to be compared with the discoveries that should after be made her. As she had silently left it to God to clear up her honesty, when that was suspected, so she silently leaves it to him to publish her honour, now when it was veiled; and it is satisfaction enough to find that if nobody else takes notice of the birth of her child, angels do. Note. The truths of Christ are worth keeping; and the way to keep them safe is to ponder them: meditation is the best help to memory. 2. The shepherds made them the matter of their more public praises. If others were not affected with those things, yet they themselves were, ver. 20; they "returned glorifying and praising God," in concurrence with the holy angels. If others would not regard the report they made to them, God would accept the thanksgivings they offered to him. They praised God for what they had heard from the angel, and for what they had seen—the babe in the manger, and just then in the swaddling, when they came in, as it had been spoken to them. They thanked God they had seen Christ though in the depth of his humiliation; as afterwards the cross of Christ, so, now his manger, though to some it was foolishness and a stumblingblock, yet others saw in it and admired and praised the wisdom of God and the power of God.

21 And when eight days were accomplished for the circumcising of the child, his name was called JESUS, which was so named of the angel before he was conceived in the womb. 22 And when the days of her purification according to the law of Moses were accomplished, they brought him to Jerusalem, to present him to the Lord; 23 (As it is written in the law of the Lord, Every male that openeth the womb shall be called holy to the Lord;) 24 And to offer a sacrifice according to that which is said in the law of the Lord, A pair of turtledoves, or two young pigeons.

Our Lord Jesus, being "made of a woman," was "made under the law," Gal. iv. 4. He was not only, as the son of a daughter of Adam, made under the law of nature, but as the son of a daughter of Abraham, he was made under the law of Moses; he puts his neck under that yoke, though it was a heavy yoke, and "a shadow of good things to come;" and though its institutions were beggarly elements, and rudiments of this world, as the apostle calls them, Christ submitted to it, that he might with the better grace cancel it, and set it aside for us. Now here we have two instances of his being made under that law, and submitting to it:

First. He was circumcised on the very day that the law appointed, ver. 21: "When eight days were accomplished," that day seven-night that he was born, they circumcised him. 1. Though it was a painful operation, "surely a bloody husband thou hast been," saith Zipporah to Moses, "because of the circumcision." Ex. iv. 25, yet Christ would undergo it for us; nay, therefore he submitted to it, to give an instance of his early obedience—his obedience unto blood. Then he shed his blood by drops, which afterwards he poured out in purple streams. 2. Though it supposed him a stranger, that was by that ceremony to be admitted into covenant with God, whereas he had always been his beloved Son; nay, though it supposed him a sinner, that needed to have his filthiness taken away, whereas he had no impurity, or superfluity of naughtiness to be cut off, yet he submitted to it; nay, therefore he submitted to it, because he would be made in the likeness not only of flesh, but of sinful flesh, Rom. viii. 3. 3. Though thereby he made himself a debtor to the whole law, Gal. v. 3, yet he submitted to it; nay, therefore he submitted to it, because he would take upon him the form of a servant, though he was freeborn. Christ was circumcised, 1st. That he might own himself of the seed of Abraham, and of that nation "of whom, as concerning the flesh, Christ came," and who was to "take on him the seed of Abraham," Heb. ii. 17. 2nd. That he might own himself a surety for our sins, and an undertaker for our safety. Circumcision, saith Dr. Goodwin, was our bond whereby we acknowledged ourselves debtors to the law; and Christ, by being circumcised, did as it were set his hand to it, being "made sin for us." The ceremonial law consisted much in sacrifices; Christ hereby obliged himself to offer not the blood of bulls or goats, but his own blood, which none that ever were circumcised could oblige themselves to, but he only. 3rd. That he might justify and put an honour upon the dedication of the infant seed of the church to God by that ordinance which is the instituted seal of the covenant, and of the righteousness which is by faith, as circumcision was, Rom. iv. 11, and baptism is; and certainly his being circumcised at eight days' old, doth make much more for the dedicating of the seed of the faithful by baptism in their infancy, than his being baptized at thirty years' old doth for the deferring of it till they are grown up. The change of the ceremony alters not the substance.

At his circumcision, according to the custom, he had his name given him: he was called Jesus, or Joshua, for he was "so named of the angel" to his mother Mary, "before he was conceived in the womb," ch. i. 31; and to his supposed father Joseph, after, Mat. i. 21. First. It was a common name among the Jews, as John was, Col. iv. 11; and in this he would be made like unto his brethren. Secondly. It was the name of two eminent types of him in the Old Testament; Joshua, the successor of Moses, that was commander of Israel, and conqueror of Canaan; and Joshua the high priest, who was therefore purposely crowned, that he might prefigure Christ as "a priest upon his throne," Zec. vi. 11, 13. Thirdly. It was very significant of his undertaking. Jesus signifies a Saviour. He would be denominated, not from the glories of his divine nature, but from his gracious designs as Mediator, he brings salvation.

Secondly. He was presented in the temple. This was done with an eye to the law, and at the time appointed by the law, when he was forty days' old; "when the days of her purification were accomplished," ver. 22; many copies, and authentic ones, read after for within,—the days of their purification; the purification both of the mother and of the child; for so it was intended to be by the law; and our Lord Jesus, though he had no impurity to be cleansed from, yet submitted to it, as he did to circumcision, because he was made sin for us; and that as by the circumcision of Christ we might be circumcised, in the virtue of our union and communion with him, with a spiritual circumcision made without hands, Col. ii. 11, so in the purification of Christ we might be spiritually purified from that filthiness and corruption which we brought into the world with us. Now according to the law,

1. The child Jesus being a firstborn son, was "presented to the Lord," in one of the courts of the temple. The law is here recited, ver. 23, "Every male that openeth the womb shall be called holy to the Lord;" because, by a special writ of protection, the firstborn of Israel were preserved when the firstborn of the Egyptians were slain by the destroying angel; so that Christ, as firstborn, was a priest by a title surer than that of Aaron's house. Christ was the firstborn among many brethren, and was called holy to the Lord, so as never any other was, yet he was "presented to the Lord," as other firstborn were, and no otherwise. Though he was newly come out of the bosom of the Father, yet he was presented to him by the hands of a priest, as if he had been a stranger that needed one to introduce him. His being "presented to the Lord" now signified his presenting himself to the Lord as Mediator, when he was caused to draw near and approach unto him, Jer. xxx. 21; but according to the law he was redeemed, Num. xviii. 15, "the firstborn of man shalt thou redeem;" and five shekels was the value, Lev. xxvii. 6; Num. xviii. 16; but probably, in case of poverty, the priest was allowed to take less, or perhaps nothing, for no mention is made of it here. Christ was presented to the Lord, not to be brought back, for his ear was bored to God's doopost, to serve him for ever; and though he is not left in the temple as Samuel was, to minister there, yet like him he is given to the Lord as long as he lives, and ministers to him in the true temple "not made with hands."

2. The mother brought her offering, ver. 24; when she had presented that son of hers unto the Lord, who was to be the great sacrifice, she might have been excused from offering any other; but so "it is said in the law of the Lord," that law which was yet in force, and therefore so it must be done; she must offer "a pair of turtledoves, or two young pigeons;" had she been of ability, she must have brought "a lamb for a burnt offering," and a "dove for a sin offering;" but being poor, and not able to reach the price of a lamb, she brings two doves, one for a "burnt offering, and the other for a sin offering;" see Lev. xii. 7, 8; to teach us in every address to God, and particularly in those upon special occasions, both to give thanks to God for his mercies to us, and to acknowledge with sorrow and shame our sins against him, and in both we must give glory to him; nor do we ever want matter for both. Christ was not conceived and born in sin, as others are; so there was not that occasion in his case that is in others; yet, because he was made under the law, he complied with it; "thus it became him to fulfil all righteousness." Much more doth it become the best of men to join in confessions of sin, for "who can say, I have made my heart clean?"

25 And, behold, there was a man in Jerusalem, whose name was Simeon; and the same man was just and devout, waiting for the consolation of Israel: and the Holy Ghost was upon him. 26 And it was revealed unto him by the Holy Ghost, that he should not see death, before he had seen the Lord's Christ. 27 And he came by the Spirit into the temple: and when the parents brought in the child Jesus, to do for him after the custom of the law, 28 Then took he him up in his arms, and blessed God, and said, 29 Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word: 30 For mine eyes have seen thy salvation, 31 Which thou hast prepared before the face of all people; 32 A light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people Israel. 33 And Joseph and his mother marvelled at those things which were spoken of him. 34 And Simeon blessed them, and said unto Mary his mother, Behold, this child is set for the fall and rising again of many in Israel; and for a sign which shall be spoken against; 35 (Yea, a sword shall pierce through thy own soul also,) that the thoughts of many hearts may be revealed. 36 And there was one Anna, a prophetess, the daughter of Phanuel, of the tribe of Aser: she was of a great age, and had lived with an husband seven years from her virginity; 37 And she was a widow of about fourscore and four years, which departed not from the temple, but served God with fastings and prayers night and day. 38 And she coming in that instant gave thanks likewise unto the Lord, and spake of him to all them that looked for redemption in Jerusalem. 39 And

ii. 22. According to the law, the rite of purification for a woman after the birth of a male child was forty days, and sixty-six days for a female child. Instead of "her" purification, some copies have "his," others "their," and some "of both" (the purification of both). Adam Clarke says, "A needless scrupulosity was, in my opinion, the origin of these various readings." The best supported are "their"

and "his;" very little real authority exists for "her." Nearly all the modern critical editions have "the days of their purification;" and with good reason, because both mother and infant took part in the ceremonies which were followed. As an altogether ritual service it was observed by Jesus equally with other legal ordinances, equally with that of baptism, because he was made "in the likeness of sinful flesh."

ii. 25. It cannot be certainly known who this Simeon was, but when they had performed all things according to the law of the Lord, they returned into Galilee, to their own city Nazareth. 40 And the child grew, and waxed strong in spirit, filled with wisdom: and the grace of God was upon him.

Still Christ has honour done to him then when he humbles himself, to balance the offence of it; that we might not be stumbled at the meanness of his birth, angels then did him honour; and now, that we may not be offended at his being presented in the temple, like other children born in sin, and without any manner of solemnity peculiar to him, but silently, and in the crowd of other children, Simeon and Anna now do him honour, by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost.

First. A very honourable testimony is borne to him by Simeon, which was both a reputation to the child and an encouragement to the parents, and might have been a happy introducing of the priests into an acquaintance with the Saviour, if those watchmen had not been blind. Now observe here.

1. The account that is given us concerning this Simeon, or Simon. He dwelt now in Jerusalem, and was eminent for his piety and communion with God. Some learned men, that have been conversant with the Jewish writers, find that there was at this time one Simeon, a man of great note in Jerusalem, the son of Hillel, and the first to whom they gave the title of rabban, the highest title that they gave to their doctors, and which was never given but to seven of them. He succeeded his father Hillel as president of the college which his father founded, and of the great Sanhedrim. The Jews say he was endued with a prophetic spirit, and that he was turned out of his place because he witnessed against the common opinion of the Jews concerning the temporal kingdom of the Messiah; and they likewise observe, that there is no mention of him in their Mishna, or book of traditions, which intimates that he was no patron of those fooleries. One thing objected against this conjecture is, that at this time his father Hillel was living, and that he himself lived many years after this, as appears by the Jewish histories; but, as to that, he is not here said to be old; and his saying, Now let thy servant depart, intimates that he was willing to die now, but doth not conclude that therefore he died quickly. St. Paul lived many years after he had spoken of his death as near, Acts xx. 25. Another thing objected is, that the son of Simeon was Gamaliel, a Pharisee, and an enemy to Christianity; but, as to that, it is no new thing for a faithful lover of Christ to have a son a bigoted Pharisee.

The account given of him here is, 1st. That he was "just and devout," just towards men, and devout towards God; these two must always go together, and each will befriend the other, but neither will atone for the defect of the other. 2nd. That he "waited for the consolation of Israel," that is, for the coming of the Messiah, in whom alone the nation of Israel, that was now miserably harassed and oppressed, would find consolation. Christ is not only the author of his people's comfort, but the matter and ground of it, "the consolation of Israel." He was long coming, and they who believed he would come, continued waiting, desiring his coming, and hoping for it with patience; I had almost said, with some degree of impatience, waiting till it came. He understood by books, as Daniel, that the time was at hand, and therefore was now, more than ever, big with expectation of it. The unbelieving Jews, who still expect that which is already come, use it as an oath or solemn protestation, "As ever I hope to see the consolation of Israel," so and so it is. Note, The consolation of Israel is to be waited for, and it is worth waiting for, and it will be very welcome to those who have waited for it, and continue waiting. 3rd. The Holy Ghost was upon him, not only as a spirit of holiness, but as a spirit of prophecy; he was "filled with the Holy Ghost," and enabled to speak things above himself. 4th. He had a gracious promise made him, that before he died he should have a sight of the Messiah, ver. 26. He was searching what manner of time the Spirit of Christ, in the Old Testament prophets, did signify, and whether it were not now at hand; and he received this oracle (for so the word signifies), "that he should not see death before he had seen" the Messiah, "the Lord's anointed." Note, Those, and those only, can with courage see death, and look it in the face without terror, that have had by faith a sight of Christ.

2. The seasonable coming of Simeon into the temple at the time when Christ was presented there, ver. 27. Just then, when Joseph and Mary brought in the child to be registered, as it were, in the church book, among the first-born, Simeon came by direction of the Spirit into the temple. The same Spirit that had provided for the support of his hope, now provided for the transport of his joy. It was whispered in his ear, Go to the temple now, and you shall see what you have longed to see. Note, Those that would see Christ must go to his temple, for there the Lord whom ye seek shall suddenly come to meet you, and there you must be ready to meet him.

3. The abundant satisfaction wherewith he welcomed this sight; he "took him up in his arms," ver. 28, he embraced him with the greatest affection imaginable, laid him in his bosom, as near his heart as he could, which is as full of joy as it can hold. He "took him up in his arms" to present him to the Lord, so some think, either to do the parent's part, or the priest's part; for divers of the ancients say he was himself a priest. When we receive the record which the Gospel gives us of Christ with a lively faith, and the offer it makes us of Christ with love and resignation, then we take Christ in our arms. It was promised him he should have a sight of Christ, but more is performed than was promised; he has him in his arms.

4. The solemn declaration he made hereupon; he "blessed God, and said, Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace," ver. 29-32.

1st. He has a pleasant prospect concerning himself, and (which is a great attainment) is got quite above the love of life, and fear of death; nay, he is arrived to a holy contempt of life, and desire of death: "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart, for mine eyes have seen the salvation." I was promised a sight of before I died. Here is, First, An acknowledgment that God had been as good as his word; there has not failed one tittle of his good promises, as Solomon owns, 1 Kin. viii. 56. Note, Never any that hoped in God's word were made ashamed of their hope. Secondly, A thanksgiving for it; he "blessed God" that he saw that salvation in his arms which many prophets and kings desired to see, and might not. Thirdly, A confession of his faith, that this child in his arms was the Saviour, the salvation itself; "thy salvation," the salvation of "thine appointing"; the salvation "which thou hast prepared" with a great deal of contrivance; and while it has been thus long in the coming, it hath still been in the preparing. Fourthly, It is a farewell to this world: "Now let thy servant depart;" now mine eyes have been blessed with this sight, let them be closed, and see no more in this world. The eye is not satisfied with seeing, Ecc. i. 8, till it hath seen Christ, and then it is. What a poor thing doth this world look to one that hath Christ in his arms, and salvation in his eye. Now adieu to all my friends and relations, all my enjoyments and employments here, even the temple itself. Fifthly, It is a welcome to death: "Now let thy servant depart." Note, Death is a departure, the soul's departure out of the body, from the world of sense to the world of spirits. We must not depart till God gives us our discharge, for we are his servants, and must not quit his service till we have accomplished our time. Moses was promised that he should see Canaan, and then die; but he prayed that that word might be altered, Deu. iii. 24, 25. Simeon is promised that he should not see death till he had seen Christ, and he is willing to construe that beyond what was expressed, as an intimation that when he had seen Christ he should die: "Lord, be it so," saith he; "now let me depart." See here, 1st. How comfortable the death of a good man is; he departs, as God's servant, from the place of his toil to that of his rest. He departs in peace; peace with God, peace with his own conscience; in peace with death, well reconciled to it, well acquainted with it. He departs according to God's word; as Moses, at the mouth of the Lord, Deu. xxxiv. 5; the word of precept, "Go up, and die," the word of promise, "I will come again, and receive you to myself." 2nd. What is the ground of this comfort? "For mine eyes have seen thy salvation." This speaks more than a great complacency in the sight, like that of Jacob, Gen. xlii. 30, "Now let me die, since I have seen thy face;" it speaks a believing expectation of a happy state on the other side death, through this salvation he now had a sight of, which not only takes off the terror of death, but makes it gain, Phil. i. 21. Note, Those that have welcomed Christ, may welcome death.

2nd. He has a pleasant prospect concerning the world, and concerning the church. This salvation shall be, First, A blessing to the world. It is "prepared before the face of all people;" not to be hid in a corner, but to be made known; to be "a light to lighten the Gentiles," that now sit in darkness; they shall have the knowledge of him, and of God and another world through him. This has reference to Isa. xlix. 6, "I will give thee for a light to the Gentiles;" for Christ came to be the light of the world, not a candle in the Jewish candlestick, but the Sun of Righteousness. Secondly, A blessing to the church; "the glory of thy people Israel." It was an honour to the Jewish nation that the Messiah sprang out of one of their tribes, and was born, and lived, and died among them. And of those who were Israelites indeed, of the spiritual Israel, he was indeed the glory, and will be so to eternity, Isa. lx. 19; they shall glory in him, "in the Lord shall all the seed of Israel be justified, and shall glory," Isa. xlv. 25. When Christ ordered his apostles to preach the Gospel to all nations, therein he made himself "a light to lighten the Gentiles;" and when he added, "beginning at Jerusalem," he made himself "the glory of his people Israel."

5. The prediction concerning this child, which he delivered with his blessing to Joseph and Mary. They " marvelled at these things," which were still more and more fully and plainly spoken concerning this child, ver. 33; and because they were affected with, and had their faith strengthened by that which was said to them, here is more said to them.

1st. Simeon shews them what reason they had to rejoice; for he "blessed them," ver. 34; he pronounced them blessed who had the honour to be related to this child, and were intrusted with the bringing him up; he prayed for them that God would bless them, and would have others do so too. They had reason to rejoice, for this child should be not only a comfort and honour to them, but a public blessing; he is set "for the rising again of many in Israel," that is, for the conversion of many to God that are dead and buried in sin, and for the consolation of many in God that are sunk and lost in sorrow and despair. And those whom he is set for the fall of, may be the same with those whom he is set for the rising again of; he is set αὐτῶν καὶ ὑψώσας, for their fall, in order to their rising again; to humble and abase them, and bring them off from all confidence in themselves, that they may be exalted by relying on Christ; he wounds and then heals. Paul falls and rises again.

2nd. He shews them likewise what reason they had to rejoice with trembling, according to the advice given of old, with reference to the Messiah's kingdom, Ps. ii. 11. Lest Joseph, and Mary especially, should be lifted up with the abundance of the revelations, here is a thorn in the flesh for them, an alloy to their joy; and it is what we sometimes need. First, It is true, Christ shall be a blessing to Israel; but there are those in Israel whom he is "set for the fall" of, whose corruptions will be provoked, who will be prejudiced and enraged against him, and offended, and whose sin and ruin will be aggravated by the revelation of Jesus Christ; many that will extract poison to themselves out of the Balm of Gilead, and split their souls on the Rock of Salvation, to whom this precious Foundation Stone will be a stone of stumbling. This refers to that prophecy, Isa. viii. 14, 15; he shall be for a sanctuary to some, and yet for a snare to others, 1 Pet. ii. 7, 8. Note, As it is pleasant to think how many there are to whom Christ and his Gospel are "a savour of life unto life," so it is sad to think how many there are to whom it is "a savour of death unto death." He is set for a sign, to be admired by some, but by others, by many, spoken against. He had many eyes upon him during the time of his public ministry, he was a sign; but he had many tongues against him, the contradiction and reproach of sinners; he was continually cavilled at and abused; and the effects of this will be, "that the thoughts of many hearts will be revealed," ver. 35, that is, upon this occasion men will shew themselves, will discover and so distinguish themselves. The secret good affections and dispositions in the minds of some will be revealed by their embracing Christ, and closing with him; the secret corruptions and vicious dispositions of others, that otherwise would never have appeared so bad, will be revealed by their enmity to Christ, and their rage against him. Men will be judged of by the thoughts of their hearts, their thoughts concerning Christ; are they for him, or are they for his adversaries? "The word of God is a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart," and by it we are discovered to ourselves, and shall be judged hereafter. Secondly, It is true, Christ shall be a comfort to his mother; but be not thou too proud of it, for "a sword shall pass through thine own soul also." He shall be a suffering Jesus; and, 1st. Thou shalt suffer with him, by sympathy, more than other of his friends, because of the nearness of thy relation, and strength of affection to him. When he was abused, it was a sword in her bones. When she stood by his cross, and saw him dying, we may well think her inward grief was such that it might truly be said a sword pierced through her soul, it cut her to the heart. 2nd. Thou shalt suffer for him; many understand it as a prediction of her martyrdom; and some of the ancients say it had its accomplishment in that. Note, In the midst of our greatest delights and advancements in this world, it is good for us to know that bonds and afflictions abide us.

Secondly, He is taken notice of by one Anna, or Ann, a prophetess, that one of each sex might bear witness to Him in whom both men and women are invited to believe, that they may be saved. Observe.

1. The account here given of this Anna, who she was: she was, 1st. "A prophetess." The spirit of prophecy now began to revive, which had ceased in Israel above three hundred years. Perhaps no more is meant but that she was one who had understanding in the Scriptures above other women, and made it her business to instruct the younger women in the things of God. Though it was a very degenerate age of the church, yet God "left not himself without witness."

some have been of opinion that he was son of Hillel, one of the most famous Jewish doctors, and that he was at the head of the Sanhedrim. Some have thought Simeon was the father of Gamaliel.

ii. 27. The words "to do for him after the custom of the law" refer to the offering for the redemption of the first-born, his presentation to the Lord, and the service generally as it was customary on such occasions. One item was the payment of five shekels; about 12s. 6d. English.

ii. 33. For "Joseph and his mother" good ancient authorities read "his father and mother," which several modern critics adopt. There is reason to think that the word "father" was removed and Joseph substituted by some early copyist, who feared some misunderstanding.

ii. 34. "This child is set for the fall and rising again of many;" i.e., he would be to many the occasion of stumbling, and to many the means of raising them up to a higher and better faith and life.

2nd. She was "the daughter of Phanneel." Her father's name, saith Grotius, is mentioned to put us in mind of Jacob's Phaneel, or Penuel, Gen. xxxii. 30, that now the mystery of that should be unfolded, when in Christ we should as it were see God face to face, and our lives be preserved and her name signifies 'gracious.'

3rd. She was "of the tribe of Asher," which was in Galilee. This, some think, is taken notice of to refute those who said, "Out of Galilee ariseth no prophet;" when no sooner did prophecy revive, but it appeared from Galilee.

4th. "She was of a great age," a widow of about eighty-four years; some think she had now been eighty-four years a widow, and then she must be considerably above a hundred years old; others, rather than suppose that a woman so very old should be capable of fasting and praying, as she did, suppose that she was only eighty-four years of age, and had been long a widow; though she was a young widow, and had lived with her husband but seven years, yet she never married again, but continued a widow to her dying day, which is mentioned to her praise.

5th. She was a constant resident in, or at least attendant on, the temple. Some think she had lodgings in the courts of the temple, either in an alms house, being maintained by the temple charities, or, as a prophetess, she was lodged there, as in a proper place to be consulted and advised with by those that desired to know the mind of God. Others think her not departing from the temple means no more but that she was constantly there at the time of Divine service; when any good work was to be done, she was ready to join with it. It is most probable she had an apartment of her own among the out-buildings of the temple; and, besides her constant attendance on the public worship, abounded in private devotions, for she "served God with fastings and prayers night and day." Having no secular business to employ herself in, or being past it, she gave up herself wholly to her devotions, and not only fasted twice in the week, but always lived a mortified life, and spent that time in religious exercises which others spent in eating, and drinking, and sleeping; she not only observed the hours of prayer, but prayed night and day, was always in a praying frame, lived a life of prayer, gave herself to prayer, frequent in ejaculations, large in solemn prayers, and very particular in her intercessions. And in those she "served God;" that was it that put a value upon them, and an excellency into them. The Pharisees fasted oft, and made long prayers; but they served themselves, and their own pride and covetousness, in their fastings and prayers; but this good woman not only did that which was good, but did it from a good principle, and with a good end; she served God, and aimed at his honour, in "fastings and prayers." Note, First, Devotion is a thing we ought to be constant in; other duties are in season now and then, but we must pray always. Secondly, It is a pleasant sight to see aged Christians abounding in acts of devotion, as those that are not weary of well doing, that do not think themselves above their exercises, or past them, but that take more and more pleasure in them, and see more and more need of them, till they come to heaven. Thirdly, Those who are diligent and faithful in improving the light and means they have, shall have farther discoveries made them. Anna is now at length abundantly recompensed for her attendance so many years in the temple.

2. The testimony she bore to our Lord Jesus, ver. 38; "she came in at that instant," when the child was presented, and Simeon discoursed concerning him. She who was so constant to the temple, could not miss the opportunity. Now,

1st. She "gave thanks likewise to the Lord;" just as Simeon; perhaps like him, wishing now to depart in peace. Note, Those to whom Christ is made known, have reason enough to give thanks to the Lord for so great a favour; and we should be excited to that duty by the praises and thanksgivings of others; why should not we give thanks likewise, as well as they? Anna concurred with Simeon, and helped to make up the harmony; she confessed unto the Lord, so it may be read; she made an open profession of her faith concerning this child.

2nd. She, as a prophetess, instructed others concerning him: she "spoke of him to all them that believed the Messiah would come, and with him 'looked for redemption in Jerusalem.'" Redemption was the thing wanted, waited for, and wished for; "redemption in Jerusalem" for from thence the word of the Lord was to go forth, Isa. ii. 3. Some there were in Jerusalem that looked for redemption, yet but a few; for Anna, it should seem, had acquaintance with them all that were joint expectants with her of the Messiah; she knew where to find them, or they where to find her, and she told them all the good news, that she had seen the Lord; and it was great news: this of his birth now, as afterwards that of his resurrection. Note, Those that have got an acquaintance with Christ themselves, should do all they can to bring others acquainted with him.

Lastly. Here is a short account of the infancy and childhood of our Lord Jesus.

1. Where he spent it, ver. 39. When the ceremony of presenting the child and purifying the mother was all over, "they returned into Galilee." Luke relates no more concerning them they were returned into Galilee; but it appears by St. Matthew's gospel, ch. ii., that from Jerusalem they returned to Bethlehem, where the wise men of the East found them, and there they continued till they were directed to flee into Egypt, to escape the malice and rage of Herod; and returning from thence, when Herod was dead, they were directed to go to their old quarters in Nazareth, from whence they had been perhaps some years absent. It is here called "their own city," because there they had lived a great while, and their relations were there. He was ordered farther from Jerusalem, because his kingdom and priesthood were to have no affinity with the present government of the Jewish church or state. He is sent into a place of obscurity and reproach, for in this, as in other things, he must humble himself, and make himself of no reputation.

2. How he spent it, ver. 40. "In all things it behoved him to be made like unto his brethren," and therefore he passed through infancy and childhood as other children did, yet without sin; nay, yet with manifest indications of a Divine nature in him. As other children, he grew in stature of body, and the improvement of understanding in his human soul, that his natural body might be a figure of his mystical body, which, though animated by a perfect spirit, yet maketh increase of itself till it comes to the perfect man, Eph. iv. 13, 16. But, 1st. Whereas other children are weak in understanding and resolution, he was "strong in spirit;" by the Spirit of God his human soul was endued with extraordinary vigour, and all his faculties performed their offices in an extraordinary manner; he reasoned strongly, and his judgment was penetrating. 2nd. Whereas other children have foolishness bound in their hearts, which appears in what they say or do, he was "filled with wisdom;" not by any advantages of instruction and education, but by the operation of the Holy Ghost: every thing he said and did was wisely said, and wisely done, above his years. 3rd. Whereas other children shew that the corruption of nature is in them, and the tares of sin grow up with the wheat of reason, he made it appear that nothing but "the grace of God was upon him," the wheat sprang up without tares; and that, whereas other children are by nature children of wrath, he was greatly beloved, and high in the favour of God; that God loved him, and cherished him, and took a particular care of him.

41 Now his parents went to Jerusalem every year at the feast of the passover. 42 And when he was twelve years old, they went up to Jerusalem after the custom of the feast. 43 And when they had fulfilled the days, as they returned, the child Jesus tarried behind in Jerusalem; and Joseph and his mother knew not of it. 44 But they, supposing him to have been in the company, went a day's journey; and they sought him among their kinsfolk and acquaintance. 45 And when they found him not, they turned back again to Jerusalem, seeking him. 46 And it came to pass, that after three days they found him in the temple, sitting in the midst of the doctors, both hearing them, and asking them questions. 47 And all that heard him were astonished at his understanding and answers. 48 And when they saw him, they were amazed: and his mother said unto him, Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us? behold, thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing. 49 And he said unto them, How is it that ye sought me? wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business? 50 And they understood not the saying which he spake unto them. 51 And he went down with them, and came to Nazareth, and was subject unto them: but his mother kept all these sayings in her heart. 52 And Jesus increased in wisdom and stature, and in favour with God and man.

We have here the only passage of story recorded concerning our blessed Saviour from his infancy to the day of his shewing to Israel at twenty-nine years old, and therefore we are concerned to make much of this, for it is in vain to wish we had more. Here is,

First, Christ's going up with his parents to Jerusalem, at the feast of the passover, ver. 41, 42.

1. It was their constant practice to attend there, according to the law though it was a long journey, and they were poor, and perhaps not well able, without straitening themselves, to bear the expenses of it. Note, Public ordinances must be frequented, and we must not forsake the assembling ourselves together, as the manner of some is: worldly business must give way to spiritual concerns. Joseph and Mary had a son in the house with them that was able to teach them better than all the rabbins at Jerusalem, yet they went up thither "after the custom of the feast;" "the Lord loves the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob," and so should we. We have reason to suppose that Joseph went up likewise at the feasts of pentecost and tabernacles, for all the males were to appear there thrice a year, but Mary only at the passover, which was the greatest of the three feasts, and had most gospel in it.

2. The child Jesus, at twelve years old, went up with them. The Jewish doctors say that, at twelve years old, children must begin to fast from time to time, that they may learn to fast on the day of atonement; and at thirteen years old a child begins to be "a son of the commandment," that is, obliged to the duties of adult church membership, having been from his infancy, by virtue of his circumcision, "a son of the covenant." It is not said that this was the first time that Jesus went up to Jerusalem to worship at the feast; probably he had done it for some years before, having spirit and wisdom above his years; and all should attend on public worship that can "hear with understanding," Neh. viii. 2. Those children that are forward in other things should be put forward in religion. It is for the honour of Christ that children should attend on public worship, and he is pleased with their hosannas. And those children that were in their infancy dedicated to God should be called upon, when they are grown up, to come to the gospel passover—to the Lord's supper—that they may make it their own act and deed to join themselves to the Lord.

Secondly, Christ's tarrying behind his parents at Jerusalem, unknown to them, in which he designed to give an early specimen of what he was reserved for.

1. His parents did not return till "they had fulfilled the days," had stayed there all the seven days at the feast, though it was not absolutely necessary they should stay longer than the two first days, after which many went home. Note, It is good to stay to the conclusion of an ordinance, as becomes those who say, "It is good to be here," and not to hasten away, as if we were, like Doeg, detained before the Lord.

2. The child "tarried behind in Jerusalem," not because he was loath to go home, or shy of his parents' company, but because he had business to do there, and would let his parents know that he had a Father in heaven, whom he was to be observant of, more than of them; and respect to him must not be construed into disrespect to them. Some conjecture that he tarried behind in the temple, —for it was the custom of the pious Jews, that morning that they were to go home, to go first to the temple to worship God,—and there he stayed behind, and found entertainment there till they found him again; or perhaps he stayed at the house where they lodged, or some other friend's house, (and such a child as he was could not but be the darling of all that knew him, and every one ii. 35. This verse has been explained of the sorrows which the mother would endure in consequence of the sufferings of her Son. Some have thought it means that Mary would herself be a martyr, and others that it refers to her inward struggles in attaining to faith.

ii. 36, 37. Anna had one husband, who survived his marriage seven years. She was now eighty-four years of age.

ii. 39. This verse raises one of the greatest difficulties in the four Gospels. Matthew records that the family went into Egypt at this time, and did not return to Nazareth until long after. Luke wholly omits the murder of the children at Bethlehem, as well as the visit of the magi and the flight into Egypt. The real difficulty lies in the latter. Some believe that Joseph and Mary did return to Nazareth after the presentation, but this only causes fresh difficulties, and we prefer to leave the problem unsolved. All we would say is, would court his company,) and went up to the temple only at church time; but so it was that he stayed behind. It is good to see young people willing to "dwell in the house of the Lord;" they are then like Christ.

3. His parents went the first day's journey without any suspicion that he was left behind, for "they supposed him to have been in the company," ver. 44. On these occasions the crowd was very great, especially the first day's journey, and the roads full of people; and they concluded he came along with some of their neighbours; "and they sought him among their kindred and acquaintance," that were upon the road going down. "Pray, did you see our son?" or, "Did you see him?" like the spouse's inquiry, "Saw you him whom my soul loveth?" This was a jewel worth seeking after. They knew every one would be desirous of his company, and he would be willing to do good among "his kinsfolks and acquaintance;" but among them they "found him not," ver. 45. There are many, too many, who are our kinsfolk and acquaintance, that we cannot avoid conversing with, among whom we find little or nothing of Christ. When they could not hear of him in this and the other company upon the road, yet they hoped they should meet with him at the place where they lodged at night, but there they could learn no tidings of him. Compare this with Job xlii. 8, 9.

4. "When they found him not" at their quarters at night, "they turned back again," next morning, "to Jerusalem seeking him." Note, Those that would find Christ must seek till they find, for he will at length be found of those that seek him, and will be found their bountiful rewarder. They that have lost their comforts in Christ, and the evidences of their interest in him, must bethink themselves where, and when, and how they lost them, and must turn back again to the place where they last had them; must remember whence they are fallen, and repent, and do their first works, and return to their first love, Rev. ii. 4, 5. Those that would recover their lost acquaintance with Christ must go to Jerusalem, the city of our solemnities, the place which he has chosen to put his name there; must attend upon him in his ordinances, in the gospel passover; there they may hope to meet him.

5. The third day "they found him in the temple," in some of the apartments belonging to the temple, where the doctors of the law kept, not their courts, but their conferences rather, or their schools for disputation; and there they found him "sitting in the midst of them," ver. 46; not standing, as a catechumen, to be examined or instructed by them, for he had discovered such measures of knowledge and wisdom that they admitted him to sit among them as a fellow or member of their society. This is an instance, not only that he was "filled with wisdom," ver. 40, but that he had both a desire to increase it and a readiness to communicate it; and herein he is an example to children and young people, who should learn of Christ to delight in the company of those they may get good by, and choose to sit in the midst of the doctors, rather than in the midst of the players. Let them begin at twelve years old, and sooner, to inquire after knowledge, and to associate with those that are able to instruct them; it is a hopeful and promising presage in youth to be desirous of instruction. Many a youth at Christ's age now would have been playing with the children in the temple, but he was sitting with the doctors in the temple. 1st. He heard them. Those that would learn must be swift to hear. 2nd. He asked them questions; whether as a teacher he had authority so to ask, or as a learner he had humility so to ask, I know not; or whether as an associate, or joint searcher after truth, which must be found out by mutual amicable disquisitions. 3rd. He returned answers to them, which were very surprising and satisfactory, ver. 47; and his wisdom and understanding appeared as much in the questions he asked as in the answers he gave; so that all that heard him were astonished. They never heard one so young, nor indeed any of their greatest doctors, talk sense at that rate that he did; like David, he had more understanding than all his teachers, yea, than the ancients, Ps. cxix. 99, 100. Now Christ shewed forth some rays of his glory, which were presently drawn in again; he gave them a taste, saith Calvin, of his Divine wisdom and knowledge. Methinks this public appearance of Christ in the temple as a teacher was like Moses' early attempt to deliver Israel, which Stephen put this construction upon, that "he supposed his brethren would have understood" by that "how God by his hand would deliver them," Acts vii. 24, 25. They might have taken the hint, and been delivered then, but "they understood not," so they here might have had Christ, for aught I know, to enter upon his work now; but they were only astonished, and understood not the indication; and therefore, like Moses, he retires into obscurity again, and they hear no more of him for many years after.

6. His mother talked with him privately about it; when the company broke up she took him aside, and examined him about it with a deal of tenderness and affection, ver. 48. Joseph and Mary were both amazed to find him there, and to find that he had so much respect shewn him as to be admitted to sit among the doctors, and to be taken notice of. His father knew he had only the name of a father, and therefore said nothing. But, 1st. His mother told him how ill they took it: "Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us?" Why didst thou put us into such a fright? They were ready to say, as Jacob of Joseph, "a wild beast has devoured him;" or, he is fallen into the hands of some more cruel enemy, who at length found out that he was that young child whose life Herod had sought some years ago: a thousand imaginations we may suppose they had concerning him, each more frightful than another. 'Now, why hast thou given us occasion for these fears? "thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing;" not only troubled that we lost thee, but vexed at ourselves that we did not take more care of thee, to bring thee along with us.' Note, Those may have leave to complain of their losses that think they have lost Christ. But their weeping did not hinder sowing; they did not sorrow and sit down in despair, but sorrowed and sought. Note, If we would find Christ, we must seek him sorrowing—sorrowing that we have lost him, that we have provoked him to withdraw, and that we have sought him no sooner. They that thus seek him in sorrow shall find him at length with so much the greater joy. 2nd. He gently reproved their inordinate solicitude about him, ver. 49: "How is it that ye sought me?" You might have depended upon it I would have followed you home when I had done the business I have to do here; I could not be lost in Jerusalem. Wist ye not that I ought to be ἐν τοῖς τοῦ Πατρὸς μου,—"in my Father's house?" so some read it; where else should the Son be, who "abideth in the house for ever?" I ought to be, First. Under my Father's care and protection; and therefore you should have cast the care of me upon him, and not have burdened yourselves with it. Christ is a shaft hid in his Father's quiver, Isa. xlix. 2; he takes care of his church likewise, and therefore let not us ever despair of its safety. Secondly. "At my Father's work;" so we take it: I must be "about my Father's business," and therefore could not go home so soon as you might. "Wist ye not?" Have you not already perceived that concerning me, that I have devoted myself to the service of religion, and therefore must employ myself in the affairs of it? Herein he hath left us an example; for it becomes the children of God, in conformity to Christ, to attend their heavenly Father's business, and to make all other business give way to it. This word of Christ we now think we understand very well, for he hath explained it in what he hath done and said; it was his errand into the world, and his meat and drink in the world, to do his Father's will, and finish his work; and yet at that time his parents "understood not this saying," ver. 50: they did not understand what business he had to do then in the temple for his Father; they believed him to be the Messiah, that should have the throne of his father David, but they thought that should rather bring him to the royal palace than to the temple; they understood not his prophetic office; and he was to do much of his work in that.

Lastly. Here is their return to Nazareth. This glimpse of his glory was to be short; it was now over; and he did not urge his parents either to come and settle at Jerusalem, or to settle him there, though that was the place of improvement and preferment, and where he might have the best opportunities of shewing his wisdom; but very willingly retired into his obscurity at Nazareth, where for many years he was as it were buried alive. Doubtless he came up to Jerusalem to worship at the feasts three times a year; but whether he ever went again into the temple, to dispute with the doctors there, we are not told; it is not improbable but he might. But here we are told.

1. That he was subject to his parents; though once, to shew that he was more than a man, he withdrew himself from his parents to attend his heavenly Father's business, yet he did not as yet make that his constant practice, nor for many years after; but was subject to them, observed their orders, and went and came as they directed, and, as it should seem, worked with his father at the trade of a carpenter. Herein he hath given an example to children to be dutiful and obedient to their parents in the Lord. Being made of a woman, he was made under the law of the fifth commandment, to teach the seed of the faithful thus to approve themselves to him a faithful seed. Though his parents were poor and mean, though his father was only his supposed father, yet he "was subject to them;" though he was "strong in spirit," and "filled with wisdom," nay, though he was the Son of God, yet he was subject to his parents; how then will they answer it, who, though foolish and weak, yet are disobedient to their parents?

2. That his mother, though she did not perfectly understand her son's sayings, yet kept them in her heart, expecting that hereafter they would be explained to her, and she should fully understand them, and know how to make use of them. However we may neglect men's sayings because they are obscure, (si non vis intelligi, debes negligi),—"if it be not intelligible, it is not valuable," yet we must not think so of God's sayings. That which at first is dark, and we know not what to make of it, may afterwards become plain and easy; we should therefore lay it up for hereafter; see Jno. ii. 22; we may find use for that another time which now we see not how it can be made useful to us. A scholar keeps those grammar rules in memory which at present he understands not the use of, because he is told they will hereafter be of use to him; so we must do by Christ's sayings.

3. That he improved and came on to admiration, ver. 52: he "increased in wisdom and stature." In the perfections of his Divine nature there could be no increase, but this is meant of his human nature; his body increased in stature and bulk, he grew in the growing age; and his soul increased in wisdom, and in all the endowments of a human soul. Though the Eternal Word was united to the human soul from his conception, yet the divinity that dwelt in him manifested itself to his humanity by degrees, ad modum recipientis,—"in proportion to his capacity;" as the faculties of his human soul grew more and more capable, the gifts it received from the Divine nature were more and more communicated; and he increased in "favour with God and man," that is, in all those graces that rendered him acceptable both to God and man. Herein Christ accommodated himself to his estate of humiliation, that as he condescended to be an infant, a child, a youth, so the image of God shone brighter in him when he grew up to be a youth than it did or could while he was an infant and a child. Note, Young people, as they grow in stature should grow in wisdom; and then, as they grow in wisdom, they shall grow "in favour with God and man."

CHAPTER III.

Nothing is related concerning our Lord Jesus from his twelfth year to his entrance on his thirtieth year; we often think it would have been a pleasure and advantage to us if we had journals, or at least annals, of occurrences concerning him; but we have as much as Infinite Wisdom thought fit to communicate to us, and if we improve not that, neither would we have improved more if we had had it. The great intention of the evangelists was to give us an account of the Gospel of Christ, which we are to believe, and by which we hope for salvation. Now that began in the ministry and baptism of John, and therefore they hasten to give us an account of that. We could wish, perhaps, that Luke had wholly passed by what was related by Matthew and Mark, and had written only what was new, as he had done in his two first chapters; but it was the will of the Spirit that some things should be established, not only out of the mouth of two, but of three witnesses; and we must not reckon it a needless repetition, nor will we do so, if we renew our meditations upon these things with suitable affections. In this chapter we have, I. The beginning of John's baptism, and the scope and intention of it, ver. 1-6; his exhortation to the multitude, ver. 7-9; and the particular instructions he gave to those who desired to be told their duty, ver. 10-14. II. The notice he gave them of the approach of the Messiah, ver. 15-18; to which is added (though it happened after what follows) the mention of his imprisonment, ver. 19, 20. III. Christ coming to be baptized of John, and his entrance therein upon the execution of his prophetic office, ver. 21, 22. IV. His pedigree and genealogy recorded up to Adam, ver. 23-38.

OW in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Cæsar, Pontius Pilate being governor of Judæa, and Herod being tetrarch of Galilee, and his brother Philip tetrarch of Ituræa and of the region of Trachonitis, and Lysanias the tetrarch of Abilene, 2 Annas and Caiaphas being the high priests, the word of God came unto John the son of Zacharias in the wilderness. 3 And he came into all the country about Jordan, preaching the

ii. 40. The words "in spirit" are omitted by good ancient authorities, though a large number of early MSS. have them.

ii. 46. It is said to have been usual in the Hebrew schools for the scholars to ask the questions and the teachers to answer them. There were rooms attached to the Temple, or within its enclosure, where the rabbis taught, and such are meant here.

ii. 49. The words rendered "about my Father's business" have been otherwise explained. One early interpretation is that it means "in the house of my Father." It is so in the Syriac version, and the explanation has been endorsed by many since.

ii. 52. Jesus increased in "stature;" but the word so rendered also conveys the idea of age, and therefore may include the following eighteen years.

iii. 1. The chronological indications here given for the commence-baptism of repentance for the remission of sins; 4 As it is written in the book of the words of Esaias the prophet, saying, The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight. 5 Every valley shall be filled, and every mountain and hill shall be brought low; and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough ways shall be made smooth; 6 And all flesh shall see the salvation of God. 7 Then said he to the multitude that came forth to be baptized of him, O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come? 8 Bring forth therefore fruits worthy of repentance, and begin not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father: for I say unto you, That God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham. 9 And now also the axe is laid unto the root of the trees: every tree therefore which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire. 10 And the people asked him, saying, What shall we do then? 11 He answereth and saith unto them, He that hath two coats, let him impart to him that hath none; and he that hath meat, let him do likewise. 12 Then came also publicans to be baptized, and said unto him, Master, what shall we do? 13 And he said unto them, Exact no more than that which is appointed you. 14 And the soldiers likewise demanded of him, saying, And what shall we do? And he said unto them, Do violence to no man, neither accuse any falsely; and be content with your wages.

John's baptism introducing a new dispensation, it was requisite we should have a particular account of it. Glorious things were said of John, what a mighty favourite of Heaven he should be, and what a blessing to this earth, ch. i. 15, 17; but we lost him in the desert, and there he remains "until the day of his shewing unto Israel," ch. i. 80; and now at last that day dawns; and a welcome day it was to them that waited for it more than they that waited for the morning. Observe here,

First. The date of the beginning of John's baptism, when it was that he appeared; this is here taken notice of, which was not by the other evangelists, that the truth of the thing might be confirmed by the exact fixing of the time; and it is dated,

1. By the government of the heathen, which the Jews were under, to shew that they were a conquered people; and therefore it was time for the Messiah to come, to set up a spiritual kingdom, and an eternal one, upon the ruins of all the temporal dignity and dominion of David and Judah.

2d. It is dated by the reign of the Roman emperor; it was "in the fifteenth year of Tiberius Cæsar," the third of the twelve Cæsars, a very ill man, given to covetousness, drunkenness, and cruelty. Such a man is mentioned first, saith Dr. Lightfoot, as it were to teach us what to look for from that cruel and abominable city, wherein Satan reigned in all ages and successions. The people of the Jews, after a long struggle, were of late made a province of the empire, and were under the dominion of this Tiberius; and that country, which, when time was, had made so great a figure, and had many nations tributaries to it, in the reigns of David and Solomon, is now itself an inconsiderable, despicable part of the Roman empire, and rather trampled upon than triumphed in: En quo discordia cives perduxit miseros!—"What dire effects from civil discord flow." The lawgiver was now departed from between Judah's feet; and as an evidence of that, their public acts are dated by the reign of the Roman emperor; and therefore now Siloh must come.

2d. It is dated by the governments of the viceroys that ruled in the several parts of the Holy Land, under the Roman emperor, which was another badge of their servitude, for they were all foreigners, which speaks a sad change with that people whose governors used to be of themselves, Jer. xxx. 21; and it was their glory. "How is the gold become dim!" First, Pilate is here said to be the governor, president, or procurator of Judæa. This character is given of him by some other writers; that he was a wicked man, and one that made no conscience of a lie. He reigned ill, and at last was displaced by Vitellius, president of Syria, and sent to Rome to answer for his mal-administrations. Secondly. The other three are called tetrarchs; some think from the countries which they had the command of, each of them being over a fourth part of that which had been entirely under the government of Herod the Great. Others think they are so called from the post of honour they were in in the government; they had the fourth place, or were fourth-rate governors. The emperor was the first; the proconsul, that governed a province, the second; a king, the third; and a tetrarch, the fourth; so Dr. Lightfoot.

3. By the government of the Jews among themselves, to shew that they were a corrupt people; and therefore it was time the Messiah should come to reform them, ver. 2. Annas and Caiaphas were the high priests. God had appointed that there should be but one high priest at a time; but here were two, to serve some ill turn or other: one served one year, and the other the other year; so some. One was the high priest; and the other the sagan, as the Jews called him, to officiate for him when he was disabled; or, as others say, one was high priest, and represented Aaron, and that was Caiaphas; Annas, the other, was nasi, or head of the Sanhedrim, and represented Moses. But to us there is but one High Priest, one Lord of all, to whom all judgment is committed.

1. The original of it was from heaven: "the word of God came unto John," ver. 2. He received full commission, and full instructions from God, to do what he did; it is the same expression that is used concerning the Old Testament prophets, Jer. i. 2; for John was a prophet, yea, more than a prophet, and in him prophecy revived, which had been long suspended. We are not told how the word of the Lord came to John, whether by an angel, as to his father, or by dream, or vision, or voice; but it was to his satisfaction, and ought to be ours. John is here called "the son of Zacharias," to refer us to what the angel said to his father, when he assured him he should have this son. The word of the Lord came to him "in the wilderness;" for those whom God fits he will find out, wherever they are; as the word of the Lord is not bound in a prison, so it is not lost in a wilderness. The word of the Lord made its way to Ezekiel among his captives, by the river of Chebar; and to John in the isle Patmos. John was the son of a priest, now entering upon the thirtieth year of his age; and therefore, according to the custom of the temple, he has now to be admitted into the temple service, where he should have attended as a candidate five years before; but God had called him to a more honourable ministry; and therefore the Holy Ghost enrolls him here, since he was not enrolled in the archives of the temple; "John the son of Zacharias began his ministration" such a time.

2. The scope and design of it, was to bring all the people of his country off from their sins, and home to their God, ver. 3: "He came" first "into all the country about Jordan," the neighbourhood wherein he resided, that part of the country which Israel took possession of first, when they entered the land of promise under Joshua's conduct: there was the banner of the Gospel first displayed. John resided in the most solitary part of the country, but, when the word of the Lord came to him, he quitted his deserts, and came into the inhabited country; those that are best pleased in their retirements must cheerfully exchange them when God calls them into places of concourse. "He came" out of the wilderness "into all the country," with some marks of distinction, preaching a new baptism; not a sect, or party, but a profession, or distinguishing badge; the sign, or ceremony, such as was ordinarily used among the Jews, washing with water, by which proselytes were sometimes admitted, or disciples to some great master. But the meaning of it was "repentance for the remission of sins;" that is, all that submitted to his baptism,

1st. Were thereby obliged to repent of their sins, to be sorry for what they had done amiss, and to go and do so no more; the former they professed, and were concerned to be sincere in their professions; the latter they promised, and were concerned to make good what they promised. He bound them not to such ceremonious observances as were imposed by the tradition of the elders, but to change their mind, and change their way; to cast away from them all their transgressions, and to make them new hearts, and to live new lives. The design of the Gospel, which now began, was to make men devout and pious, holy and heavenly, humble and meek, sober and chaste, just and honest, charitable and kind, and good in every relation, who had been much otherwise; and this is to repent.

2d. They were thereby assured of the pardon of their sins, upon their repentance. As the baptism he administered bound them not to submit to the power of sin, so it sealed to them a gracious and pleasurable discharge from the guilt of sin: "Turn yourselves from all your transgressions, so iniquity shall not be your ruin;" agreeing with the word of the Lord by the Old Testament prophets, Eze. xviii. 30.

Thirdly. The fulfilling of the Scripture in the ministry of John. The other evangelists had referred us to the same text that is here referred to, that of Esaias, ch. xl. 3. It is "written in the book of the words of Esaias the prophet," which he heard from God, which he spoke for God; those words of his which were written for the generations to come; among them it is found, that there should be "the voice of one crying in the wilderness," and John is that voice, a clear, distinct voice, a loud voice, an articulate one; he cries, "Prepare ye the way of the Lord, and make his paths straight." John's business is to make way for the entertainment of the Gospel in the hearts of people, to bring them into such a frame and temper, as that Christ might be welcome to them, and they welcome to Christ. Luke goes farther on with the quotation than Matthew and Mark had done, and applies the following words likewise to John's ministry, ver. 5, 6: "Every valley shall be filled." Dr. Hammond understands this as a prediction of the desolation coming upon the people of the Jews for their infidelity. The land should be made plain by the pioneers for the Roman army, and should be laid waste by it; and there should then be a visible distinction made between the impenitent, on the one

ment of the public ministration of John the Baptist have been closely investigated by many writers. It has been alleged that there are some errors in the sacred record, but this has been sufficiently disproved. Of the many modern works in which this text is investigated, it may be enough to mention Dr. Ebrard's "Gospel History," Dr. Wieseler's "Chronological Synopsis of the Four Gospels," and Mr. Lewin's "Fasti Sacri." With regard to the statements made in this verse, it is generally admitted that they chronologically coincide, with one exception. Pontius Pilate, Ebrard says, was governor of Judea from about the year A.D. 25 to 36—i.e., from the twelfth to the twenty-third year of Tiberius. Herod Antipas was tetrarch of Galilee during the whole of the reign of Tiberius, and some time previously. The reign of Philip continued to the nineteenth year of Tiberius. With regard to Lysanias, it is alleged that he was put to death thirty-four years before the Christian era. But apart from the improbability that a writer so side, and the receivers of the Gospel, on the other side; but it seems rather to be meant of the immediate tendency of John's ministry, and of the Gospel of Christ, which that was the introduction of.

1. The humble shall by it be enriched with grace; for every valley that lies low and moist shall be filled and be exalted. 2. The proud shall by it be humbled; the self-confident, that stand upon their own bottom, and the self-conceited, that lift up their own top, shall have contempt put upon them, for "every mountain and hill shall be brought low;" if they repent, they are brought to the dust; if not, to the lowest hell. 3. Sinners shall be converted to God; for the crooked ways, and the crooked spirits shall be made straight; for though none can make that straight which God hath made crooked, Ecc. vii. 13, yet God by his grace can make that straight which sin hath made crooked. 4. Difficulties, that were hindering and discouraging in the way to heaven, shall be removed; "the rough ways shall be made smooth," and they that love God's law shall have great peace, and "nothing shall offend them." The Gospel has made the way to heaven plain and easy to be found, smooth and easy to be walked in. 5. The great salvation shall be more fully discovered than ever, and the discovery of it shall spread farther, ver. 6; "all flesh shall see the salvation of God;" not the Jews only, but the Gentiles; all shall see it; that is, they shall have it set before them, and offered to them; and some of all sorts shall see it; that is, enjoy it, and have the benefit of it. When way is made for the Gospel into the heart, by the captivating of high thoughts, and bringing them into obedience to Christ, by the levelling of the soul, and the removing of all obstructions that stand in the way of Christ and his grace, then prepare to bid the salvation of God welcome.

Fourthly. The general warnings and exhortations which he gave to those who submitted to his baptism, ver. 7-9. In Matthew he is said to have preached these same things to many of the Pharisees and Sadducees that came to his baptism, Mat. iii. 7-10; but here he is said to have spoken them "to the multitude, that came forth to be baptized of him," ver. 7. This was the purport of his preaching to all that came to him, and he did not alter it in compliment to the Pharisees and Sadducees when they came, but dealt as plainly with them as with any other of his hearers; and as he did not flatter the great, so neither did he compliment the many, or make his court to them, but gave the same reproofs of sin and warnings of wrath to the multitude that he did to the Sadducees and Pharisees; for if they had not the same faults, they had others as bad. Now observe here,

1. That the guilty, corrupted race of mankind is become a generation of vipers; not only poisoned, but poisonous; hateful to God, hating one another. This magnifies the patience of God, in continuing the race of mankind upon the earth, and not destroying that nest of vipers. He did once by water, and will again by fire.

2. This generation of vipers is fairly warned to "flee from the wrath to come," which is certainly before them, if they continue such; and their being a multitude will not be at all their security, for it will be neither reproach nor loss to God to cut them off. We are not only warned of this wrath, but are put into a way to escape it, if we look about us in time.

3. There is no way of fleeing from the wrath to come but by repentance. They that submitted to the baptism of repentance, thereby evidenced that they were warned to flee from the wrath to come, and took the warning; and we by our baptism profess to have fled out of Sodom, for fear of what is coming upon it.

4. Those that profess repentance are highly concerned to live like penitents, ver. 8: "Bring forth therefore fruits meet for repentance;" else, notwithstanding your professions of repentance, you cannot escape the wrath to come. By the fruits of repentance it will be known whether it be sincere or not. By the change of our way must be evidenced the change of our mind.

5. If we be not really holy both in heart and life, our profession of religion, and relation to God and his church, will stand us in no stead at all: "Begin now to frame excuses from this great duty of repentance, by saying 'within yourselves, We have Abraham our father.' What will it avail us to be the children of godly parents, if we be not godly; to be within the pale of the church, if we be not brought into the bond of the covenant?"

6. We have therefore no reason to depend upon our external privileges and professions of religion, because God has no need of us, or of our services, but can effectually secure his own honour and interest without us. If we were cut off and ruined, he could raise up to himself a church out of the most unlikely; children to Abraham even out of stones.

7. The greater professions we make of repentance, and the greater assurances and encouragements are given us in repentance, the nearer and the sooner will our destruction be, if we do not "bring forth fruits meet for repentance." Now the Gospel begins to be preached, now the kingdom is at hand, "now the axe is laid to the root of the trees;" threatenings to the wicked and penitent are now more terrible than before, as encouragements to the penitent are now more comfortable. Now you are upon your behaviour, look to yourselves.

8. Barren trees will be cast into the fire at length; it is the fittest place for them. "Every tree that doth not bring forth fruit, good fruit, is hewn down and cast into the fire." If it serve not for fruit, to the honour of God's grace, let it serve for fuel, to the honour of his justice.

Fifthly. The particular instructions he gave to several sorts of persons, that inquired of him concerning their duty; the people, the publicans, and the soldiers. Some of the Pharisees and Sadducees came to his baptism, but we do not find them asking, "What shall we do?" for they thought they knew what they had to do as well as he could tell them; or were determined to do what they pleased, whatever he told them. But the people, the publicans, and the soldiers, that knew they had done amiss, and knew they should do better, and were conscious to themselves of great ignorance, and unacquaintedness with the Divine law, were particularly inquisitive, "What shall we do?" Note, 1st. Those that are baptized must be taught; and those that have baptized them are concerned, as they have opportunity, to teach them, Mat. xxviii. 19, 20. 2nd. Those that profess and promise repentance in general, must evidence it by particular instances of reformation, according as their place and condition is. 3rd. They that would do their duty must desire to know their duty, and inquire concerning it. The first good word Paul said when he was converted was, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" These here inquire, not "What shall this man do?" but "What shall we do?" what fruits meet for repentance shall we bring forth? Now John gives answer to each according to their place and station.

1. He tells the people their duty, and that is to be charitable, ver. 11: "He that has two coats, and consequently one to spare, 'let him give,' or lend at least, 'to him that has none,' to keep him warm. Perhaps he saw among his hearers some that were overloaded with clothes, while others were ready to perish in rags, and he puts those who had superfluities upon contributing to the relief of those that had not necessities. The Gospel requires mercy, and not sacrifice; and the design of it is to engage us to do all the good we can. Food and raiment are the two supports of life: he that hath meat to spare, let him give to him that is destitute of daily food, as well as he that has clothes to spare: what we have, we are but stewards of, and must use it accordingly as our Master directs.

2. He tells the publicans their duty, the collectors of the emperor's revenue, ver. 13: "Exact no more than that which is appointed you." They must do justice between the government and the merchant, and not oppress the people in levying the taxes, nor any way make them heavier or more burthensome than the law had made them. They must not think, that because it was their office to take care that the people did not defraud the prince, they might therefore, by the power they had, bear hard upon the people; as those that have never so little a branch of power are apt to abuse it; no, keep to your book of rates, and reckon it enough that you collect for Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and do not enrich yourselves by taking more. The public revenues must be applied to the public service, and not to gratify the avarice of private persons. Observe, He doth not direct the publicans to quit their places, and to go no more to the receipt of custom; the employment is in itself lawful and necessary, but let them be just and honest in it.

3. He tells the soldiers their duty, ver. 14. Some think these soldiers were of the Jewish nation and religion, others think they were Romans; for it was not likely either that the Jews would serve the Romans, or the Romans trust the Jews in their garrisons, in their own nation; and then it is an early instance of Gentiles embracing the Gospel, and submitting to it. Military men seldom seem inclined to religion, yet these submitted even to the Baptist's strict profession, and desired to receive the word of command from him, "What must we do?" Those who, more than other men, have their lives in their hands, and are in deaths oft, are concerned to inquire what they shall do, that they may be found in peace. In answer to this inquiry, John does not bid them lay down their arms, and desert the service, but cautions them against the sins that soldiers were commonly guilty of; for this is fruit meet for repentance, to keep ourselves from our iniquity. 1st. They must not be injurious to the people among whom they were quartered, and over whom indeed they were set, "Do violence to no man." Your business is to keep the peace, and prevent men's doing violence to one another, but do not you do violence to any; 'shake no man, so the word signifies; do not put people into fear; for the sword of war, as well as that of justice, is to be a terror only to evildoers, but a protection to those that do well. Be not rude in your quarters; force not money from people by frightening them; shed not the blood of war in peace; offer no incivility either to man or woman; nor have any hand in the barbarous devastations that armies sometimes make. Nor must they "accuse any falsely" to the government, thereby to make themselves formidable, and get bribes. 2nd. They must not be injurious to their fellow soldiers; for some think that caution, not to accuse falsely, has special reference to them. Be not forward to complain one of another to your superior officers, that you may be revenged on those you have a pique against, or undermine those above you, and get into their places. 'Do not oppress any,' so some think the word here signifies, as used by the Seventy in several passages of the Old Testament. 3rd. They must not be given to mutiny, nor contend with the general about their pay; 'be content with your wages.' While you have what you agreed for, do not murmur that it is not more. It is discontent with what they have that makes men oppressive and injurious; they that never think they have enough themselves, will not stick at any the most irregular practices to make it more, by defrauding others. It is a rule to all servants that they be content with their wages, for they that indulge themselves in discontents expose themselves to many temptations, and it is wisdom to make the best of that which is.

15 And as the people were in expectation, and all men mused in their hearts of John, whether he were the Christ, or not; 16 John answered, saying unto them all, I indeed baptize you with water; but one mightier than I cometh, the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to unloose: he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire: 17 Whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor, and will gather the wheat into his garner; but the chaff he will burn with fire unquenchable. 18 And many other things in his exhortation preached he unto the people. 19 But Herod the tetrarch, being reproved by him for Herodias his brother Philip's wife, and for all the evils which Herod had done, 20 Added yet this above all, that he shut up John in prison.

well informed as Luke should make such a mistake, there is evidence to show that there was a later Lysanias, who reigned about the time referred to in the Gospel. The kingdom of this later Lysanias was transferred to Agrippa about A.D. 52, as stated by Josephus ("Wars," ii. 12, 8). The province of Ituræa was to the south-east of Hermon, and is mentioned by several Greek and Roman writers. The district is still called Jedur by the Arabs. Trachonitis was on the east of the Jordan, and is now called the Ledja. Abilene was named from its chief city, Abila, which appears to have been eighteen or twenty miles north-west of Damascus. On the term tetrarch, Hug observes that it was not introduced into Palestine until after the death of Herod. This fact is an additional confirmation of the accuracy of Luke, whose mention of a tetrarchy of Lysanias is otherwise established.

iii. 2. For "Annas and Caiaphas being the high-priests" we may translate, "when Annas was high-priest and Caiaphas," the word

We are now drawing near to the appearance of our Lord Jesus publicly; the sun will not be long after the morning star. We are here told,

First. How the people took occasion, from the ministry and baptism of John, to think of the Messiah, and to think of him as at the door, as now come. Thus the way of the Lord was prepared, and people were prepared to bid Christ welcome; for when men's expectations are raised, that which they are in expectation of becomes doubly acceptable. Now when they observed what an excellent doctrine John Baptist preached, what a Divine power went along with it, and what a tendency it had to reform the world,

1. They began presently to consider that now was the time for the Messiah to appear; the sceptre was departed from Judah, for they had no king but Cæsar; nay, and the lawgiver too was gone from between his feet, for Herod had lately slain the Sanhedrim; Daniel's seventy weeks were now expiring, and therefore it was but three or four years after this that they looked that the kingdom of heaven should appear presently, ch. xix. 11. Never did the corrupt state of the Jews more need a reformation, nor their distressed state more need a deliverance, than now.

2. Their next thought was, Is not this he that should come? "All" thinking "men mused," or reasoned "in their hearts," concerning "John, whether he were the Christ or not." He had indeed nothing of that external pomp and grandeur in which they generally expected the Messiah to appear; but his life was holy and strict, his preaching powerful, and with authority; and therefore why may we not think him to be the Messiah, and that he will shortly throw off this disguise, and appear in more glory? Note, That which puts people upon considering, reasoning with themselves, prepares the way for Christ.

Secondly. How John disowned all pretensions to the honour of being himself the Messiah, but confirmed them in their expectations of him that really was the Messiah, ver. 16, 17. John's office, as a crier or herald, was to give notice that the kingdom of God, and the King of that kingdom, was at hand; and therefore, when he had told all manner of people severally what they must do,—you must do this, and you must do that,—he tells them one thing more, which they must all do, they must expect the Messiah now shortly to appear. And this serves as an answer to their musings and debates concerning himself. Though he knew not their thoughts, yet, in declaring this, he answered them.

1. He declares, the utmost he could do was to baptize them with water; he had no access to the spirit, nor could command that, or work upon that; he could only exhort them to repent, and assure them of forgiveness upon repentance; he could not work repentance in them, nor confer remission on them.

2. He consigns them, and turns them over, as it were to Jesus Christ, for whom he was sent to prepare the way, and to whom he was ready to transfer all the interest he had in the affections of the people, and would have them no longer to debate whether John was the Messiah or not, but to look for him that was really so.

1st. John owns the Messiah to have a greater excellency than he had, and that he was in all things preferable to him; he is one the latchet of whose shoe he doth not think himself worthy to unloose; he doth not think himself worthy to be the meanest of his servants, to help him on and off with his shoes. John was a prophet, yea, more than a prophet, more so than any of the Old Testament prophets; but Christ was a prophet more than John; for it was both by the spirit of Christ, and of the grace of Christ, that all the prophets prophesied, and John among the rest, 1 Pet. i. 10, 11. This was a great truth which John came to preach; but the manner of his expressing it speaks his humility; and in it he not only doth justice to our Lord Jesus, but doth him honour: he is one I am not worthy to approach, or draw nigh to, no, not as a servant. Thus highly doth it always become us to speak of Christ, and thus humbly of ourselves.

2nd. He owns him to have a greater energy than he had: he is "mightier than I," and doth that which I cannot do, both for the comfort of the faithful and for the terror of hypocrites and dissemblers. They thought a wonderful power went along with John, but what that compared with the power which Jesus would come clothed with? First. John can do no more but "baptize with water," in token of this, that they ought to purify and cleanse themselves; but Christ can and will "baptize with the Holy Ghost;" he can give the Spirit to cleanse and purify the heart, not only as water washes off the dirt on the outside, but as fire purges out the dross that is within, and melts down the metal, that it may be cast into a new mould. Secondly. John can only preach a distinguishing doctrine, and by word and sign "separate between the precious and the vile;" but Christ hath his "fan in his hand," with which he can and will perfectly part between the wheat and the chaff; he will "thoroughly purge his floor;" it is his own, and therefore he will purge it, and will cast out of his church the unbelieving, impenitent Jews, and confirm in his church all that faithfully follow him. Thirdly. John can only speak comfort to those that receive the Gospel, and, like other prophets, "say to the righteous that it shall be well with them;" but Jesus Christ will give them comfort. John can only promise them they shall be safe, but Christ will make them so; he will "gather the wheat into his garner." Good, serious, solid people he will gather now into his church on earth, which shall be made up of such; and he will shortly gather them into his church in heaven, where they shall be for ever sheltered. Fourthly. John can only threaten hypocrites, and tell the barren trees that they shall be hewn down and cast into the fire; but Christ can execute that threatening; those that are as chaff—light, and vain, and worthless—"he will burn with fire unquenchable." John refers here to Mal. iii. 18; iv. 1, 2: "Then, when the floor is purged, shall ye return, and discern between the righteous and the wicked; for the day cometh that shall burn as an oven."

The evangelist concludes his account of John's preaching with an et cetera, ver. 18; "many other things in his exhortation preached he unto the people," which are not recorded. 1. John was an affectionate preacher; he was παρηκολούθῳ, "exhorting," beseeching; he pressed things home upon his hearers, followed his doctrine close, as one in earnest. 2. He was a practical preacher; much of his preaching was exhortation, quickening them to their duty, and directing them in it, and not amusing them with matters of nice speculation. 3. He was a popular preacher, though he had scribes and Pharisees, men of polite learning, attending his ministry, and Sadducees, men of free thought, as they pretended, yet he addressed himself "to the people," πρὸς τὸν λαόν, to the laity, and accommodated himself to their capacity, as promising himself best success among them. 4. He was an evangelical preacher, for so the word here used signifies, εὐαγγελίζετο, he preached the Gospel to the people; in all his exhortations he directed people to Christ, and excited and encouraged their expectations of him. When we press duty upon people, we must direct them to Christ, both for righteousness and strength. 5. He was a copious preacher; "many other things he preached," πολλά μὲν καὶ ἕτερα, "many things and different." He preached a great deal, shunned not to declare the whole counsel of God; and he varied in his preaching, that those who were not reached, and touched, and wrought upon by one truth, might by another.

Thirdly. How a full stop was put to John's preaching; when he was in the midst of his usefulness, going on thus successfully, he was imprisoned by the malice of Herod, ver. 19, 20: "Herod the tetrarch being reproved by him," not only for living in incest with his brother Philip's wife, but for the many other

"evils which Herod had done,"—for those that are wicked in one instance are commonly so in many others,—he could not bear it, but contracted an antipathy to him for his plain dealing, and added this wickedness to all the rest, which was indeed above all, that he "shut up John in prison;" put that burning and shining light under a bushel: because he could not bear his reproofs, others should be deprived of the benefit of his instructions and counsels. Some little good he might do to those who had access to him when he was in prison, but nothing to what he might have done, if he had had liberty to go about all the country as he had done. We cannot think of Herod's doing this, without the greatest compassion and lamentation; nor of God's permitting it, without admiring the depth of the Divine counsels, which we cannot account for. Must he be silenced who is "the voice of one crying in the wilderness?" Must such a preacher be shut up in prison, who ought to have been set up in the courts of the temple? But thus the faith of his disciples must be tried; the unbelief of those who rejected him must be punished. Thus he must be Christ's forerunner in suffering as well as preaching; and thus, having been for about a year and half preparing people for Christ, he must now give way to him; and the sun being risen, the morning star must of course disappear.

21 Now when all the people were baptized, it came to pass, that Jesus also being baptized, and praying, the heaven was opened, 22 And the Holy Ghost descended in a bodily shape like a dove upon him, and a voice came from heaven, which said, Thou art my beloved Son; in thee I am well pleased. 23 And Jesus himself began to be about thirty years of age, being (as was supposed) the son of Joseph, which was the son of Heli, 24 Which was the son of Matthat, which was the son of Levi, which was the son of Melchi, which was the son of Janna, which was the son of Joseph, 25 Which was the son of Mattathias, which was the son of Amos, which was the son of Naum, which was the son of Esli, which was the son of Nagge, 26 Which was the son of Maath, which was the son of Semei, which was the son of Joseph, which was the son of Juda, 27 Which was the son of Joanna, which was the son of Rhesa, which was the son of Zorobabel, which was the son of Salathiel, which was the son of Neri, 28 Which was the son of Melchi, which was the son of Addi, which was the son of Cosam, which was the son of Elmodam, which was the son of Er, 29 Which was the son of Jose, which was the son of Eliezer, which was the son of Jorim, which was the son of Matthat, which was the son of Levi, 30 Which was the son of Simeon, which was the son of Juda, which was the son of Joseph, which was the son of Jonan, which was the son of Eliakim, 31 Which was the son of Melea, which was the son of Menan, which was the son of Mattathia, which was the son of Nathan, which was the son of David, 32 Which was the son of Jesse, which was the son of Obed, which was the son of Booz, which was the son of Salmon, which was the son of Naasson, 33 Which was the son of Aminadab, which was the son of Aram, which was the son of Esrom, which was the son of Phares, which was the son of Juda, 34 Which was the son of Jacob, which was the son of Isaac, which was the son of Abraham, which was the son of Thara, which was the son of Nachor, 35 Which was the son of Saruch, which was the son of Ragau, which was the son of Phalec, which was the son of Heber, which was the son of Sala, 36 Which was the son of Cainan, which was the son of Arphaxad, which was the son of Sem, which was the son of Noe, which was the son of Lamech, 37 Which was the son

"high-priest" being in the singular number in the best MSS. From this it might be inferred that they were not high-priests in the same sense; they were, however, both at the head of the Jewish priesthood at that time. We learn that Annas had been officially high-priest, but had been deposed, and that Caiaphas was the recognised holder of the office. In answer to the question why Annas is still called high-priest, it may be noted that the term often occurs, to denote the chief priests or heads of the Sanhedrim. of whom Annas would be one. And again, Annas having been really high-priest would in popular language retain his title. In Acts iv. 6 Annas is again called high-priest, while Caiaphas, who really held the office, is not so styled. In John xviii. 13 it is distinctly said that Caiaphas was high-priest, but the importance of his father-in-law Annas is shown by the fact that to him Jesus was led by his enemies. As Ebrard remarks, "On account of his influence Annas was regarded as high-priest, as well as Caiaphas, even after his deposition."

of Mathusala, which was the son of Enoch, which was the son of Jared, which was the son of Maleleel, which was the son of Cainan, 38 Which was the son of Enos, which was the son of Seth, which was the son of Adam, which was the son of God.

The evangelist mentioned John's imprisonment before Christ's being baptized, though it was near a year after it, because he would finish the story of John's ministry, and then introduce that of Christ. Now here we have,

First. A short account of Christ's baptism, which had been more fully related by St. Matthew. Jesus came to be baptized of John, and he was so, ver. 21, 22.

1. It is here said, that "when all the people were baptized," then "Jesus was baptized;" all that were then present. Christ would be baptized last, among the common people, and in the rear of them; thus he humbled himself, and made himself of no reputation, as one of the least, nay, as less than the least. He saw what multitudes were hereby prepared to receive him, and then he appeared.

2. Notice is here taken of Christ's praying when he was baptized, which was not in Matthew; "being baptized, and praying." He did not confess sin, as others did, for he had none to confess; but he prayed as others did, for he would thus keep up communion with his Father. Note, The inward and spiritual grace, which sacraments are the outward and visible signs of, must be fetched in by prayer, and therefore prayer must always accompany them. We have reason to think that Christ now prayed for this manifestation of God's favour to him, which immediately followed; he prayed for the discovery of his Father's favour to him, and the descent of the Spirit. What was promised to Christ, he must obtain by prayer: "Ask of me, and I will give thee," &c. Thus he would put an honour upon prayer, would tie us to it, and encourage us in it.

3. When he prayed, "the heaven was opened." He that by his power parted the waters to make a way through them to Canaan, now by his power parted the air, another fluid element, to open a correspondence with the heavenly Canaan. Thus was there opened to Christ, and by him to us, "a new and living way into the holiest;" sin had shut up heaven, but Christ's prayer opened it again. Prayer is an ordinance that opens heaven; "knock, and it shall be opened to you."

4. "The Holy Ghost descended in a bodily shape like a dove upon him." Our Lord Jesus was now to receive greater measures of the Spirit than before, to qualify him for his prophetic office; Isa. lxi. 1, when he begins to preach, "the Spirit of the Lord is upon him." Now this is here expressed by a sensible evidence, for his encouragement in his work, and for the satisfaction of John Baptist, for he was told before, that by this sign it should be notified to him which was the Christ. Dr. Lightfoot suggests that the Holy Ghost descended in a bodily shape, that he might be revealed to be a personal substance, and not merely an operation of the Godhead: and thus, saith he, "was made a full, clear, and sensible demonstration of the Trinity, at the beginning of the Gospel, and very fitly is this done at Christ's baptism, who was to make the ordinance of baptism a badge of the profession of that faith in the doctrine of the Trinity, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost."

5. There "came a voice from heaven," from God the Father, from the "excellent glory," so it is expressed, 2 Pet. i. 17, "Thou art my beloved Son." Here, and in Mark, it is expressed as spoken to Christ; in Matthew, as spoken of him, "This is my beloved Son." It comes all to one; it was intended to be a notification to John, and as such, properly expressed by "this is my beloved Son;" and likewise an answer to his prayer, and so it is most fitly expressed by "thou art." It was foretold concerning the Messiah, "I will be his Father, and he shall be my Son," 2 Sam. vii. 14; "I will make him my firstborn," Ps. lxxix. 27; that he should be God's elect, in whom his soul delighted, Isa. xlii. 1; and accordingly it is here declared, "Thou art my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased."

Secondly. A long account of Christ's pedigree, which had been more briefly related by St. Matthew. Here is,

1. His age. He now "began to be about thirty years of age." So old Joseph was when he stood before Pharaoh, Gen. xli. 46; David, when he began to reign, 2 Sam. v. 4; and at this age the priests were to enter upon the full execution of their office, Num. iv. 3. Dr. Lightfoot thinks it is plain, by the manner of expression here, that he was just twenty-nine years old complete, and entering upon his thirtieth year, in the month Tisri. After this he lived three years and a half, and died when he was thirty-two years old and a half. Three years and a half, the time of Christ's ministry, is a period of time very remarkable in Scripture; three years and six months the heavens were shut up in Elijah's time, ch. iv. 25; Jas. v. 17. This was the half week in which the Messiah was to confirm the covenant, Dan. ix. 27. This period is expressed in the prophetic writings by a time, times, and half a time, Dan. xii. 7; Rev. xii. 14, and by forty-two months, and a thousand two hundred and threescore days, Rev. xi. 2, 3, where it is the time fixed for the witnesses' prophesying in sackcloth, in conformity to Christ's preaching in his humiliation just so long.

2. His pedigree, ver. 23, &c. Matthew had given us somewhat of this; he goes no higher than Abraham, but Luke brings it as high as Adam. Matthew designed to shew that Christ was the son of Abraham, in whom "all the families of the earth are blessed," and that he was heir to the throne of David; and therefore he begins with Abraham, and brings the genealogy down to Jacob, who was the father of Joseph, an heir male of the house of David; but Luke, designing to shew that Christ was the seed of the woman, that should break the serpent's head, traceth his pedigree upwards as high as Adam, and begins it with Eli, or Heli, who was the father, not of Joseph, but of the virgin Mary. And some suggest that the supply which our translators all along insert here, is not right, and that it should not be read "which" that is, "which Joseph was the son of Heli," but "which Jesus, he was the son of Joseph, of Eli, of Matthat," &c., and he, that is, "Jesus, was the son of Seth, of Adam, of God," ver. 38. The difference between the two evangelists in the genealogy of Christ has been a stumblingblock to infidels that cavil at the Word, but such a one as has been removed by the labours of learned men, both in the early ages of the church and in latter times, to which we refer ourselves. Matthew draws the pedigree from Solomon, whose natural line ending in Jehonias, the legal right was transferred to Salathiel, who was of the house of Nathan, another son of David, which line Luke here pursues, and so leaves out all the kings of Judah. It is well for us that our salvation doth not depend upon our being able to solve all these difficulties, nor is the Divine authority of the Gospels at all weakened by them, for the evangelists are not supposed to write these genealogies either of their own knowledge or by Divine inspiration, but to have copied them out of the authentic records of the genealogies among the Jews, the heralds' books, which therefore they were obliged to follow; and in them they found the pedigree of Jacob, the father of Joseph, to be as it is set down in Matthew; and the pedigree of Heli, the father of Mary, to be as it is set down here in Luke; and this is the meaning of ἐννοήσας, ver. 23; not, "as it was supposed," referring only to Joseph, but uti sanctum est lege, "as it is entered into the books," as we find it upon record, by which it appeared that Jesus was both by father and mother's side the son of David, witness this extract out of their own records, which any one might at that time have liberty to compare with the original, and farther the evangelists needed not to go; nay, had they varied from that, they had not gained their point. And its not being contradicted at that time, is satisfaction enough to us now that it is a true copy; as it is farther worthy our observing, that when those records of the Jewish genealogies had continued thirty or forty years after these extracts out of them, long enough to justify the evangelists therein, they were all lost and destroyed with the Jewish state and nation, for now there was no more occasion for them.

Here is one difficulty occurs between Abraham and Noah, which gives us some perplexity, ver. 35, 36. Sala is said to be the son of Cainan, and he the son of Arphaxad; whereas Sala was the son of Arphaxad, Gen. x. 24; xi. 12; and there is no such man as Cainan found there. But as to that, it is sufficient to say that the seventy interpreters who, before our Saviour's time, translated the Old Testament into Greek, for reasons best known to themselves, inserted that Cainan; and St. Luke, writing among the Hellenist Jews, was obliged to make use of that translation, and therefore to take it as he found it. The genealogy concludes with this, "who was the son of Adam, the son of God." 1st. Some refer it to Adam; he was in a peculiar manner the son of God, being, more immediately than any of his offspring, the offspring of God by creation. 2nd. Others refer it to Christ, and so make the last words of this genealogy to speak his Divine and human nature; he was both the son of Adam and the Son of God, that he might be a proper Mediator between God and the sons of Adam, and might bring the sons of Adam to be, through him, the sons of God.

CHAPTER IV.

We left Christ newly baptized, and owned by a voice from heaven and the descent of the Holy Ghost upon him. Now in this chapter we have, I. A farther preparation of him for his public ministry, by his being tempted in the wilderness, which we had the same account of before, in Matthew, which we have here. II. His entrance upon his public work in Galilee, ver. 14, 15; particularly, 1. At Nazareth, the city where he had been bred up, ver. 16—30, which we had no account of before in Matthew. 2. At Capernaum, where having preached to admiration, ver. 31, 32, he cast the devil out of a man that was possessed, ver. 33—37; cured Peter's mother in law of a fever, ver. 38, 39; and many others that were sick and possessed, ver. 40, 41; and then went and did the same in other cities of Galilee, ver. 42—44.

AND Jesus being full of the Holy Ghost returned from Jordan, and was led by the Spirit into the wilderness, 2 Being forty days tempted of the devil. And in those days he did eat nothing: and when they were ended, he afterward hungered. 3 And the devil said unto him, If thou be the Son of God, command this stone that it be made bread. 4 And Jesus answered him, saying, It is written, That man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word of God. 5 And the devil, taking him up into an high mountain, shewed unto him all the kingdoms of the world in a moment of time. 6 And the devil said unto him, All this power will I give thee, and the glory of them: for that is delivered unto me; and to whomsoever I will I give it. 7 If thou therefore wilt worship me, all shall be thine. 8 And Jesus answered and said unto him, Get thee behind me, Satan: for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve. 9 And he brought him to Jerusalem, and set him on a pinnacle of the temple, and said unto him, If thou be the son of God, cast thyself down from hence: 10 For it is written, He shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee: 11 And in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone. 12 And Jesus answering said unto him, It is said, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God. 13 And when the devil had ended all the temptation, he departed from him for a season.

iii. 4. Instead of the common arrangement here, "The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord," some adopt a different pointing, and, perhaps, a better one, "The voice of one crying, In the wilderness prepare ye the way of the Lord."

iii. 10—14. In these verses we have illustrated what is meant by the "fruits worthy of repentance" of verse 8. The people were to be benevolent, the publicans were to be just, and the soldiers were not to be oppressive and exacting, as they were often tempted to be.

iii. 19. This Herod is the same as is mentioned in verse 1, being tetrarch of Galilee, in which province John fulfilled his ministry. His father was Herod the Great, and his mother Malthace, a Samaritan woman. He had married as his first wife the daughter of King Aretas, but had formed a base and wicked connection with the wife of his brother Philip. In other respects his conduct was disreputable. Some further details occur in Mark vi. 17—20. Josephus says Herod imprisoned John at a place called Machærus.

The last words of the foregoing chapter, that Jesus was the son of Adam, speak him to be the seed of the woman. Being so, we have him here, according to the promise, breaking the serpent's head, baffling and foiling the devil in all his temptations; who by one temptation had baffled and foiled our first parents. Thus in the beginning of the war he made reprisals upon him, and conquered the conqueror. In this story of Christ's temptation, observe,

I. How he was prepared and fitted for it. He that designed him the trial, furnished him accordingly; for though we know not what exercises may be before us, nor what encounters we may be reserved for, Christ did, and was provided accordingly; and God doth for us, and we hope will provide accordingly.

First. He was "full of the Holy Ghost," who had descended on him like a dove; had now greater measures of the gifts, graces, and comforts of the Holy Ghost than ever before. Note, Those are well armed against the strongest temptations that are full of the Holy Ghost.

Secondly. He was newly "returned from Jordan," where he was baptized, and owned by a voice from heaven to be the beloved Son of God, and thus he was prepared for this combat. Note, When we have had the most comfortable communion with God, and the clearest discoveries of his favour to us, we may expect that Satan will set upon us,—the richest ship is the pirate's prize,—and that God will suffer him to do so, that the power of his grace may be manifested and magnified.

Thirdly. He was "led by the Spirit into the wilderness," by the good Spirit, who led him as a champion into the field, to fight the enemy that he was sure to conquer. His being led into the wilderness, 1. Gave some advantage to the tempter, for there he had him alone; no friend with him, by whose prayers and advice he might be assisted in the hour of temptation: "Woe to him that is alone!" He might give Satan advantage who knew his own strength; we may not, who know our own weakness. 2. He gained some advantage to himself during his forty days' fasting in the wilderness; we may suppose that he was wholly taken up in proper meditation, and in the consideration of his own undertaking, and the work he had before him; that he spent all this time in immediate converse with his Father, as Moses in the mount, without any diversion, distraction, or interruption. Of all the days of Christ's life in the flesh, these seem to come nearest to the angelic perfection, and the heavenly life, and this prepared him for Satan's assaults, and hereby he was fortified against them.

Fourthly. He continued fasting, ver. 2: "in those days he did eat nothing." This fast was altogether miraculous, like those of Moses and Elijah, and shews him to be, like them, a prophet sent of God. It is probable it was in the wilderness of Horeb, the same wilderness in which Moses and Elijah fasted. As by retiring into the wilderness he shewed himself perfectly indifferent to the world, so by this fasting he shewed himself perfectly indifferent to the body; and Satan cannot easily take hold of those who are thus loosened from, and dead to, the world and the flesh. The more we keep under the body, and bring it into subjection, the less advantage Satan has against us.

II. How he was assaulted by one temptation after another, and how he defeated the design of the tempter in every assault, and became more than a conqueror. During the forty days he was "tempted of the devil," ver. 2, not by any inward suggestions, for the prince of this world had nothing in Christ by which to inject any such, but by outward solicitations, perhaps in the likeness of a serpent, as he tempted our first parents; but at the end of the forty days he came nearer him, and did as it were close with him, when he perceived that he was an hungered, ver. 2. Probably our Lord Jesus then began to look about among the trees, to see if he could find any thing that was eatable; from whence the devil took occasion to make the following proposal to him:

First. He tempted him to distrust his Father's care of him, and to set up for himself, and shift for provision for himself in such a way as his Father had not appointed for him, ver. 3: "If thou be the Son of God," as the voice from heaven declared, "command this stone that it be made bread." 1. "I counsel thee to do it, for God, if he be thy Father, has forgotten thee, and it will be long enough ere he sends either ravens or angels to feed thee." If we begin to think of being our own carvers, and of living by our own forecast, without depending upon Divine providence, of getting wealth by our might and the power of our hands, we must look upon it as a temptation of Satan's, and reject it accordingly; it is Satan's counsel to think of an independency upon God. 2. "I challenge thee to do it, if thou canst; if thou dost not do it, I will say thou art not the Son of God; for John Baptist said lately that "God is able of stones to raise up children to Abraham," which is the greater; thou therefore hast not the power of the Son of God, if thou dost not of stones make bread for thyself when thou needest it, which is the lesser." Thus was God himself tempted in the wilderness; "Can he furnish a table? Can he give bread?" Ps. lxxviii. 19, 20.

Now, First. Christ yielded not to the temptation; he would not turn that stone into bread, no, not though he was hungry. 1st. Because he would not do what Satan bid him do, for that would have looked as if there had been indeed a compact between him and the prince of devils. Note, We must not do any thing that looks like giving place to the devil. Miracles were wrought for the confirming of faith, and the devil had no faith to be confirmed, and therefore he would not do it for him. He did his signs, "in the presence of his disciples," Jno. xx. 30; and particularly the "beginning of his miracles," turning water into wine, which he did that his disciples might believe on him, Jno. ii. 11; but here in the wilderness he had no disciples with him. 2nd. He wrought miracles for the ratification of his doctrine; and, therefore, till he began to preach, he would not begin to work miracles. 3rd. He would not work miracles for himself, and his own supply, lest he should seem impatient of hunger, whereas he came not to please himself, but to suffer grief, and that grief among others; and because he would shew that he pleased not himself, he would rather turn water into wine, for the credit and convenience of his friend, than stones into bread for his own necessary supply. 4th. He would reserve the proof of his being the Son of God for hereafter, and would rather be upbraided by Satan with being weak, and not able to do it, than be persuaded by Satan to do that which it was not fit for him to do; thus he was upbraided by his enemies, as if he could not save himself, and come down from the cross, when he could have come down, but would not, because it was not fit he should. 5th. He would not do any thing that looked like distrust of his Father, or acting separately from him, or any thing disagreeable to his present state; being "in all things made like unto his brethren," he would, like other the children of God, live in a dependence upon the Divine providence and promise, and trust him either to send him supply into the wilderness, or lead him to a city of habitation, where there was supply, as he used to do, Ps. cxlii. 5-7; and in the meantime would support him, though he was hungry, as he had done these forty days past.

Secondly. He returned a Scripture answer to it; ver. 4, "It is written." This is the first word recorded as spoken by Christ after his instalment in his prophetic office, and it is a quotation out of the Old Testament, to shew that he came to assert and maintain the authority of the Scripture, as uncontrollable even by Satan himself. And though he had the Spirit without measure, and a doctrine of his own to preach, and a religion to found, yet it agreed with Moses and the prophets, whose writings he therefore lays down as a rule to himself, and recommends to us as a reply to Satan and his temptations. The Word of God is our sword, and faith in that Word is our shield; we should therefore be mighty in the Scriptures, and go in that might, go forth and go on in our spiritual warfare. Know what is written, for it is for our learning, for our use. The text of Scripture he makes use of, is quoted from Deu. viii. 3, "Man shall not live by bread alone;" "I need not turn the stone into bread, for God can send manna for my nourishment, as he did for Israel." Man can live "by every Word of God," that is, by whatever God will appoint that he shall live. How had Christ lived, lived comfortably, these forty days last past? Not by bread, but by the Word of God; by meditation upon that Word, and communion with it, and with God in and by it; and in like manner he could live yet, though now he began to be an hungered. God has many ways of providing for his people without the ordinary means of subsistence, and therefore he is not at any time to be distrusted, but at all times to be depended upon in the way of duty. If meat be wanting, God can take away the appetite, or give such degrees of patience as will enable a man even to laugh at destruction and famine, Job v. 22; or make pulse and water more nourishing than all the portion of the king's meat, Dan. i. 12, 13; and enable his people to rejoice in the Lord, when the fig tree doth not blossom, Hab. iii. 17, 18. She was an active believer that said she had many a meal's meat of the promises when she wanted bread.

Secondly. He tempted him to accept from him the kingdom which, as the Son of God, he expected to receive from his Father, and to do him homage for it, ver. 5-7. This evangelist puts this temptation second, which Matthew had put last, and which it should seem was really the last; but Luke was full of it, as the blackest and most violent, and therefore hastened to it. In the devil's tempting our first parents, he represented to them the forbidden fruit, first as good for food, and then as pleasant to the eyes, and they were overpowered by both these charms. Satan here first tempted Christ to turn the stones into bread, which would be good for food, and then shewed him the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them, which was pleasant to the eyes; but in both these he overpowered Satan, and perhaps with an eye to that Luke calleth the order. Now observe,

1. How Satan managed this temptation, to prevail with Christ to become a tributary to him, and to receive his kingdom by delegation from him.

1st. He gave him a prospect of "all the kingdoms of the world in a moment of time," an airy representation of them, such as he thought most likely to strike the fancy, and seem a real prospect; and to humour the thing, he "took him up" for this purpose "into a high mountain;" and because we next, after the temptation, find Christ on the other side Jordan, some think it probable that it was to the top of Pisgah that the devil took him, from whence Moses had a sight of Canaan. And that it was but a phantasm that the devil here presented our Saviour with, as the prince of the power of the air, is confirmed by that circumstance which Luke here takes notice of, that it was done "in a moment of time;" whereas if a man take a prospect of but one country, he must do it successively, must turn himself round, and take a view first of one part, and then of another. Thus the devil thought to impose upon our Saviour with a fallacy, a deceptio visus; and by making him believe that he could shew him all the kingdoms of the world, would draw him into an opinion that he could give him all those kingdoms.

2nd. He boldly alleged that these kingdoms were all delivered to him, that he had power to dispose of them, and all their glory, and to give it to whomsoever he would, ver. 6. Some think herein he pretended to be an angel of light; and that, as one of the angels that was set over the kingdoms, he had bought out, or fought out, all the rest, and so was intrusted with the disposal of them all, and in God's name would give them him, knowing they were designed for him; but clogged with this condition, that he should fall down and worship him; which a good angel would have been so far from demanding, that he would not have admitted it, no, not upon shewing much greater things than these, as appears, Rev. xiv. 10; xxii. 9. But I rather take it that he claimed this power as Satan, and as delivered to him, not by the Lord, but by the kings and people of these kingdoms, who gave their power and honour to the devil, Eph. ii. 2. Hence he is called "the god of this world," and "the prince of this world." It was promised to the Son of God that he should have "the heathen for his inheritance," Ps. ii. 8. "Why," saith the devil, "the heathen are mine, are my subjects and votaries; but, however, they shall be thine; I will give them thee, upon condition that thou worship me for them, and say they are the rewards which I have given thee, as others have done before thee, (Hos. ii. 12), and consent to have and hold them by, from, and under me."

3rd. He demanded of him homage and adoration: "If thou wilt worship me, all shall be thine," ver. 7. First. He would have him worship him himself; perhaps he doth not mean so as never to worship God, but let him worship him in conjunction with God; for the devil knows if he can but once come in a partner, he shall soon be sole proprietor. Secondly. He would indent with him, that when, according to the promise made to him, he had got possession of the kingdoms of this world, he should make no alteration of religions in them, but permit and suffer the nations, as they had done hitherto, to sacrifice to devils, 1 Cor. x. 20; that he should still keep up demon-worship in the world; and let him take all the power and glory of the kingdoms, if he pleased. Let who will take the wealth and grandeur of this earth, Satan has all he would have, if he can but have men's hearts, and affections, and adorations; can but work in the children of disobedience, for then he effectually devours them.

2. How our Lord Jesus triumphed over this temptation; he gave it a peremptory repulse, rejected it with abhorrence; ver. 8. "Get thee behind me, Satan;" I cannot bear the mention of it. What! worship the enemy of God, whom I came to serve? and of man, whom I came to save? No; I will never do it. Such a temptation as this was not to be reasoned with, but immediately refused. It was presently knocked on the head with one word, "It is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God;" and not only so, but him only, him and no other. And therefore Christ will not worship Satan; nor when he has the kingdoms of the world delivered to him by his Father, as he expects shortly to have, will he suffer any remains of the worship of the devil to continue in them. No, it shall be perfectly rooted out and abolished wherever his Gospel comes; he will make no composition with him. Polytheism and idolatry must go down, as Christ's kingdom gets up; men must be "turned from the power of Satan unto God;" from the worship of devils to the worship of the only living and true God; this is the great Divine law that Christ will re-estabish among men, and by his holy religion reduce men to the obedience of, "that God only is to be served and worshipped;" and therefore whoever set up any creature as the object of religious worship, though it were a saint, or an angel, or the virgin Mary herself, they directly thwart Christ's design, and relapse into heathenism.

Thirdly. He tempted him to be his own murderer, in a presumptuous confidence of his Father's protection, such as he had no warrant for. Observe,

1. What he designed in this temptation: "If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down," ver. 4. 1st. He would have him seek for a new proof of his

iii. 36. This Cainan is not mentioned in the Hebrew Bible, but is found in the Septuagint version of Gen. x. 24, xi. 12, 13, which Luke probably follows. It is the opinion of some, however, that the name crept in here through the error of some copyist from verse 37, where it is certainly correct.

iv. 4. From this verse the word "saying," and the expression, "but by every word of God," are omitted by the Sinaitic, Vatican, and other MSS.

iv. 5. In some of the best ancient copies this verse reads, "And taking him up he showed unto him all the kingdoms of the world," &c. In the Gospel of Matthew the order of the temptations is different, this display of the world's kingdoms occupying the third place instead of the second.

iv. 8. The Sinaitic and Vatican MSS. omit the words, "Get thee behind me, Satan," which are also left out by some modern editors.

iv. 9. For "a pinnacle" we should read "the pinnacle;" supposed being the Son of God, as if that which his Father had given him, by the voice from heaven and the descent of the Spirit upon him, were not sufficient; which would have been a dishonour to God, as if he had not chosen the most proper way of giving him the assurance of it; and it would have argued a distrust of the Spirit's dwelling in him, which was the great and most convincing proof to himself of his being the Son of God, Heb. i. 8, 9. 2nd. He would have him seek a new method of proclaiming and publishing this to the world. The devil in effect suggests, that it was in an obscure corner that he was attested to be the Son of God—among a company of ordinary people, who attended John's baptism, that his honours were proclaimed; but if he would now declare from "the pinnacle of the temple," among all the great people who attended the temple service, that he was the Son of God, and then, for proof of it, throw himself down unhurt, he would presently be received by every body as a messenger sent from heaven. Thus Satan would have him seek honours of his devising, in contempt of those which God had put on him, and manifest himself in the temple at Jerusalem; whereas God designed he should be more manifest among John's penitents, to whom his doctrine would be more welcome than to the priests. 3rd. It is likely he had some hopes, that though he could not throw him down to do him the least mischief, yet if he would but throw himself down, the fall might be his death, and then he should have got him finely out of the way.

2. How he backed and enforced this temptation. He suggested, "It is written," ver. 10. Christ had quoted Scripture against him, and he thought he would be quits with him, and would shew that he could quote Scripture as well as he. It has been usual with heretics and seducers to pervert Scripture, and to press the sacred writings into the service of the worst of wickednesses. "He will give his angels charge over thee," if thou be his Son, "and in their hands they shall bear thee up." And, now he was upon the pinnacle of the temple, he might especially expect this ministration of angels; for, if he were the Son of God, the temple was the proper place for him to be in, Lu. ii. 41; and if any place under the sun had a guard of angels constantly, it must needs be that, Ps. lxxviii. 17. It is true God has promised the protection of angels, to encourage us to trust him, not to tempt him; as far as the promise of God's presence with us, so far the promise of the angels' ministration goes, but no farther; they shall keep thee when thou goest on the ground, where thy way lies, but not if thou wilt presume to fly in the air.

3. How he was baffled and defeated in the temptation, ver. 12. Christ quoted Deu. vi. 16, where it is said, "Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God," by desiring a sign for the proof of Divine revelation, when he has already given that which is sufficient; for so Israel did when they "tempted God in the wilderness," saying, "He gave us water out of the rock, but can he give flesh also?" This Christ would be guilty of, if he should say, "He did indeed prove me to be the Son of God, by sending the Spirit upon me, which is the greater; but can he also give his angels a charge concerning me, which is the lesser?"

III. What was the result and issue of this combat, ver. 13. Our victorious Redeemer kept his ground, and came off a conqueror, not for himself only, but for us also.

First. The devil emptied his quiver; he "ended all the temptation;" Christ gave him opportunity to say, and do all he could against him; he let him try all his force, and yet defeated him. Did Christ suffer being tempted till all the temptation was ended; and must not we expect also to pass all our trials, to go through the hour of temptation assigned us?

Secondly. He then quitted the field; "he departed from him;" he saw it was to no purpose to attack him; he had nothing in him for his fiery darts to fasten upon; he had no blind side, no weak or unguarded part in his wall, and therefore gave up the cause. Note, If we resist the devil, he will flee from us.

Thirdly. Yet he continued his malice against him, and departed with a resolution to attack him again; he departed but "for a season," ἀχρι καιρου,—till a season; or, till the season when he was again to be let loose upon him, not as a tempter, to draw him to sin, and so to strike at his head, which was what he now aimed at, and was wholly defeated in it; but as a persecutor, to bring him to suffer, by Judas and other the wicked instruments whom he employed, and so to bruise his heel, which it was told him, Gen. iii. 15, he should have power to do, and would do, though it would be the breaking of his own head. He departed now, till that season came which Christ calls the power of darkness, Lu. xxii. 53; and when the prince of this world would again come, Jno. xiv. 30.

14 And Jesus returned in the power of the Spirit into Galilee: and there went out a fame of him through all the region round about. 15 And he taught in their synagogues, being glorified of all. 16 And he came to Nazareth, where he had been brought up: and, as his custom was, he went into the synagogue on the sabbath day, and stood up for to read. 17 And there was delivered unto him the book of the prophet Esaias. And when he had opened the book, he found the place where it was written, 18 The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, 19 To preach the acceptable year of the Lord. 20 And he closed the book, and he gave it again to the minister, and sat down. And the eyes of all them that were in the synagogue were fastened on him. 21 And he began to say unto them, This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears. 22 And all bare him witness, and wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth. And they said, Is not this Joseph's son? 23 And he said unto them, Ye will surely say unto me this proverb, Physician, heal thyself: whatsoever we have heard done in Capernaum, do also here in thy country. 24 And he said, Verily I say unto you, No prophet is accepted in his own country. 25 But I tell you of a truth, many widows were in Israel in the days of Elias, when the heaven was shut up three years and sixth months, when great famine was throughout all the land; 26 But unto none of them was Elias sent, save unto Sarepta, a city of Sidon, unto a woman that was a widow. 27 And many lepers were in Israel in the time of Eliseus the prophet; and none of them was cleansed, saving Naaman the Syrian. 28 And all they in the synagogue, when they heard these things, were filled with wrath, 29 And rose up, and thrust him out of the city, and led him unto the brow of the hill whereon their city was built, that they might cast him down headlong. 30 But he passing through the midst of them went his way,

READING THE LAW.—MODERN JEWISH.

After Christ had vanquished the evil spirit, he made it appear how much he was under the influence of the good Spirit; and having defended himself against the devil's assaults, he now begins to act offensively, and to make those attacks upon him by his preaching and miracles which he could not resist or repel. Observe,

I. What is here said in general of his preaching, and the entertainment it met with in Galilee, a remote part of the country, distant from Jerusalem. It was a part of Christ's humiliation that he began his ministry there. But, 1st. Thither he came "in the power of the Spirit;" the same Spirit that qualified him for the exercise of his prophetic office, strongly inclined him to it. He was not to wait for a call from men, for he had light and life in himself. 2nd. There "he taught in their synagogues," their places of public worship; where they met, not, as in the temple, for ceremonial services, but for the moral acts of devotion—to read, and expound, and apply the Word, to pray and praise, and for church discipline. These came to be more frequented since the captivity, when the ceremonial worship was near expiring. 3rd. This he did so as that he gained a great reputation, "a fame of him went through all that region," ver. 14; and it was a good fame, for, ver. 15, he was "glorified of all;" every body admired him, and cried him up; they never heard such preaching in all their lives. Now at first he met with no contempt or contradiction; all glorified him, and there were none as yet that vilified him.

II. Of his preaching at Nazareth, the city where he was brought up, and the entertainment it met with there. And here we are told how he preached there, and how he was persecuted.

First. How he preached there; and in that observe, 1. The opportunity he had for it. "He came to Nazareth," when he had gained a reputation in other places, in hopes that thereby something at least of the contempt and prejudice to be an erection on one of the Temple buildings, a sort of turret overlooking the Kidron valley. Dr. Oosterzee says, "Although, considered in itself, it might be very probable that the Lord should spend a single day really at Jerusalem during this period, yet it seems to us more probable that he did not corporally quit the wilderness till the conflict was over. To his inward consciousness, he undoubtedly seemed to stand upon the pinnacle; and with regard to the power of the Evil One to place him in spirit in a place so different from that occupied by his body, we may here recall the words of Gregory: 'It is no wonder if Christ permitted himself to be led about by the devil, by whose members he permitted himself to be crucified.'" But surely Gregory understood the narrative in a literal sense, which has been the view of most expositors, except in reference to seeing the kingdoms of the world in a moment.

iv. 16. From the expression, "as his custom was," Bengel and others infer that the Lord had been in the habit of reading in public with which his countrymen would look upon him might be worn off. There he took occasion to preach, 1st. In the synagogue, the proper place; where it had been his custom to attend when he was a private person, ver. 16. We ought to attend on the public worship of God as we have opportunity. But now he was entered upon his public ministry, there he preached. Where the multitudes of fish were, there this wise Fisherman would cast his net. 2nd. On the sabbath day, the proper time, which the pious Jews spent, not in a mere ceremonial rest from worldly labour, but in the duties of God's worship, as of old they frequented the schools of the prophets, on the new moons and the sabbaths. Note. It is good to keep sabbaths in solemn assemblies.

2. The call he had to it. 1st. He "stood up to read." They had in their synagogues seven readers every sabbath; the first a priest, the second a Levite, and the other five Israelites of that synagogue. We often find Christ preaching in other synagogues, but never reading, but only in this synagogue at Nazareth, of which he had been many years a member. Now he offered his service, as he had perhaps often done; he read one of the lessons out of the prophets, Acts xiii. 13, 15. Note. Reading the Scriptures is very proper work to be done in religious assemblies; and Christ himself did not think it any disparagement to him to be employed in it. 2nd. "The book of the prophet Isaiah was delivered to him," either by the ruler of the synagogue, or by the minister mentioned ver. 20; so that he was no intruder, but duly authorized pro hac vice,—"on this occasion." The second lesson for that day being in the prophecy of Isaiah, they gave him that volume to read in.

3. The text he preached upon. He stood up to read, to teach us reverence in reading and hearing the Word of God. When Ezra opened the book of the law all the people stood up, Neh. viii. 5; so did Christ here, when he read in the book of the prophets. Now the book being delivered to him, 1st. He opened it. The books of the Old Testament were in a manner shut up until Christ opened them, Isa. xxix. 11. Worthy "is the Lamb that was slain to take the book and open the seals," for he can open, not the book only, but the understanding. 2nd. He found the place that was appointed to be read that day in course, which he needed not be directed to; he soon found it, and read it, and took it for his text. Now his text was taken out of Isa. lxi. 1, 2, which is here quoted at large, ver. 18, 19. There was a providence in that that portion of Scripture should be read that day, which speaks so very plainly of the Messiah, that they might be left inexcusable who knew him not, though they heard the voices of the prophets read every sabbath day, which bare witness of him, Acts xiii. 27.

This text gives a full account of Christ's undertaking, and the work he came into the world to do. Observe, First. How he was qualified for the work; "the Spirit of the Lord is upon me;" all the gifts and graces of the Spirit were conferred upon him, not by measure, as upon other prophets, but without measure, Jno. iii. 34. He now came "in the power of the Spirit," ver. 14.

Secondly. How he was commissioned; "because he has anointed me," and "sent me." And this extraordinary qualification amounted to a commission; his being anointed signifies both his being fitted for the undertaking and called to it. Those whom God appoints to any service he anoints for it; "because he hath sent me, he hath sent his Spirit along with me."

Thirdly. What his work was. He was qualified and commissioned, 1st. To be a great prophet; he was anointed to preach, that is three times mentioned here, for that was the work he was now entering upon. Observe, First. To whom he was to preach: to the poor; to those that were poor in the world, whom the Jewish doctors disdain to undertake the teaching of, and spoke of with contempt; to those that were poor in spirit, to the meek and humble, and to those that are truly sorrowful for sin. To them the Gospel and the grace of it will be welcome, and they shall have it, Mat. xi. 5. Secondly. What he was to preach; in general, he must preach the Gospel. He is sent evangelizantia,—"to evangelize them;" not only to preach to them, but to make that preaching effectual; to bring it not only to their ears, but to their hearts, and deliver them into the mould of it. Three things he is to preach: 1. "Deliverance to the captives," the Gospel is a proclamation of liberty, like that to Israel in Egypt, in Babylon. By the merit of Christ sinners may be loosed from the bonds of guilt, and by his Spirit and grace, from the bondage of corruption. It is a deliverance from the worst of thralldoms, which all those shall have the benefit of that are willing to make Christ their head, and are willing to be ruled by him. 2. "Recovering of sight to the blind;" he came, not only by the word of the Gospel to bring light to them that sat in the dark, but, by the power of his grace, to give sight to them that were blind; not only the Gentile world, but every unregenerate soul, that is not only in bondage, but in blindness, like Samson and Zedekiah. Christ came to tell us that he has eyesalve for us, which we may have for the asking; that if our prayer be, "Lord, that our eyes may be opened," his answer shall be, "Receive your sight." 3. "The acceptable year of the Lord," ver. 19. He came to let the world know that the God whom they had offended was willing to be reconciled to them, and to accept of them upon new terms; that there was yet a way of making their services acceptable to him; that there is now a time of good will towards men. It alludes to the year of release, or that of jubilee, which was an acceptable year to servants, that were then set at liberty; to debtors, against whom all actions then dropped; and to those who had mortgaged their lands, for then they returned to them again. Christ came to sound the jubilee trumpet, and blessed were they that heard the joyful sound, Ps. lxxxix. 15; it was an accepted time, for it was a day of salvation.

2nd. Christ came to be a great physician; for he was sent to "heal the broken-hearted," to comfort and cure afflicted consciences, and to give peace to those that were troubled and humbled for sins, and under a dread of God's wrath against them for them; and to bring them to rest who were weary and heavy laden under the burthen of guilt and corruption.

3rd. To be a great Redeemer; he not only proclaims liberty to the captives, as Cyrus did to the Jews in Babylon,—whoever will, may go up; but he sets at liberty them that are bruised, he doth by his Spirit incline and enable them to make use of the liberty granted, as then none did but those whose spirits God stirred up, Ezr. i. 5. He came in God's name to discharge poor sinners, that were debtors and prisoners to Divine justice; the prophets could but proclaim liberty, but Christ, as one having authority, as one that had power on earth to forgive sins, came to set at liberty; and therefore this clause is added here; and Dr. Lightfoot thinks, that according to a liberty the Jews allowed their readers, to compare scripture with scripture in their reading, for the explication of the text, Christ added it from Isa. lviii. 6, where it is made the duty of the acceptable year to let the oppressed go free, where the phrase the Seventy use is the same with this here.

4. Here is Christ's application of this text to himself, ver. 21; when he had read it, he "rolled up the book," and gave it again to the minister or clerk that attended, and sat down, according to the custom of the Jewish teachers; he "sat daily in the temple teaching," Mat. xxvi. 55. Now he began his discourse thus, "This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears." "This," which Isaiah wrote by way of prophecy, I have now read to you by way of history. It now began to be fulfilled in Christ's entrance upon his public ministry; now, in the report they heard of his preaching and miracles in other places; now, in his preaching to them in their own synagogue. It is most probable Christ went on, and shewed particularly how this scripture was fulfilled in the doctrine he preached concerning the kingdom of heaven at hand, that that was preaching liberty, and sight, and healing, and all the blessings of the acceptable year of the Lord. Many other gracious words proceeded out of his mouth, which these were but the beginning of; for Christ often preached long sermons which we have but a short account of. This was enough to introduce a great deal, "This day is this scripture fulfilled." Note, 1st. All the Scriptures of the Old Testament that were to be fulfilled in the Messiah, had their full accomplishment in the Lord Jesus, which abundantly proves that this was "he that should come." 2nd. In the providences of God it is fit to observe the fulfilling of the Scriptures. The works of God are not only the accomplishment of his secret word, but of his word revealed; and it will help us to understand both the Scriptures and the providences of God to compare them one with another.

5. Here is the attention and admiration of the auditors.

1st. Their attention, ver. 20: "the eyes of all them that were in the synagogue," and probably there were a great many, "were fastened on him," big with expectation what he would say, having heard so much of late concerning him. Note. It is good, in hearing the Word, to keep the eye fixed upon the minister by whom God is speaking to us; for as the eye affects the heart, so usually the heart follows the eye, and is wandering or fixed as that is. Or rather, let us learn hence to keep the eye fixed upon Christ speaking to us in and by the minister. "What saith my Lord unto my servant?"

2nd. Their admiration, ver. 22: they "all bare him witness" that he spoke admirably well, and to the purpose; they all commended him, and "wondered at the gracious words that proceeded out of his mouth;" and yet, as appears by what follows, they did not believe in him. Note. It is possible that those who are admirers of good ministers and good preaching may yet be themselves no true Christians. Observe, First. What it was they admired: "the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth;" the words of grace; good words, and spoken in a winning, melting way. Note, Christ's words are words of grace; for, grace being poured into his lips, Ps. xlv. 2, words of grace poured from them; and these words of grace are to be wondered at. Christ's name was wonderful, and in nothing was he more so than in his grace, in the words of his grace, and the power that went along with those words. We may well wonder that he should speak such words of grace to such graceless wretches as we are. Secondly. What it was that increased their wonder; and that was the consideration of his original; they said, "Is not this Joseph's son?" and therefore his extraction mean, and his education mean. Some from this suggestion took occasion perhaps so much the more to admire his gracious words, concluding he must needs be taught of God, for they knew no one else had taught him; while others, perhaps, with this consideration corrected their wonder at his gracious words, and concluded there could be nothing really admirable in them, whatever appeared, because he was the son of Joseph. Can any thing great, or worthy our regard, come from one so mean?

6. Christ's anticipating an objection, which he knew to be in the minds of many of his hearers. Observe,

1st. What the objection was, ver. 33: "Ye will surely say to me, Physician, heal thyself;" that is, "Because ye know that I am the son of Joseph, your neighbour, you will expect that I should work miracles among you, as I have done in other places; as one would expect that a physician, if he be able, should heal not only himself, but those of his own family and fraternity. Most of Christ's miracles were cures. 'Now why should not the sick in thine own city be healed, as well as those in other cities?' They were designed to cure people of their unbelief. 'Now why should not the disease of unbelief, if it be indeed a disease, be cured in those of thine own city, as well as in those of others?' 'Whatsoever we have heard done in Capernaum,' that has been so much talked of, 'do here also in thine own country.' They were pleased with Christ's gracious words, only because they hoped they were but the introduction to some wondrous works of his; they wanted to have their lame, and blind, and sick, and lepers healed and helped, that the charge of their town might be eased; and that was the chief thing they looked at; they thought their own town as worthy to be the stage of miracles as any others; and why should not his neighbours and acquaintance have the benefit of his preaching and miracles rather than any other?"

2nd. How he answers this objection against the course he took.

First. By a plain and positive reason, why he would not make Nazareth his head-quarters, ver. 24; because it generally holds true, "that no prophet is accepted in his own country;" at least not so well, nor with such probability of doing good, as in some other country; experience seals to this. When prophets have been sent with messages and miracles of mercy, few of their own countrymen, that have known their extraction and education, have been fit to receive them; so Dr. Hammond. Familiarity breeds contempt; and we are apt to think meanly of those whose conversation we have been accustomed to; and they will scarcely be duly honoured as prophets who were well known when they were in the rank of private men; that is most esteemed that is far fetched and dear bought, above what is homebred, though really more excellent. This ariseth likewise from the envy which neighbours commonly have towards one another, so that they cannot endure to see him their superior whom a while ago they took to be every way their inferior. For this reason Christ declined working miracles or doing any thing extraordinary at Nazareth, because of the rooted prejudices they had against him there.

Secondly. By pertinent examples of two of the most famous prophets of the Old Testament, who chose to dispense their favours among foreigners rather than among their own countrymen, and that, no doubt, by Divine direction.

1st. Elijah maintained a widow of Sarepta, a city of Sidon, one that was a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel, when there was a famine in the land, ver. 25, 26. The story we have, 1 Kin. xvii. 9; it is said here, that the heaven was shut up three years and six months; whereas it is said, 1 Kin. xviii. 1, that in the third year Elijah shewed himself to Ahab, and there was rain; but that was not the third year of the drought, but the third year of Elijah's sojourning with the widow of Sarepta. As God would hereby shew himself a "Father of the fatherless and a judge of the widows," so he would shew that he was rich in mercy to all, even to the Gentiles.

2nd. Elisha cleansed Naaman the Syrian of his leprosy, though he was a Syrian, and not only a foreigner, but an enemy to Israel, ver. 27: "Many lepers were in Israel in the days of Eliseus," four particularly, that brought the news of the Syrians raising the siege of Samaria with precipitation, and leaving the plunder of their tents to enrich Samaria, when Elisha was himself in the besieged city, and this was the accomplishment of his prophecy too: see 2 Kin. vii. 1, 3, &c. And yet we do not find that Elisha cleansed them, no, not for a reward of their service, and the good tidings they brought; but only this Syrian; for none but he had faith to apply himself to the prophet for a cure. Christ himself often met with greater faith among Gentiles than in Israel. And here he mentions both these instances, to shew that he did not dispense the favour of his miracles by private respects, but according to God's will before his baptism, and while still a youth at Nazareth. Alford says, "It is doubtful whether the Rabbinical cycle of Sabbath readings, or lessons from the law and prophets, were as yet in use; but some regular plan was adopted, and according to that plan, after the reading of the law, which always preceded, the portion from the prophets came to be read, which for that Sabbath fell in the prophet Isaiah."

iv. 20. Our Lord stood up to read, but sat down in order to expound the Scripture, such being the ordinary postures on those occasions. "The minister" was the official whose duty it was to take charge of the sacred books, to remove them from the chest, and to return them when done with.

iv. 23. It is apparent from this reference to previous miracles at Capernaum, that these events occurred some time after the temptation.

iv. 26. The place here called Sarepta is called Zarephath in 1 Kings xvii. 9. it was between Tyre and Sidon, as Josephus says.

appointment; and the people of Israel might as justly have said to Elijah or Elisha, as the Nazarenes to Christ, "Physician, heal thyself." Nay, Christ wrought his miracles, though not among his townsmen, yet among Israelites; whereas these great prophets wrought theirs among Gentiles. The examples of the saints, though they will not make a bad action good, yet will help to free a good action from the blame of exceptionable people.

Secondly, How he was persecuted at Nazareth.

1. That which provoked them was his taking notice of the favour which God, by Elijah and Elisha, shewed to the Gentiles: "when they heard these things, they were filled with wrath," ver. 28; they were all so; a great change since ver. 22, when they "wondered at the gracious words that proceeded out of his mouth;" thus uncertain are the opinions and affections of the multitude, and so very fickle. If they had mixed faith with those gracious words of Christ which they wondered at, they would have been awakened, by these latter words of his, to take heed of sinning away their opportunities; but those only pleased the ear, and went no farther; and therefore these grated on the ear, and irritated their corruptions. They were angry that he should compare himself, whom they knew to be the son of Joseph, with those great prophets, and compare them with the men of that corrupt age when all had bowed the knee to Baal. But that which especially exasperated them was, that he intimated some kindness God had in reserve for the Gentiles, which the Jews could by no means bear the thoughts of, Acts xxii. 21. Their pious ancestors pleased themselves with the hopes of adding of the Gentiles to the church; witness many of David's Psalms, and Isaiah's prophecies. But this degenerate race, when they had forfeited the covenant themselves, hated to think that any others should be taken in.

2. They were provoked to that degree that they made an attempt upon his life. This was a severe trial, now at his setting out, but a specimen of the usage he met with, when he came to his own and they received him not. 1st. They rose up in a tumultuous manner against him; interrupted him in his discourse, and themselves in their devotions, for they could not stay till their synagogue worship was over. 2nd. They "thrust him out of the city," as one not worthy to have a residence among them, though there he had had a settlement so long; they thrust from them the Saviour and the salvation, as if he had been the offscouring of all things. How justly might he have called for fire from heaven upon them; but this was the day of his patience. 3rd. They "led him unto the brow of the hill," with a purpose to "throw him down headlong," as one not fit to live. Though they knew how inoffensively he had for so many years lived among them, how shining his conversation had been; though they had heard such a fame of him, and had but just now themselves admired his gracious words; though in justice he ought to have been allowed a fair hearing, and liberty to explain himself, yet they hurried him away in a popular fury, or frenzy rather, to put him to death in a most barbarous manner. Sometimes they were ready to stone him for the good works he did, Jno. x. 32; here, for not doing the good works they expected from him: to such a height of wickedness was violence sprung up.

3. Yet he escaped, because his hour was not yet come: "he passed through the midst of them" unhurt; either he blinded their eyes, as the Sodomites and Syrians were, or he bound their hands, or filled them with confusion, so that they could not do what they designed; for his work was not done, it was but just begun; his hour was not yet come; when it was come he freely surrendered himself. They drove him from them, and he went his way. He would have gathered Nazareth, but they would not; and therefore their house is left to them desolate. This added to the reproach of his being Jesus of Nazareth, that not only it was a place whence no good thing was expected, but that it was such a wicked, rude place, and so unkind to him; yet there was a providence in it, that he should not be much respected by the men of Nazareth, for that would have looked like a collusion between him and his old acquaintance; but now, though they received him not, there were those that did.

31 And came down to Capernaum, a city of Galilee, and taught them on the sabbath days. 32 And they were astonished at his doctrine: for his word was with power. 33 And in the synagogue there was a man, which had a spirit of an unclean devil, and cried out with a loud voice, 34 Saying, Let us alone; what have we to do with thee, thou Jesus of Nazareth? art thou come to destroy us? I know thee who thou art; the Holy One of God. 35 And Jesus rebuked him, saying, Hold thy peace, and come out of him. And when the devil had thrown him in the midst, he came out of him, and hurt him not. 36 And they were all amazed, and spake among themselves, saying, What a word is this! for with authority and power he commandeth the unclean spirits, and they come out. 37 And the fame of him went out into every place of the country round about. 38 And he arose out of the synagogue, and entered into Simon's house. And Simon's wife's mother was taken with a great fever; and they besought him for her. 39 And he stood over her, and rebuked the fever; and it left her: and immediately she arose and ministered unto them. 40 Now when the sun was setting, all they that had any sick with divers diseases brought them unto him; and he laid his hands on every one of them, and healed them. 41 And devils also came out of many, crying out, and saying, Thou art Christ the Son of God. And he rebuking them suffered them not to speak: for they knew that he was Christ. 42 And when it was day, he departed and went into a desert place: and the people sought him, and came unto him, and stayed him, that he should not depart from them. 43 And he said unto them, I must preach the kingdom of God to other cities also: for therefore am I sent. 44 And he preached in the synagogues of Galilee.

When Christ was expelled Nazareth, he came to Capernaum, another city of Galilee. The account we have in these verses, of his preaching and miracles there, we had before, Mar. i. 21, &c. Observe,

I. His preaching. He "taught them on the sabbath days," ver. 31. In hearing the word preached, as an ordinance of God, we worship God, and it is a proper work for sabbath days. Christ's preaching much affected people, ver. 31; they were "astonished at his doctrine;" there was weight in every word he said, and admirable discoveries were made to them by it; the doctrine itself was astonishing, and not only as it came from one that had not had a liberal education; "his word was with power," there was a commanding force in it, and a working power went along with it to the consciences of men. The doctrine Paul preached hereby proved itself to be of God, that it came "in demonstration of the Spirit and of power."

II. His miracles. Of these we have here,

First. Two particularly instanced in, shewing Christ to be, 1. A controller and conqueror of Satan in the world of mankind, and in the souls of people, by his power to cast them out of the bodies of those he had taken possession of; for "for this purpose was he manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil." Observe, 1st. The devil is an unclean spirit, his nature directly contrary to that of the pure and holy God, and degenerated from what it was at first. 2nd. This unclean spirit works in the children of men, in the souls of many, as then in men's bodies. 3rd. It is possible that those who are very much under the power and working of Satan may yet be found in the synagogue, among the worshippers of God. 4th. Even the devils know and believe that Jesus Christ is the Holy One of God, is sent of God, and is a holy one. 5th. They believe and tremble; this unclean spirit "cried out with a loud voice," under a "certain fearful looking for of judgment," and apprehensive that Christ was now come to destroy him. Unclean spirits are subject to continual frights. 6th. The devils have "nothing to do with Jesus Christ," nor desire to have anything to do with him, for he took not on him the nature of angels. 7th. Christ has the devil under check; "he rebuked him, saying, Hold thy peace;" and this word he spake "with power," φύλαττε,—be muzzled; Christ did not only enjoin him silence, but stopped his mouth, and forced him to be silent against his will. 8th. In the breaking of Satan's power, both the enemy that is conquered shews his malice, and Christ the conqueror shews his overruling grace. Here, First, The devil shewed what he would have done, when he "threw the man in the midst" with force and fury, as if he would have dashed him to pieces. But, Secondly, Christ shewed what a power he had over him, in that he not only forced him to leave him, but to leave him without so much as hurting him, without giving him a parting blow, a parting gripe. Whom Satan cannot destroy, he will do all the hurt he can to; but this is a comfort, he can harm them no farther than Christ permits; nay, he shall not do them any real harm. "He came out, and hurt him not," that is, the poor man was perfectly well in an instant, though the devil left him with so much rage, that all that were present thought he had torn him to pieces. 9th. Christ's power over devils was universally acknowledged and adored, ver. 36. No one doubted of the miracle; it was evident beyond contradiction; nor was any thing suggested to diminish the glory of it, for they were "all amazed, saying, What a word is this!" They that pretended to cast out devils did it with abundance of charms and spells, to pacify the devil, and lull him asleep as it were; but Christ commanded them "with authority and power," which they could not gainsay or resist; even the "prince of the power of the air" is his vassal, and trembles before him. 10th. This, as much as any thing, gained Christ a reputation, and spread his fame. This instance of his power, which many now-a-days make light of, was then, by them that were eye-witnesses of it—and those no fools neither, but men of penetration—magnified, and was looked upon as greatly magnifying him, ver. 37; upon the account of this, "the fame of him went out" more than ever, "into every place of the country round about." Our Lord Jesus, when he set out at first in his public ministry, was mightily talked of, more than afterwards, when people's admiration wore off with the novelty of the thing.

2. Christ shewed himself to be a healer of diseases. In the former he struck at the root of man's misery, which was Satan's enmity, the origin of all the mischief; in this he strikes at one of the most spreading branches of it, one of the most common calamities of human life, and that is bodily diseases, which came in with sin, are the most common and sensible corrections for it in this life, and contribute as much as any thing towards the making our few days full of trouble. These our Lord Jesus came to take away the sting of; and as an indication of that intention, when he was on earth, chose to confirm his doctrine by such miracles mostly as took away the diseases themselves. Of all bodily diseases none more common or fatal to grown people than fevers: these come suddenly, and suddenly cut off the number of men's months in the midst; are sometimes epidemical, and slay their thousands in a little time. Now here we have Christ's curing of a fever with a word's speaking. The place was in Simon's house; his patient was Simon's wife's mother, ver. 38, 39. Observe, 1st. Christ is a guest that will pay well for his entertainment; those that bid him welcome into their hearts and houses shall be no losers by him; he comes with healing. 2nd. Even families that Christ visits, yet may be visited with sickness; houses that are blessed with his distinguishing favours, yet are liable to the common calamities of this life. Simon's wife's mother was ill of a fever; "Lord, behold she whom thou lovest is sick!" 3rd. Even good people may sometimes be exercised with the sharpest afflictions, more grievous than others; she was "taken with a great fever," very acute, and high threatening; perhaps it seized her head, and made her delirious; the most gentle fevers may iv. 29. Dean Stanley says, "Most readers probably from these words imagine a town built on the summit of a mountain, from which summit the intended precipitation was to take place. This is not the situation of Nazareth, yet its position is still in accordance with the narrative. It is built 'upon,' that is, on the side of 'a mountain,' but the 'brow' is not beneath but over the town; and such a cliff as is here implied is to be found, as all modern travellers describe, in the abrupt face of the limestone rock, about thirty or forty feet high, overhanging the Maronite convent at the south-west corner of the town." The traditional "mount of precipitation" is two or three miles distant, and has no claim to notice.

iv. 31. Nazareth occupied a much more elevated position than Capernaum, the one being among the hills, and the other on the shore of Gennesaret.

by degrees prove dangerous; but this was at first a great fever. 4th. No age can exempt from diseases. It is likely Peter's mother in law was in years, and at in a fever. 5th. When our relations are sick, we ought to apply ourselves to Christ by faith and prayer on their account. "They besought him for her;" and there is a particular promise, that the prayer of faith shall benefit the sick. 6th. Christ has a tender concern for his people when they are in sickness and distress; he "stood over her," as one concerned for her, and compassionating her case. 7th. Christ had, and still has, a sovereign power over bodily diseases; he "rebuked the fever," and with a word's speaking commanded it away, and "it left her." He saith to diseases, "Go," and they go; "Come," and they come; and can still rebuke fevers, even great fevers. 8th. This proves Christ's cures to be miraculous, that they were done in an instant; "immediately she arose." 9th. Where Christ gives a new life, in recovery from sickness, he designs and expects that it should be a new life indeed, spent more than ever in his service, to his glory. If distempers be rebuked, and we arise from a bed of sickness, we must set ourselves to minister to Jesus Christ. 10th. Those that minister to Christ, must be ready to minister to all that are sick, for his sake. She "ministered to them," not only to him that had cured her, but to them that had "besought him for her;" we must study to be grateful to them that have prayed for us.

Secondly. A general account given, by wholesale, of many other miracles of the same kind, which Christ did.

1. He "cured many that were diseased," even all, without exception, that made their application to him, ver. 40; it was "when the sun was setting," ver. 40, in the evening of that sabbath day which he had spent in the synagogue. Note, It is good to do a full sabbath day's work, to abound in the work of the day, in some good work or other, even till sunset; as those that call the sabbath and the business of it a delight. Observe, He cured "all that were sick," poor as well as rich, and though they were sick of divers diseases; so that there was no room to suspect that he had only a specific for some one disease; he had a remedy for every malady. The sign he used in healing was, laying his hands on the sick, not lifting up his hands for them; for he healed as having authority, he healed by his own power; and thus he would put honour upon that sign which was afterwards used in conferring the Holy Ghost.

2. He cast the devil out of many that were possessed, ver. 41. Confessions were extorted from the demons; they said, "Thou art Christ the Son of God!" but they said it crying with rage and indignation; it was a confession upon the rack, and therefore was not admitted in evidence; Christ "rebuked them," and did not "suffer them to say that they knew him to be the Christ," that it might appear beyond all contradiction that he had obtained a conquest over them, and not a compact with them.

First. He retired for a while into a place of solitude. It was but a little while that he allowed himself for sleep; not only because a little served him but because he was content with a little, and never indulged himself in ease; but "when it was day, he went into a desert place," not to live constantly like an hermit, but to be sometimes alone with God, as even those should be, and contrive to be, that are most engaged in public work, or else their work will go on but poorly, and they will find themselves never less alone than when thus alone.

Secondly. He returned again to the places of concourse, and to the work he had to do there. Though a desert place may be a convenient retreat, yet it is not a convenient residence, because we were not sent into this world to live to ourselves; no, not to the best part of ourselves only, but to glorify God, and do good in our generation.

1. He was extremely courted to Capernaum again. The people were mighty fond of him; I doubt more because he had healed their sick than because he had preached repentance to them; they sought him—inquired which way he went, and though it was in a desert place, they came unto him,—a desert is no desert if we be with Christ there,—and they stayed him, that he should not depart from them; so that if he would go, it should not be for want of invitation. His old neighbours at Nazareth had driven him from them, but his new acquaintance at Capernaum were very importunate for his continuance with them. Note, It ought not to discourage the ministers of Christ that some reject them, for they will meet with others that will welcome them and their message.

2. He chose rather to diffuse the light of his Gospel to many places than to fix it to one, that no one might pretend to be a mother church to the rest. Though he was welcome at Capernaum, and had done abundance of good there, yet he is "sent to preach the Gospel to other cities also;" and Capernaum must not insist upon his stay there. They that enjoy the benefit of the Gospel must be willing that others also should share in that benefit, and not covet the monopoly of it. And those ministers who are not driven from one place, may yet be drawn to another, by a prospect of greater usefulness. Christ, though he preached not in vain in the synagogue at Capernaum, yet would not be tied to that, but "preached in the synagogues of Galilee," ver. 44: Bonum est sui diffusum.—"What is good is self-diffusive." It is well for us that our Lord Jesus has not tied himself to any one place or people; but wherever two or three are gathered in his name, he will be in the midst of them; and even in Galilee of the Gentiles, his special presence is in the Christian synagogues.

CHAPTER V.

In this chapter we have, I. Christ's preaching to the people out of Peter's ship, for want of a better pulpit, ver. 1—3. II. The recompence he made to Peter for the loan of his boat, in a miraculous draught of fishes; by which he intimated to him and his partners his design to make them, as apostles, fishers of men, ver. 4—11. III. His cleansing the leper, ver. 12—15. IV. A short account of his private devotion and public ministry, ver. 16, 17. V. His cure of the man sick of the palsy, ver. 18—26. VI. His calling Levi the publican, and conversing with publicans on that occasion, ver. 27—32. VII. His justifying his disciples in not fasting so frequently as the disciples of John and the Pharisees did, ver. 33—39.

AND it came to pass, that, as the people pressed upon him to hear the word of God, he stood by the lake of Genesaret, 2 And saw two ships standing by the lake: but the fishermen were gone out of them, and were washing their nets. 3 And he entered into one of the ships, which was Simon's, and prayed him that he would thrust out a little from the land. And he sat down, and taught the people out of the ship. 4 Now when he had left speaking, he said unto Simon, Launch out into the deep, and let down your nets for a draught. 5 And Simon answering said unto him, Master, we have toiled all the night, and have taken nothing: nevertheless at thy word I will let down the net. 6 And when they had this done, they inclosed a great multitude of fishes: and their net brake. 7 And they beckoned unto their partners, which were in the other ship, that they should come and help them. And they came, and filled both the ships, so that they began to sink. 8 When Simon Peter saw it, he fell down at Jesus' knees, saying, Depart from me; for I am a sinful man, O Lord. 9 For he was astonished, and all that were with him, at the draught of the fishes which they had taken: 10 And so was also James, and John, the sons of Zebedee, which were partners with Simon. And Jesus said unto Simon, Fear not; from henceforth thou shalt catch men. 11 And when they had brought their ships to land, they forsook all, and followed him.

This passage of story fell, in order of time, before the two miracles we had in the close of the foregoing chapter, and is the same with that which was more briefly related by Matthew and Mark, of Christ's calling Peter and Andrew to be fishers of men, Mat. iv. 18, and Mar. i. 16. They had not related this miraculous draught of fishes at that time, having only in view the calling of his disciples; but Luke gives us that story, as one of the many signs which Jesus did in the presence of his disciples, which had not been written in the foregoing books, Jno. xx. 30, 31. Observe here,

1. What vast crowds attended Christ's preaching; "the people pressed upon him to hear the Word of God," ver. 1, inasmuch that no house would contain them, but he was forced to draw them out to the strand, that they might be minded of the promise made to Abraham, that his seed should be "as the sand upon the sea shore," Gen. xxii. 17; and yet of them but "a remnant shall be saved," Rom. ix. 27. The people "flocked about him," so the word signifies; they shewed respect to his preaching, though not without some rudeness to his person, which was very excusable, for they "pressed upon him." Some would reckon this a diminution to him, to be thus cried up by the vulgar, when none of the rulers or of the Pharisees believed on him; but he reckoned it an honour to him, for their souls were as precious as the souls of the grandees; and it is his aim to bring not so much the mighty as the many sons to God; and it was foretold concerning him, that "to him should the gathering of the people be." Christ was a popular preacher, and though he was able at twelve to dispute with the doctors, yet he chose at thirty to preach to the capacity of the vulgar. See how the people relished good preaching, though under all external disadvantages; they pressed to "hear the Word of God;" they could perceive it to be the Word of God by the Divine power and evidence that went along with it, and therefore they coveted to hear it.

II. What poor conveniences Christ had for preaching; "he stood by the lake of Genesaret," ver. 1, upon the level with the crowd, so that they could not see him, or hear him; he was lost among them; and every one striving to get near him, he was crowded, and in danger of being crowded into the water. What must he do? It doth not appear that his hearers had any contrivance to give him advantage; but "there were two ships," or fisher-boats, brought to shore; one belonged to Simon and Andrew, the other to Zebedee and his sons, ver. 2. At first Christ saw Peter and Andrew fishing at some distance, so Matthew tells us, Mat. iv. 18; but he waited until they came to land, and until the fishermen, that is the servants, were gone out of them, having washed their nets and thrown them by for that time; so Christ entered into that ship that belonged to Simon, and begged of him that he would lend it him for a pulpit; and though he might have commanded him, yet, for love's sake, he rather "prayed him that he would thrust out a little from the land," which would be the worse for his being heard; but Christ would have it so, that he might the better be seen; and it is his being lifted up that draws men to him. Wisdom cries in the top of high places, Pr. viii. 2. It intimates that Christ had a strong voice,—strong indeed, for he made the dead to hear it,—and that he did not desire to favour himself. There "he sat down, and taught the people" the good knowledge of the Lord.

III. What a particular acquaintance Christ hereupon fell into with these fishermen. They had had some conversation with him before, which began at John's baptism, Jno. i. 40, 41; they were with him at Cana of Galilee, Jno. ii. 2; and in Judaea, Jno. iv. 2; but as yet they were not called to attend him constantly, and therefore here we have them at their calling; and now it was that they were called into a more intimate fellowship with Christ.

First. When Christ had done preaching, he ordered Peter to apply himself to the business of his calling again: "Launch out into the deep, and let down your nets," ver. 4. It was not the sabbath day; and therefore, as soon as the lecture was over, he set them to work. Time spent on week days in the public exercises of religion may be but little hindrance to us in time, and a great furtherance to us in temper of mind in our worldly business. With what cheerfulness may we go about the duties of our calling, when we have been in the mount with God, and from thence fetch a double blessing into our worldly employments,

v. 1. It has been questioned whether the occurrence recorded in the first eleven verses of this chapter is the same as that in Matt. iv. 18—22, Mark i. 16—20, or whether it is different and subsequent. The question is not easily settled, and the names of eminent critics appear on both sides.

v. 2. The washing of the nets after the fishermen had come ashore from their toil is one of those minute incidents which reveal the accuracy of the record. The boats were "standing," or, as we should say, lying close in shore, and had apparently been anchored, or otherwise made fast.

v. 5. From this verse we infer that it was morning. According to a common custom fishing operations had been carried on at night. "There are certain kinds of fishing always carried on at night," Dr. Thomson says. "It is a beautiful sight. With blazing torch, the boat glides over the flashing sea, and the men stand gazing keenly into it until their prey is sighted, when, quick as lightning, they and thus have them sanctified to us by the word and prayer. It is our wisdom and duty so to manage our religious exercises as that they may befriender our worldly business, and so to manage our worldly business as that it may be no enemy to our religious exercises.

Secondly, Peter having attended upon Christ in his preaching, Christ will accompany him in his fishing; he stayed with Christ at the shore, and now Christ will launch out with him into the deep. Note, Those that will be constant followers of Christ shall have him a constant guide to them.

Thirdly, Christ orders Peter and his ship's crew to "cast their net into the sea," which they do in obedience to him, though they had been hard at it all night, and had caught nothing, ver. 4, 5. We may observe here,

1. How melancholy their business had now been: "Master, we have toiled all the night," when we should have been asleep in our beds, "and have taken nothing," but have had our labour for our pains. One would have thought that should have excused them from hearing the sermon; but such a love had they to the Word of God, that it was more refreshing and reviving to them, after a wearisome night, than the softest slumbers. But they mention it to Christ when he bids them go a fishing again.

Note, 1st. Some callings are much more toilsome than others, and more perilous; yet Providence has so ordered it, for the common good, that there is no useful calling so discouraging but some or other have a genius for it. Those that follow their business, and get abundance by it with a great deal of ease, should think with compassion of those who cannot follow theirs but with a great fatigue, and hardly get a bare livelihood by it. When we have rested all night, let us not forget those who have "toiled all night," as Jacob when he kept Laban's sheep. 2nd. Be the calling never so laborious, it is good to see people diligent in it, and make the best of it. These fishermen that were thus industrious Christ singled out for his favourites; they were fit to be preferred, as good soldiers of Jesus Christ, that had thus learned to endure hardness. 3rd. Even those that are most diligent in their business yet often meet with disappointments; they that "toiled all night yet caught nothing;" for the race is not always to the swift. God will have us to be diligent, purely in duty to his command, and dependence upon his goodness, rather than with an assurance of worldly success: we must do our duty, and then leave the event to God. 4th. When we are tired with our worldly business, and crossed in our worldly affairs, we are welcome to come to Christ and spread our case before him, who will take cognizance of it.

2. How ready their obedience was to the command of Christ: "nevertheless at thy word I will let down the net." 1st. Though they had toiled all night, yet if Christ bid them, they will renew their toil, for they know that they that wait on him shall renew their strength, as work is renewed upon their hands; for every fresh service they shall have a fresh supply of grace sufficient. 2nd. Though they have taken nothing, yet if Christ bid them let down for a draught, they will hope to take something. Note, We must not presently quit the callings wherewith we are called, because we have not the success in them we promised ourselves. The ministers of the Gospel must continue to let down that net, though they have perhaps toiled long and caught nothing; and this is thankworthy, to continue unwearied in our labours, though we see not the success of them. 3rd. In this they have an eye to the word of Christ, and a dependence upon that; "at thy word I will let down the net," because thou dost enjoin it, and thou dost encourage it. We are then likely to speed well, when we follow the conduct of Christ's word.

Fourthly. The draught of fish they caught was so much beyond what was ever known, that it amounted to a miracle, ver. 6. They "enclosed a great multitude of fishes," so that "their net brake;" and yet, which is strange, they did not lose their draught. It was so great a draught that they had not hands enough to draw it up; but they were fain to beckon to their partners, who were at a distance, out of call, to come and help them, ver. 7. But the greatest evidence of the vastness of the draught was, that they filled both the ships with fish to that degree that they overloaded them, and they began to sink, so that the fish had like to have been lost again with their own weight; as many an overgrown estate, raised out of the water, returns to the place from whence it came. Suppose these ships were but five or six tons apiece, what a vast quantity of fish must there be to load, nay to overload, them both.

Now by this vast draught of fishes, 1. Christ intended to shew his dominion in the seas as well as on the dry land—over its wealth as over its waves; thus he would shew that he was that Son of man under whose feet all things were put, and particularly "the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas," Ps. viii. 8. 2. He intended hereby to confirm the doctrine he had just now preached out of Peter's ship. We may suppose that the people on the shore, who heard the sermon, having a notion that the preacher was a prophet sent of God, carefully attended his motions afterwards, and stayed halting about there, to see what he would do next; and this miracle immediately following would be a confirmation to their faith of his being at least a teacher come from God. 3. He intended hereby to repay Peter for the loan of his boat; for Christ's Gospel now, as his ark formerly in the house of Obed-Edom, will be sure to make amends, rich amends, for its kind entertainment. None shall shut a door or kindle a fire in God's house for nought, Mal. i. 10. Christ's recomences for services done to his name are abundant—they are superabundant. 4. He intended hereby to give a specimen to those who were to be his ambassadors to the world, of the success of their embassy, that though they might for a time, and in one particular place, toil and catch nothing, yet that they should be instrumental to bring in many to Christ, and enclose many in the Gospel net.

Fifthly. The impression which this miraculous draught of fishes made upon Peter was very remarkable.

1. All concerned were astonished, and the more astonished for their being concerned. All the boat's crew were astonished "at the draught of fishes which they had taken," ver. 9; they were all surprised; and the more they considered it, and all the circumstances of it, the more they were wonder-struck, I had almost said thunder-struck, at the thought of it; "and so were also James and John, which were partners with Simon," ver. 10; and who, for aught appears, were not so well acquainted with Christ before this as Peter and Andrew were. Now they were the more affected with it,

1st. Because they understood it better than others did; they that were well acquainted with this sea, and it is likely had plied upon it many years, had never seen such a draught of fishes fetched out of it, nor any like it, any thing near it, and therefore could not be tempted to diminish it, as others might, by suggesting that it was accidental at this time, and what might as well have happened at any time. It greatly corroborates the evidence of Christ's miracles, that those who were best acquainted with them most admired them.

2nd. Because they were most interested in it, and benefited by it. Peter and his part owners were gainers by this great draught of fishes; it was a rich booty for them, and therefore it transported them, and their joy was a helper to their faith. Note, When Christ's works of wonder are to us in particular works of grace, then especially they command our faith in his doctrine.

filing their net or fly their spear; and often you see the tired fisherman come sullenly into harbour in the morning, having toiled all night in vain.

v. 6. For "their net brake" some read and render, "their nets were bursting." The expression means that the nets were too full to be hauled in, and perhaps that they had already begun to give way. "It naturally denotes only the beginning of such a catastrophe." The nets now used are of different kinds. One resembles our cast-

2. Peter, above all the rest, was astonished to such a degree, that "he fell down at Jesus' knees," as he sat in the stern of the boat, and said, as one in an ecstasy or transport, that knew not where he was, or what he said, "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord," ver. 8; not that he feared the weight of the fish would sink him because he was a sinful man, but that he thought himself unworthy of the favour of Christ's presence in his boat, and worthy that it should be to him a matter rather of terror than of comfort. This word of Peter's came from the same principle with theirs that, under the Old Testament, so often said they did exceedingly fear and quake at the extraordinary displays of the Divine glory and majesty. It was the language of Peter's humility and self-denial, and had not the least tincture of the devil's dialect. "What have we to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of God!"

1st. His acknowledgment was very just, and what becomes us all to make "I am a sinful man, O Lord." Note, Even the best men are sinful men, and should be ready upon all occasions to own it, and especially to own it to Jesus Christ; for to whom else but to him who came into the world to save sinners should sinful men apply themselves? 2nd. His inference from it was what might have been just, though really it was not so. If I be a sinful man, as indeed I am, I ought to say, Come to me, O Lord, or, let me come to thee, or I am undone, for ever undone. But considering what reason sinful men have to tremble before the holy Lord God, and to dread his wrath, Peter may well be excused, if in a sense of his own sinfulness and vileness, he cry out on a sudden, "Depart from me." Note, Those whom Christ designs to admit to the most intimate acquaintance with him, he first makes sensible that they deserve to be set at the greatest distance from him. We must all own ourselves sinful men, and that therefore Jesus Christ might justly depart from us; but we must therefore fall down at his knees, to pray him that he would not depart; for woe unto us if he leave us—if the Saviour depart from the sinful man.

Sixthly. The occasion which Christ took from hence to intimate to Peter, ver. 10, and soon after to James and John, Mat. iv. 21, his purpose to make them his apostles, and instruments of planting his religion in the world. "He said unto Simon," who was in the greatest surprise of any of them at this prodigious draught of fishes, Thou shalt both see and do greater things than these; "fear not," let not this astonish thee; be not afraid, that after having done thee this honour, it is so great that I shall never do thee more: no, "from henceforth thou shalt catch men," by inclosing them in the Gospel net, and that shall be a greater instance of the Redeemer's power, and his favour to thee, than this is; that shall be a more astonishing miracle, and infinitely more advantageous than this. When by Peter's preaching three thousand souls were in one day added to the church, then the type of this great draught of fishes was abundantly answered.

Lastly. The fishermen's farewell to their calling, in order to their constant attendance on Christ, ver. 11: "When they had brought their ships to land," instead of going to seek for a market for their fish, that they might make the best hand they could of this miracle, "they forsook all, and followed him," being more solicitous to serve the interests of Christ than to advance any secular interests of their own. It is observable that they left all to follow Christ when their calling prospered in their hands more than ever it had done, and they had had uncommon success in it. When riches increase, and we are therefore most in temptation to set our hearts upon them, then to quit them for the service of Christ, this is thankworthy.

12 And it came to pass, when he was in a certain city, behold a man full of leprosy: who seeing Jesus fell on his face, and besought him, saying, Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean. 13 And he put forth his hand, and touched him, saying, I will: be thou clean. And immediately the leprosy departed from him. 14 And he charged him to tell no man: but go, and shew thyself to the priest, and offer for thy cleansing, according as Moses commanded, for a testimony unto them. 15 But so much the more went there a fame abroad of him: and great multitudes came together to hear, and to be healed by him of their infirmities. 16 And he withdrew himself into the wilderness, and prayed.

Here is, I. The cleansing of a leper, ver. 12-14. This story we had both in Matthew and Mark. It is here said to have been "in a certain city," ver. 12 it was in Capernaum; but the evangelist would not name it, perhaps because it was a reflection upon the government of the city, that a leper was suffered to be in it. This man is said to be "full of leprosy;" he had that distemper in a high degree, which doth the more fitly represent our natural pollution by sin: we are full of that leprosy; from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot, there is no soundness in us. Now let us learn here,

First. What we must do in the sense of our spiritual leprosy. 1. We must see Jesus, inquire after him, and acquaint ourselves with him, and reckon the discoveries made us of Christ by the Gospel the most acceptable and welcome discoveries that could be made us. 2. We must humble ourselves before him, as this leper, seeing Jesus, "fell on his face." We must be ashamed of our pollution, and in the sense of it, blush to lift up our faces before the holy Jesus. 3. We must earnestly desire to be cleansed from the defilement, and cured of the disease of sin, which renders us unfit for communion with God. 4. We must firmly believe Christ's ability and sufficiency to cleanse us; "Lord, thou canst make me clean," though I be full of leprosy; no doubt is to be made of the merit and grace of Christ. 5. We must be importunate in prayer for pardoning mercy and renewing grace; "he fell on his face and besought him;" they that would be cleansed must reckon it a favour worth wrestling for. 6. We must refer ourselves to the good will of Christ: "Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst." This is not so much the language of his diffidence, or distrust of the good will of Christ, as of his submission, and reference of himself and his case to the will, to the good will of Jesus Christ.

Secondly. What we may expect from Christ, if we thus apply ourselves to net, being leaved and thrown into the water over a shoal of fish, and then drawn in by the line which the fisherman holds. Another is a long drag-net, one end of which is held on shore, and the other taken round by the men in a boat. The whole is then drawn to land with whatever it may enclose. Again, there is a kind of bag-net made for catching fish in deep water. This last is probably the sort of net with which Peter and his friends were provided on the occasion before us him. 1. We shall find him very condescending, and forward to take cognizance of our case, ver. 13: "he put forth his hand, and touched him." When Christ visited 'his leprous world, unasked, unsought unto, he shewed how low he could stoop to do good. His touching the leper was wonderful condescension; but it is much greater to us when he is himself "touched with the feeling of our infirmities." 2. We shall find him very compassionate, and ready to relieve us; he said, "I will," never doubt of that; whosoever comes to me to be healed, "I will in no wise cast out;" he is as willing to cleanse leprous souls, as they can be to be cleansed. 3. We shall find him all-sufficient, and able to heal and cleanse us, though we be never so full of this loathsome leprosy. One word, one touch from Christ did the business, "immediately the leprosy departed from him." If Christ saith, "I will, be thou justified, be thou sanctified," it is done; for he has power on earth to forgive sin, and power to give the Holy Spirit, 1 Cor. vi. 11.

Thirdly. What he requires from those that are cleansed, ver. 14. Has Christ sent his word and healed us? 1. We must be very humble, ver. 12: "he charged him to tell no man." It should seem this did not forbid him telling it to the honour of Christ, but he must not tell it to his own honour. Those whom Christ hath healed and cleansed, must know that he hath done it in such a way as doth for ever exclude boasting. 2. We must be very thankful, and make a grateful acknowledgment of the Divine grace; "Go, and offer for thy cleansing," Christ did not require him to give him a fee, but bring the sacrifice of praise to God; so far was he from using his power to the prejudice of the law of Moses. 3. We must keep close to our duty; "go to the priest," and those that attend him. The man whom Christ had made whole he found in the temple, Jno. v. 14. Those that by any affliction have been detained from public ordinances, when the affliction is removed, should attend on them the more diligently, and adhere to them the more constantly.

II. Christ's public serviceableness to men, and his private communion with God; these are put together here to give lustre to each other.

First. Though never any had so much pleasure in his retirements as Christ had, yet he was much in a crowd to do good, ver. 15. Though the leper should altogether hold his peace, yet the thing could not be hid, "so much the more went there a fame abroad of him;" the more he sought to conceal himself, under a veil of humility, the more notice did people take of him; for honour is like a shadow, which flees from those that pursue it,—"for a man to seek his own glory, is not glory,"—but it follows those that decline it, and draw from it. The less good men say of themselves, the more will others say of them. But Christ reckoned it a small honour to him that his fame went abroad; it was much more so, that hereby multitudes were brought to receive benefit from him. 1. By his preaching; "they came together to hear him," and to receive instruction from him concerning the kingdom of God. 2. By his miracles; they "came to be healed by him of their infirmities," and that invited them to come to hear him, confirmed his doctrine, and recommended it.

Secondly. Though never any did so much good in public, yet he found time for pious and devout retirements, ver. 16: "He withdrew himself into the wilderness, and prayed;" not that he needed to avoid either distraction or ostentation, but he would set us an example, who need to order the circumstances of our devotion so as to guard against both. It is likewise our wisdom so to order our affairs as that our public work, and our secret work, may not intrench upon or interfere with one another. Note. Secret prayer must be performed secretly; and those that have never so much to do of the best business in this world, must keep up constant, stated times for it.

17 And it came to pass on a certain day, as he was teaching, that there were Pharisees and doctors of the law sitting by, which were come out of every town of Galilee, and Judæa, and Jerusalem: and the power of the Lord was present to heal them. 18 And, behold, men brought in a bed a man which was taken with a palsy: and they sought means to bring him in, and to lay him before him. 19 And when they could not find by what way they might bring him in because of the multitude, they went upon the housetop, and let him down through the tiling with his couch into the midst before Jesus. 20 And when he saw their faith, he said unto him, Man, thy sins are forgiven thee. 21 And the scribes and the Pharisees began to reason, saying, Who is this which speaketh blasphemies? Who can forgive sins, but God alone? 22 But when Jesus perceived their thoughts, he answering said unto them, What reason ye in your hearts? 23 Whether is easier, to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Rise up and walk? 24 But that ye may know that the Son of man hath power upon earth to forgive sins, (he said unto the sick of the palsy,) I say unto thee, Arise, and take up thy couch, and go into thine house. 25 And immediately he rose up before them, and took up that whereon he lay, and departed to his own house, glorifying God. 26 And they were all amazed, and they glorified God, and were filled with fear, saying, We have seen strange things to day.

COVERED GALLERIES OF AN EASTERN HOUSE.—ver. 19.

Here is, I. A general account of Christ's preaching and miracles, ver. 17. First. He was teaching on a certain day, not on the sabbath day, then he would have said so, but on a week day; "six days shalt thou labour," not only for the world, but for the soul, and the welfare of that. Preaching and hearing the word of God is good work, if it be done well, any day in the week, as well as on sabbath days. It was not in the synagogue, but in a private house; for even there, where we ordinarily converse with our friends, it is not improper to give and receive good instruction.

Secondly. There he taught, he healed, as before, ver. 15; and the power of the Lord was to heal them, ἡ ἐν αὐτῷ δύναμις; it was mighty to heal them, it was exerted and put forth to heal them; to heal them whom he taught; (we may understand it so); to heal their souls, to cure them of their spiritual diseases, and to give them a new life, a new nature. Note. Those who receive the word of Christ in faith, will find a Divine power going along with that word to heal them; for Christ came with his comforts to heal the broken hearted, ch. iv. 18. The power of the Lord is present with the Word, present to those that pray for it, and submit to it, present to heal them; or it may be meant (and so it is generally taken) of the healing of those that were diseased in body, who came to him for cures. Whenever there was occasion, Christ was not to seek for his power, it was present to heal.

Thirdly. There were some grandees present in this assembly, and as it should seem, more than usual; "there were Pharisees and doctors of the law sitting by," not sitting at his feet to learn of him, then I should have been willing to take the following clause as referring to them, who were spoken of immediately before, "the power of the Lord was present to heal them," and why might not the word of Christ reach their hearts? But by what follows, ver. 21, it appears they were not healed, but cavilled at Christ, which forceth us to make that to refer to others, not to them; for they sat by, as persons unconcerned, as if the word of Christ were nothing to them. They sat by as spectators, and censors, and spies, to pick up something on which to ground a reproach, or accusation. How many are there in the midst of our assemblies, where the Gospel is preached, that do not sit under the Word, but sit by? It is to them as a tale that is told them, not as a message that is sent them; they are willing we should preach before them, not that we should preach to them. These Pharisees and scribes (or doctors of the law) "came out of every town of Galilee, and Judæa, and Jerusalem" they came from all parts of the nation; it is likely they appointed to meet at this time and place, to see what remarks they could make upon Christ, and what he said and did. They were in a confederacy, as those that said, "Come, and let us devise devices against Jeremiah," and agree to "smite him with the tongue," Jer. xviii. 18; "Report, and we will report it," Jer. xx. 10. Observe, Christ went on with his work of preaching and healing, though he saw these Pharisees and Dons of the Jewish church sitting by, who he knew despised him, and watched to ensnare him.

II. A particular account of the cure of the man sick of the palsy, which was related much as it is here, by both the foregoing evangelists; let us therefore only observe in short,

First. The doctrines that are taught us, and confirmed to us by the story of this cure. 1. That sin is the fountain of all sickness, and the forgiveness of sin is the only foundation upon which a recovery from sickness can comfortably be built. They presented the sick man to Christ, and he said, "Man, thy sins are forgiven thee," ver. 20. That is the blessing thou art most to prize and seek; for if thy sins be forgiven thee, though the sickness be continued, it is in mercy; if they be not, though the sickness be removed, it is in wrath. They are the cords of our iniquity, that are the bands of our affliction. 2. That Jesus Christ has power on earth to forgive sins, and his healing diseases was an incontestable proof of it: this was the thing intended to be proved, ver. 24: "That ye may know" and believe "that the Son of man," though now upon earth, in his state of humiliation, "hath power to forgive sins," and to release sinners upon gospel terms from the eternal punishment of sin," he saith to the sick of the palsy, Arise and walk," and he is cured immediately. Christ claims one of the prerogatives of the King of kings, when he undertakes to forgive

v. 12. Avicenna speaks of leprosy as a sort of universal cancer of the whole body. The traveller Maundrell describes it as a distemper so noisome, that it might well pass for the utmost corruption of the human body on this side the grave. Dr. Thomson says, "There is nothing in the entire range of human phenomena which illustrates so impressively the Divine power of the Redeemer, and the nature and extent of his work of mercy on man's behalf, as this leprous." We may gather from such language what "full of leprosy" means.

v. 17. The interesting details of this verse are peculiar to Luke. Mark intimates (chap. ii. 1, 2) that the house was crowded, but here we see that it was no common assembly—Pharisees, whose zeal was genuine, even if misguided in many things; teachers of the law, whose studies and profession were mainly devoted to religious matters. They had assembled from the villages of Galilee, and from Judæa, and from Jerusalem itself. Our version seems to suggest that the Pharisees and doctors came to be healed, but this is im-sin, and it is justly expected he should produce a good proof it: 'Well,' saith he, 'I will put it upon this issue; here is a man struck with a palsy, and for his sin, if I do not with a word's speaking cure his disease in an instant, which cannot be done by nature or art, but purely by the immediate power and efficacy of the God of nature, then say I am not entitled to the prerogative of forgiving sin, am not the Messiah, am not the Son of God, and King of Israel; but if I do, you must own I have power to forgive sins.' Thus was it put upon a fair trial, and one word of Christ determined it. He did but say, 'Arise, take up thy couch,' and that chronic disease had an instantaneous cure, 'immediately he arose before them;' they must all own there could be no cheat or fallacy in it; they that brought him could attest how perfectly lame he was before; they that saw him, could attest how perfectly well he was now; inasmuch that he had strength enough to take up and carry away the bed he lay upon. How well is it for us, that this most comfortable doctrine of the Gospel, that Jesus Christ, our Redeemer and Saviour, has power to forgive sin, has such a full attestation. 3. That Jesus Christ is God. He appears to be so, 1st. By knowing the thoughts of the scribes and Pharisees, ver. 22, which it is God's prerogative to do; though those scribes and Pharisees knew as well how to conceal their thoughts, and keep their countenances as most men, and probably were industrious to do it at this time, for they lay in wait secretly. 2nd. By doing that which their thoughts owned none could do but God only, ver. 21. 'Who can forgive sins,' say they, 'but only God?' 'I will prove,' saith Christ, 'that I can forgive sins; and what follows then, but that he is God? What horrid wickedness then were they guilty of, who charged him with speaking the worst of blasphemies then when he spoke the best of blessings, "Thy sins be forgiven thee!"'

Secondly. The duties that are taught us, and recommended to us, by this story: 1. In our applications to Christ, we must be very pressing and urgent; that is an evidence of faith, and is very pleasing to Christ, and prevailing with him. They that were the friends of this sick man, 'sought means to bring him in before Christ,' ver. 23, and when they were baffled in their endeavour, yet did not give up the cause; but when they could not get in by the door, it was so crowded, they untiled the house, and let the poor patient down through the roof, 'into the midst before Jesus,' ver. 19: in this Jesus Christ 'saw their faith,' ver. 19. Now here he has taught us (and it were well if we could learn the lesson) to put the best construction upon words and actions that they will bear. When the centurion, and the woman of Canaan, were in no care at all to bring the patients they interceded for into Christ's presence, but believed that he could cure them at a distance, he commended their faith. But though in these there seemed to be a different notion of the thing, and an apprehension that it was requisite the patient should be brought into his presence, yet he did not censure and condemn their weakness; did not ask them, 'What need you give this disturbance to the assembly? Are you under such a degree of infidelity, as to think I could not have cured him though he had been out of doors?' but he made the best of it, and even in this he saw their faith. It is a comfort to us that we serve a Master that is willing to make the best of us. 2. When we are sick, we should be more in care to get our sins pardoned than to get our sickness removed. Christ, in what he said to this man, taught us when we seek to God for health, to begin with seeking to him for pardon. 3. The mercies which we have the comfort of, God must have the praise of. The man 'departed to his own house, glorifying God,' ver. 25. To him belong the escapes from death, and in them therefore he must be glorified. 4. The miracles which Christ wrought were amazing to them that saw them, and we ought to glorify God in them, ver. 26. They said, 'We have seen strange things to-day,' such as we never saw before, nor our fathers before us, they are altogether new. But they glorified God, who had sent into their country such a benefactor to it; and were filled with fear, with a reverence of God, with a jealousy that this was the Messiah, and that he was not treated by their nation as he ought to be, which might prove in the end the ruin of their state; perhaps they were some such thoughts as these that filled them with fear, and a concern likewise for themselves.

27 And after these things he went forth, and saw a publican, named Levi, sitting at the receipt of custom: and he said unto him, Follow me. 28 And he left all, rose up, and followed him. 29 And Levi made him a great feast in his own house: and there was a great company of publicans and of others that sat down with them. 30 But their scribes and Pharisees murmured against his disciples, saying, Why do ye eat and drink with publicans and sinners? 31 And Jesus answering said unto them, They that are whole need not a physician; but they that are sick. 32 I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance. 33 And they said unto him, Why do the disciples of John fast often, and make prayers, and likewise the disciples of the Pharisees; but thine eat and drink? 34 And he said unto them, Can ye make the children of the bride-chamber fast, while the bridegroom is with them? 35 But the days will come, when the bridegroom shall be taken away from them, and then shall they fast in those days. 36 And he spake also a parable unto them; No man putteth a piece of a new garment upon an old; if otherwise, then both the new maketh a rent, and the piece that was taken out of the new agreeth not with the old. 37 And no man putteth new wine into old bottles; else the new wine will burst the bottles, and be spilled, and the bottles shall perish. 38 But new wine must be put into new bottles; and both are preserved. 39 No man also having drunk old wine straightway desireth new: for he saith, The old is better.

All this, except the last verse, we had before in Matthew and Mark; it is not the story of any miracle in nature, wrought by our Lord Jesus, but it is an account of some of the wonders of his grace, which to those who understand things aright, are no less cogent proofs of Christ's being sent of God than the other.

I. It was a wonder of his grace, that he would call a publican from the receipt of custom to be his disciple and follower, ver. 27. It was wonderful condescension that he would admit poor fishermen to that honour, men of the lowest rank; but much more wonderful that he would admit publicans, men of the worst reputation, men of ill fame. In this Christ humbled himself, and appeared in the likeness of sinful flesh; by this he exposed himself, and got the invidious character of a friend of publicans and sinners.

II. It was a wonder of his grace, that that call was made effectual, became immediately so, ver. 28. This publican, though those of that employment commonly had little inclination to religion, yet, for his religion's sake, he left a good place in the custom-house, which probably was his livelihood, and where he stood fair for better preferment, and 'rose up and followed Christ.' There is no heart too hard for the Spirit and grace of Christ to work upon, nor any difficulties in the way of a sinner's conversion insuperable to his power.

III. It was a wonder of his grace, that he would not only admit a converted publican into his family, but would keep company with unconverted publicans, that he might have an opportunity of doing their souls good; and justified himself in it, as agreeing with the great design of his coming into the world. Here is a wonder of grace indeed, that Christ undertakes to be the physician of souls distempered by sin, and ready to die of the distemper, ver. 31, (he is a healer by office) that he has a particular regard to the sick, to sinners as his patients, convinced, awakened sinners, that see their need of the physician: that he came to call sinners, the worst of sinners, to repentance, and to assure them of pardon upon repentance, ver. 32. This is glad tidings of great joy indeed.

IV. It was a wonder of his grace, that he did so patiently bear 'the contradiction of sinners against himself' and his disciples, ver. 30. He did not express his resentments of the cavils of the scribes and Pharisees, as he justly might have done, but answered them with reason and meekness; and instead of taking that occasion to shew his displeasure against the Pharisees, as afterwards he did, or of recriminating upon them, he took that occasion to shew his compassion to poor publicans, another sort of sinners, and to encourage them.

V. It was a wonder of his grace, that in the discipline which he trained his disciples up under, he considered their frame, and proportioned their services to their strength and standing, and to the circumstances they were in. It was objected, as a blemish upon his conduct, that he did not make his disciples to fast so often as those of the Pharisees and John Baptist did, ver. 33. He insisted most upon that which is the soul of fasting, the mortification of sin, the crucifying of the flesh, and living a life of self-denial, which is as much better than fasting and corporal penances as mercy is than sacrifice.

VI. It was a wonder of his grace, that Christ reserved the trials of his disciples for their latter times, when, by his grace, they were in some good measure better prepared and fitted for them than they were at first. Now they were as 'the children of the bridechamber, when the bridegroom is with them,' when they have plenty, and joy, and every day is a festival; Christ was welcomed wherever he came, and they for his sake, and as yet they met with little or no opposition; but this will not last always, 'the days will come when the bridegroom shall be taken away from them,' ver. 35; when Christ shall leave them with their hearts full of sorrow, their hands full of work, and the world full of enmity and rage against them; 'then shall they fast,' shall not be so well fed as they are now: 'We both hunger and thirst, and are naked,' 1 Cor. iv. 11. Then they shall keep many more religious fasts than they do now, for Providence will call them to it: they will then serve the Lord with fastings, Acts xiii. 2.

VII. It was a wonder of his grace, that he proportioned their exercises to their strength. He would not 'put new cloth unto an old garment,' ver. 36, nor 'new wine into old bottles,' ver. 37, 38; would not, as soon as ever he had called them out of the world put them upon the strictness and austerities of discipleship, lest they should be tempted to fly off. When God brought Israel out of Egypt, he would not bring them by the way of the Philistines, lest they should repent when they saw war, and return into Egypt, Ex. xiii. 17; so Christ would train up his followers gradually to the discipline of his family; for no man having drunk old wine, will of a sudden straightway desire new, or relish it, but will say, 'The old is better,' because he has been used to it, ver. 39. The disciples will be tempted to think their old way of living better, till they are by degrees trained up to this way whereunto they are called. Or, turn it the other way; let them be accustomed awhile to religious exercises, and then they will abound in them as much as you do; but we must not be too hasty with them. Calvin takes it as an admonition to the Pharisees, not to boast of their fasting, and the noise and show they made with it, nor to despise his disciples, because they did not in like manner signalize themselves; for the profession the Pharisees made was indeed pompous and gay, like new wine, that is brisk and sparkling, whereas all wise men say the old is better, which, though it doth not give its colour so well in the cup, yet is more warming in the stomach, and more wholesome. Christ's disciples, though they had not so much of the form of godliness, yet they had more of the power of it.

CHAPTER VI.

In this chapter we have Christ's exposition of the moral law, which he came not to destroy, but to fulfil, and to fill up, by his Gospel. I. Here is a proof of the lawfulness of works of necessity and mercy on the sabbath day: the former, in vindication of his disciples' plucking the ears of corn; the latter, in vindication of himself healing the withered hand on that day, ver. 1-11. II. His retirement for secret prayer, ver. 12. III. His calling his twelve apostles, ver. 13-16. IV. His curing the multitudes of those under various diseases, who made their application to him, ver. 17-19. V. The sermon that he preached to his disciples and the multitude, instructing them in their duty both to God and man, ver. 20-49.

probable; they rather came to see the manifestations of his healing power, and to hear his words for themselves. In accordance with this view, we find that the word 'them' is omitted by the Sinaitic and Vatican MSS. 'The power of the Lord was present to heal,' or shown in healing.

v. 18. Celsus says, 'They who are attacked with violent palsy of all the limbs are usually carried off quickly, or if not, though their lives are prolonged, they seldom recover their health, but linger out a miserable existence, and also lose their memory. The illness of those who are locally attacked is never, indeed, violent, but often tedious, and almost always incurable.'

v. 19. See the note on Mark ii. 4. The difficulty raised by this passage is in the word rendered 'tiling.' The original word is explained to mean: 1, potter's clay; 2, any earthen vessel; 3, a tile. At present, Dr. Kitto says, the roofs of Oriental houses have no tiling; but of course tiles may have been used in ancient times,

AND it came to pass on the second sabbath after the first, that he went through the corn fields; and his disciples plucked the ears of corn, and did eat, rubbing them in their hands. 2 And certain of the Pharisees said unto them, Why do ye that which is not lawful to do on the sabbath days? 3 And Jesus answering them said, Have ye not read so much as this, what David did, when himself was an hungred, and they which were with him; 4 How he went into the house of God, and did take and eat the shewbread, and gave also to them that were with him; which it is not lawful to eat but for the priests alone? 5 And he said unto them, That the Son of man is Lord also of the sabbath. 6 And it came to pass also on another sabbath, that he entered into the synagogue and taught: and there was a man whose right hand was withered. 7 And the scribes and Pharisees watched him, whether he would heal on the sabbath day; that they might find an accusation against him. 8 But he knew their thoughts, and said to the man which had the withered hand, Rise up, and stand forth in the midst. And he arose and stood forth. 9 Then said Jesus unto them, I will ask you one thing; Is it lawful on the sabbath days to do good, or to do evil? to save life, or to destroy it? 10 And looking round about upon them all, he said unto the man, Stretch forth thy hand. And he did so: and his hand was restored whole as the other. 11 And they were filled with madness; and communed one with another what they might do to Jesus.

These two passages of story we had both in Matthew and Mark, and they were there laid together, Matt. xii. 1; Mar. ii. 23; iii. 1; because, though happening at some distance of time from each other, yet both were designed to rectify the mistakes of the scribes and Pharisees concerning the sabbath day, on the bodily rest of which they laid greater stress, and required greater strictness, than the Lawgiver intended. Here,

First, Christ justifies his disciples in a work of necessity for themselves on that day, and that was plucking the ears of corn when they were hungry on that day. This story here has a date, which we had not in the other evangelists, it was "on the second sabbath after the first," ver. 1; that is, as Dr. Whitby thinks is pretty clear, "the first sabbath after the second day of unleavened bread," from which day they reckoned the seven weeks to the feast of pentecost, the first of which they called Σάββατον δευτεροπρωτον, the second δευτεροδευτερον, and so on. Blessed be God, we need not be critical in this matter; whether this circumstance be mentioned to intimate that this sabbath was thought to have some peculiar honour upon it, which aggravated the offence of the disciples, or only to intimate, that being the first sabbath after the offering of the firstfruits, it was the time of the year when corn was near ripe, is not material. We may observe,

1. Christ's disciples ought not to be nice and curious in their diet, not at any time, especially not on sabbath days; but take up with what is easiest got, and be thankful. These disciples "plucked the ears of corn, and did eat," ver. 1; a little served them, and that which had no delicacy in it.

2. Many that are themselves guilty of the greatest crimes, are forward to censure others for the most innocent and inoffensive actions, ver. 2. The Pharisees quarrelled with them as doing that which it was "not lawful to do on the sabbath days," when it was their own practice to feed deliciously on sabbath days, more than on all other days.

3. Jesus Christ will justify his disciples when they are unjustly censured, and will own and accept of them in many a thing, which men tell them it is not lawful for them to do. How well is it for us that men are not to be our judges, and that Christ will be our advocate!

4. Ceremonial appointments may be dispensed with in cases of necessity: as the appropriating of the shewbread to the priests was dispensed with, when David was, by Providence, brought into such a strait that he must either have that or none, ver. 3, 4. And if God's own appointments might be thus set aside for a greater good, much more may the traditions of men.

5. Works of necessity are particularly allowable on the sabbath day; but we must take heed that we turn not this liberty into licentiousness, and abuse and especially under the Roman government, though we are not bound to such a conclusion. On the whole, we should not press the literal sense of the word, but understand it of the portion which was removed, whatever the material might be. The Peshito-Syriac version, which so often gives the true sense, renders the clause, "they let him down with his bed from the roof into the midst before Jesus," using the same word for "roof" as in Mark ii. 4. The other Syriac version has, "from the roof of tiles."

God's favourable concessions and condescensions, to the prejudice of the work of the day.

6. Jesus Christ, though he allowed works of necessity on the sabbath day, yet will have us to know, and remember, that it is his day, and therefore is to be spent in his service, and to his honour, ver. 5: "The Son of man is Lord also of the sabbath;" that is, in the kingdom of the Redeemer, the sabbath day is to be turned into a Lord's day; the property of it is, in some respects, to be altered, and it is to be observed chiefly in honour of the Redeemer, as it had been before in honour of the Creator, (Jer. xvi. 14, 15,) and in token of this, it shall not only have a new name, the Lord's day, (yet not forgetting the old, for it is a sabbath of rest still,) but shall be transferred to a new day, the first day of the week.

Secondly, He justifies himself in doing works of mercy for others on the sabbath day. Observe in this,

1. That Christ on the sabbath day "entered into the synagogue." Note, It is our duty, as we have opportunity, to sanctify sabbaths in religious assemblies. On the sabbath there ought to be a holy convocation; and our place must not be empty without very good reason.

2. In the synagogue on the sabbath day he taught. Giving and receiving instruction from Christ is very proper work for a sabbath day, and for a synagogue. Christ took all opportunities to teach, not only his disciples, but the multitude.

3. That Christ's patient was one of his hearers. There was "a man whose right hand was withered," he came to learn from Christ; whether he had any expectation to be healed by him doth not appear; but those that would be cured by the grace of Christ, must be willing to learn the doctrine of Christ.

4. That among those that were the hearers of Christ's excellent doctrine, and the eye-witnesses of his glorious miracles, there were some who came with no other design but to pick quarrels with him, ver. 7. The scribes and Pharisees would not, as became generous adversaries, give him fair warning, that if he did heal on the sabbath day, they would construe it as a violation of the fourth commandment, which they ought in honour and justice to have done, because it was a case without precedent, none having ever cured as he did, and therefore could not be an adjudged case; but basely watched him, as the lion doth his prey, whether he would "heal on the sabbath day, that they might find an accusation against him," and surprise him with a prosecution.

5. That Jesus Christ was neither ashamed nor afraid to own the purposes of his grace, in the face of those who he knew confronted them, ver. 8. "He knew their thoughts," and what they designed, and he bid the man "rise and stand forth," hereby to try the patient's faith and boldness.

6. He appealed to his adversaries themselves, and to the convictions of natural conscience, whether it was the design of the fourth commandment to restrain men from doing good on the sabbath day, that good which their hand finds to do, which they have an opportunity for, and which cannot so well be put off to another time, ver. 9. "Is it lawful to do good or evil on the sabbath days?" No wicked men are such absurd and unreasonable men as persecutors are, who study to do evil to men for doing good.

7. He healed the poor man, and restored him to the present use of his right hand, with a word's speaking, though he knew his enemies would not only take offence at it, but take advantage against him for it, ver. 10. Let not us be drawn off, either from duty or usefulness, by the oppression we meet with in it.

8. His adversaries were hereby enraged so much the more against him, ver. 11; instead of being convinced by this miracle, as they ought to have been, that he was a teacher come from God; instead of being brought to be in love with him as a benefactor to mankind, "they were filled with madness," vexed that they could not frighten him from doing good, or hinder the growth of his interest in the affections of the people. They were mad at Christ, mad at the people, mad at themselves. Anger is a short madness, malice is a long one; impotent malice, especially disappointed malice, such was theirs. When they could not prevent his working this miracle, they "communed one with another what they might do to Jesus," what other way they might take to run him down. We may well stand amazed at it, that the sons of men should be so wicked as to do thus, and that the Son of God should be so patient as to suffer it.

12 And it came to pass in those days, that he went out into a mountain to pray, and continued all night in prayer to God. 13 And when it was day, he called unto him his disciples: and of them he chose twelve, whom also he named apostles; 14 Simon, (whom he also named Peter,) and Andrew his brother, James and John, Philip and Bartholomew, 15 Matthew and Thomas, James the son of Alphæus, and Simon called Zelotes, 16 And Judas the brother of James, and Judas Iscariot, which also was the traitor. 17 And he came down with them, and stood in the plain, and the company of his disciples, and a great multitude of people out of all Judæa and Jerusalem, and from the sea coast of Tyre and Sidon, which came to hear him, and to be healed of their diseases; 18 And they that were vexed with unclean spirits: and they were healed. 19 And the whole multitude sought to touch him: for there went virtue out of him, and healed them all.

In these verses we have our Lord Jesus in secret, in his family, and in public, and in all three acting like himself.

First, In secret we have him praying to God, ver. 12. This evangelist takes frequent notice of Christ's retirements, to give us an example of secret prayer, by which we must keep up our communion with God daily, and without which

v. 27. The Levi of this verse is called Levi the son of Alphæus in Mark ii. 14, and Matthew in Matt. ix. 9. It will be observed that the same person appears to be called Matthew in Mark iii. 18 and Luke vi. 15. It seems to have been quite common in those times for one person to have two names. One of these might be Greek or Latin, and the other Shemitic; or both, as in Matthew's case, might be Shemitic.

v. 32. The words "to repentance" are, according to the best

It is impossible the soul should prosper. "In those days," when his enemies were filled with madness against him, and were contriving what to do to him, he went out to pray, that he might answer the type of David, Ps. civ. 4. "For my love they are my adversaries, but I give myself unto prayer." Observe, 1. He was alone with God; "he went out into a mountain to pray," where he might have no disturbance or interruption given him: we are never less alone than when we are thus alone. Whether there was any convenient place built upon this mountain, for devout people to retire to for their private devotions, as some think, and that that oratory, or place of prayer, is meant here by ἐν τῇ προσευχῇ τοῦ Θεοῦ, to me seems very uncertain. He went into a mountain for privacy, and therefore probably would not go to a place frequented by others. 2. He was long alone with God; "he continued all night in prayer." We think one half hour a great deal to spend in the duties of the closet; but Christ continued a whole night in meditation and secret prayer. We have a great deal of business at the throne of grace, and we should take a great delight in communion with God, and by both these may be kept sometimes long at prayer.

Secondly, In his family we have him nominating his immediate attendants, that should be the constant auditors of his doctrines, and eye-witnesses of his miracles, that hereafter they might be sent forth as apostles, his messengers to the world, to preach his Gospel to it, and plant his church in it, ver. 13. After he had "continued all night in prayer" one would have thought that "when it was day" he should have refreshed himself, and got some sleep. No, as soon as any body was stirring, he "called unto him his disciples." In serving God, our great care should be not to lose time, but to make the end of one good duty the beginning of another. Ministers are to be ordained with prayer more than ordinarily solemn. The number of the apostles was twelve; their names are here recorded; and it is the third time we have met with them, and in each of the three places the order of them differs; to teach both ministers and Christians not to be nice in precedence, not in giving it, much less in taking it; but look upon it as a thing not worth taking notice of, let it be as it lights. He that in Mark was called Thaddeus, in Matthew Lebbeus, whose surname was Thaddeus, is here called Judas, the brother of James, the same that wrote the Epistle of Jude. Simon, that in Matthew and Mark was called the Canaanite, is here called Simon Zelotes, perhaps for his great zeal in religion. Concerning these twelve here named, we have reason to say, as the queen of Sheba did of Solomon's servants, "Happy are thy men, and happy are these thy servants, that stand continually before thee, and hear thy wisdom;" never were men so privileged, and yet one of them had a devil, and proved a traitor, ver. 16; yet Christ, when he chose him, was not deceived in him.

Thirdly, In public we have him preaching and healing, the two great works between which he divided his time, ver. 17: "He came down" with the twelve from the mountain, "and stood in the plain," ready to receive those that resorted to him; and there were presently gathered about him, not only "the company of his disciples," who used to attend him, but also "a great multitude of people," a mixed multitude, "out of all Judaea and Jerusalem," though it was some scores of miles from Jerusalem to that part of Galilee where Christ now was; though at Jerusalem they had abundance of famous rabbins, that had great names, and bore a mighty sway, yet they came to hear Christ. They came also "from the sea coast of Tyre and Sidon;" though they who lived there were generally men of business, and though they bordered upon Canaanites, yet there were some well affected to Christ; such there were dispersed in all parts, here and there one.

1. "They came to hear him," and he preached to them. Those that have not good preaching near them, had better travel far for it than be without it. It is worth while to go a great way to hear the word of Christ, and to go out of the way of other business for it.

2. They came to be cured by him, and he healed them. Some were troubled in body, and some in mind; some had diseases, some had devils; but both the one and the other, upon their application to Christ, were healed; for he has power over diseases and devils, ver. 17, 18, over the effects and over the causes. Nay, it should seem, those that had no particular diseases to complain of, yet found it a great confirmation and renovation to their bodily health and vigour to partake of the virtue that went out of him; for, ver. 19, "the whole multitude sought to touch him," those that were in health as well as those that were sick; and they were all, one way or other, the better for him, he "healed them all." And who is there that doth not need, upon some account or other, to be healed? Note, There is a fullness of grace in Christ, and healing virtue in him, and ready to go out from him, that is enough for all, enough for each.

20 And he lifted up his eyes on his disciples, and said, Blessed be ye poor: for your's is the kingdom of God. 21 Blessed are ye that hunger now: for ye shall be filled. Blessed are ye that weep now: for ye shall laugh. 22 Blessed are ye, when men shall hate you, and when they shall separate you from their company, and shall reproach you, and cast out your name as evil, for the Son of man's sake. 23 Rejoice ye in that day, and leap for joy: for, behold, your reward is great in heaven: for in the like manner did their fathers unto the prophets. 24 But woe unto you that are rich! for ye have received your consolation. 25 Woe unto you that are full! for ye shall hunger. Woe unto you that laugh now! for ye shall mourn and weep. 26 Woe unto you, when all men shall speak well of you! for so did their fathers to the false prophets.

Here begins a practical discourse of Christ, which is continued to the end of the chapter, most of which is found in the sermon upon the mount, Mat. v. and vii. Some think this was preached at some other time and place; and there are other instances of Christ's preaching the same things, or to the same purpose, at different times; but it is probable that this is only the evangelist's abridgment of that sermon; and perhaps that in Matthew too is but an abridgment; the beginning and the conclusion is much the same; and the story of the cure of the centurion's servant follows presently upon it, both there and here; but it is not material. In these verses we have,

1. Blessings pronounced upon suffering saints, as happy people, though the world pities them, ver. 20. He "lift up his eyes upon his disciples," not only the twelve, but the whole company of them, ver. 17, and directed his discourse to them; for when he had healed the sick in the plain, he went up again to the mountain to preach; there he sat as one having authority, and thither they came to him, Mat. v. 1; and to them he directed his discourse, to them he applied it, and taught them to apply it to themselves. When he had laid it down for a truth, "Blessed are the poor in spirit," he added, "Blessed are ye poor." All believers that take the precepts of the Gospel to themselves, and live by them, may take the promises of the Gospel to themselves, and live upon them. And the application, as it is here, seems especially designed to encourage the disciples, with reference to the hardships and difficulties they were likely to meet with in following Christ.

First. You are poor, you have left all to follow me, are content to live upon alms with me, are never to expect any worldly preferment in my service; you must work hard and fare hard, as poor people do; but you are blessed in your poverty, it should be no prejudice at all to your happiness; nay, you are blessed for it; all your losses shall be abundantly made up to you, for "yours is the kingdom of God;" all the comforts and graces of his kingdom here, and all the glories and joys of his kingdom hereafter; yours it shall be, nay, yours it is. Christ's poor are rich in faith, Jas. ii. 5.

Secondly. You hunger now, ver. 21; you are not fed to the full, as others are; many times rise hungry, your commons are so short; or are so intent upon your work, that you have not time to eat bread, are glad of a few ears of corn for a meal's meat; thus you hunger now in this world, but in the other world you shall be filled, shall hunger no more, nor thirst any more.

Thirdly. You weep now, are often in tears, tears of repentance, tears of sympathy, you are of them that mourn in Zion. But blessed are ye; your present sorrows are no prejudices to, but preparatories for, your future joy; ye shall laugh. You have triumphs in reserve; you are but sowing in tears, and shall shortly reap in joy, Ps. cxxvi. 5, 6. They that now sorrow after a godly sort, are treasuring up comforts for themselves, or rather, God is treasuring up comforts for them; and the day is coming when their "mouth shall be filled with laughing, and their lips with rejoicing," Job viii. 21.

Fourthly. You now undergo the world's ill-will; you must expect all the base treatment that a spiteful world can give you, for Christ's sake, because you serve him and his interests; you must expect that wicked men will hate you, because your doctrine and life convicts and condemns them; and those that have church power in their hands will separate you, will force you to separate yourselves, and then excommunicate you for so doing, and lay you under the most ignominious censures; will pronounce anathemas against you, as scandalous and incorrigible offenders; and will do this with all possible gravity and solemnity, and the pomp and pageantry of appeals to Heaven, to make the world believe, and almost you yourselves too, that it is ratified in Heaven; thus will they endeavour to make you odious to others, and a terror to yourselves. This is supposed to be the proper notion of ἀπορίστων υἱῶν, they shall "cast you out of their synagogues." And they that have not this power, will not fail to shew their malice to the utmost of their power, for they shall reproach you, shall charge you with the blackest crimes, which you are perfectly innocent of, shall fasten upon you the blackest characters, which you do not deserve; they shall "cast out your name as evil," your name as Christians, as apostles, they shall do all they can to render these names odious. This is the application of the eighth beatitude, Mat. v. 10-12.

Such usage as this seems hard, but "blessed are ye" when ye are so used; it is so far from depriving you of your happiness, that it will greatly add to it; it is an honour to you, as it is to a brave hero to be employed in the wars, in the service of his prince, and therefore "rejoice ye in that day, and leap for joy," ver. 23. Do not only bear it, but triumph in it; for, 1. You are hereby highly dignified in the kingdom of grace, for you are treated as the prophets were before you, and therefore not only need not be ashamed of it, but may justly rejoice in it, for it will be an evidence for you that you walk in the same spirit, and in the same steps, are engaged in the same cause, and employed in the same service with them. 2. You will for this be abundantly recompensed in the kingdom of glory, not only your services for Christ, but your sufferings, will come into the account; "your reward is great in heaven." Venture upon your sufferings, in a full belief that the glory of heaven will abundantly countervail all these hardships; so that though you may be losers for Christ, you shall not be losers by him in the end.

II. Woes denounced against prospering sinners, as miserable people, though the world envies them. These we had not in Matthew: it should seem the best exposition of these woes, compared with the foregoing blessings, is the parable of the rich man and Lazarus; Lazarus had the blessedness of those that are poor, and hunger, and weep now, for in Abraham's bosom all the promises made to them who did so, were made good to him; but the rich man had the woes that follow here, as he had the character of those on whom these woes are entailed.

First. Here is a woe to them that are rich; that is, that trust in riches, that have abundance of this world's wealth, and instead of serving God with it, serve their lusts with it; woe to them, for "they have received their consolation," that which they placed their happiness in, and were willing to take up with for a portion, ver. 24. They in their lifetime received their good things, which in their account were the best things, and all the good things they are ever likely to receive from God. You that are rich are in temptation to set your heart upon a smiling world, and to say, Soul, take thine ease in the embraces of it; "this is my rest for ever, here will I dwell;" and "then woe unto you." 1. It is the folly of carnal worldlings that they make the things of this world their consolation, which were only intended for their convenience; they please themselves with them, pride themselves in them, and make them their heaven upon earth; and to them the consolations of God are small and of no account. 2. It is their misery that they are put off with them, as their consolation. Let them know it to their terror, when they are parted from these things, there is an end of all their comfort, a final end of it, and nothing remains to them but everlasting misery and torment.

Secondly. Here is a woe to them that are full, ver. 25; that are fed to the full, and "have more than heart could wish," Ps. lxxiii. 7, that have their "bellies filled with the hid treasures of this world," Ps. xvii. 14; that when they have abundance of these are full, and think they have enough, they need no more, they desire no more, Rev. iii. 17. "Now ye are full, now ye are rich," 1 Cor. iv. 8; they are full of themselves, without God and Christ; woe to such, for they shall hunger; they shall shortly be stripped and emptied of all those things they are so proud of; and when they shall have left behind them in the world all those things which are their fulness, they shall carry away with them such appetites and desires as the world they remove to will afford

vi. 1. The expression rendered "the second Sabbath after the first" is difficult, and not found elsewhere. The Greek literally means "the second first Sabbath." The Syriac version simply has "the Sabbath." The Philoxenian version is "the second Sabbath of the first," meaning probably "the second Sabbath of the first month," i.e., the second Sabbath of Nisan, the first month of the ecclesiastical year. Some think it was the first Sabbath of the month Nisan; others, that it was the first Sabbath after the second Passover; others, that it was the first Sabbath before the new moon of Nisan. There are other opinions, but these will show how completely the critics must have recourse to conjecture. On the whole, we prefer the sense conveyed by the Philoxenian version.

vi. 5. Alford says, "In one of our ancient authorities, the Cambridge MS., the following is the form of verse 5: 'On the same them no gratifications of; for all the delights of sense, which they are now so full of, will in hell be denied, and in heaven superseded.

Thirdly. Here is a woe to them that laugh now, that have always a disposition to be merry, and always something to make merry with; that know no other joy but that which is carnal and sensual, and know no other use of this world's goods, but purely to indulge that carnal, sensual joy; that banish sorrow, even godly sorrow, from their minds, and are always entertaining themselves with the laughter of the fool; woe unto such, for it is but now, for a little time, that they laugh, they shall mourn and weep shortly, shall mourn and weep eternally, in a world where there is nothing but weeping and wailing, endless, easeless, and remediless sorrow.

Fourthly. Here is a woe to them whom all men speak well of; that is, that make it their great and only care to gain the praise and applause of men, that value themselves by that, more than by the favour of God and his acceptance; ver. 26, "woe unto you;" that is, it would be a bad sign that you were not faithful to your trust, and to the souls of men, if you preached so as that nobody would be disgusted; for your business is to tell people of their faults, and if you do that as you ought, you will get that ill-will which never speaks well. The false prophets, indeed, that flattered your fathers in their wicked ways, that prophesied smooth things to them, were caressed and spoken well of; and if you be in like manner cried up, you will be justly suspected to deal deceitfully, as they did. We should desire to have the approbation of those that are wise and good, and not be indifferent what people say of us; but as we should despise the reproaches so we should also despise the praises of the fools in Israel.

27 But I say unto you which hear, Love your enemies, do good to them which hate you, 28 Bless them that curse you, and pray for them which despitefully use you. 29 And unto him that smiteth thee on the one cheek offer also the other; and him that taketh away thy cloke forbid not to take thy coat also. 30 Give to every man that asketh of thee; and of him that taketh away thy goods ask them not again. 31 And as ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise. 32 For if ye love them which love you, what thank have ye? for sinners also love those that love them. 33 And if ye do good to them which do good to you, what thank have ye? for sinners also do even the same. 34 And if ye lend to them of whom ye hope to receive, what thank have ye? for sinners also lend to sinners, to receive as much again. 35 But love ye your enemies, and do good, and lend, hoping for nothing again; and your reward shall be great, and ye shall be the children of the Highest: for he is kind unto the unthankful and to the evil. 36 Be ye therefore merciful, as your Father also is merciful.

These verses agree pretty much with Mat. v. 38, to the end of that chapter; "I say unto you which hear," ver. 27; to all you that hear, and not to disciples only, for these are lessons of universal concern; "He that has an ear to hear, let him hear." Those that diligently hearken to Christ shall find he has something to say to them well worth their hearing. Now the lessons Christ here teacheth us are,

First. That we must render to all their due, and be honest and just in all our dealings; ver. 31, "As ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise," for this is loving our neighbour as ourselves; what we would expect in reason to be done to us, either in justice or charity, by others, if they were in our condition, and we in theirs, that, as the matter stands, we must do to them. We must put our souls into their souls' stead, and then pity and succour them, as we would desire and justly expect to be ourselves pitied and succoured.

Secondly. That we must be free in giving to them that need; ver. 30, "Give to every man that asketh of thee," to every one that is a proper object of charity, that wants necessities, which thou hast wherewithal to supply out of thy superfluities. Give to those that are not able to help themselves, to those that have not relations in a capacity to help them. Christ would have his disciples ready to distribute, and willing to communicate to their power in ordinary cases, and beyond their power in extraordinary.

Thirdly. That we must be generous in forgiving those that have been any way injurious to us.

1. We must not be extreme in demanding our right, when it is denied us; "him that taketh away thy cloke," either forcibly or fraudulently, "forbid him not," by any violent means, "to take thy coat also," ver. 29; let him have that too, rather than fight for it; and ver. 30, "of him that taketh thy goods," so Dr. Hammond thinks it should be read, that borrows them, or that takes them up from thee upon trust, of such do not exact them; if Providence have made such insolvent, do not take the advantage of the law against them, but rather lose it than take them by the throat, Mat. xviii. 28. If a man run away in thy debt, and take away thy goods with him, do not perplex thyself, nor be incensed against him.

2. We must not be rigorous in revenging a wrong when it is done us; "unto him that smiteth thee on the one cheek," instead of bringing an action against him, or sending for a writ for him, or bringing him before a justice, "offer also the other;" that is, pass it by, though thereby thou shouldst be in danger of bringing upon thyself another like indignity, which is commonly pretended in excuse of taking the advantage of the law in such a case. If any one "smite thee on the cheek," rather than give another blow to him, be ready to receive another from him; that is, leave it to God to plead thy cause, and do thou sit down silent under the affront; and, when we do thus, God will "smite our enemies," as far as they are his, "upon the cheekbone," so as to "break the teeth of the ungodly," Ps. iii. 7; for he hath said, "Vengeance is mine," and he will make it appear that it is so, when we leave it to him to take vengeance.

3. Nay, we must "do good to them that do evil to us;" this is that which our Saviour in these verses chiefly designs to teach us, as a law peculiar to his religion, and a branch of the perfection of it.

1st. We must be kind to those from whom we have received injuries; we must not only love our enemies, and bear a good-will to them, but we must do good to them, be as ready to do any good office to them as to any other person, if their case call for it, and it be in the power of our hands to do it. We must study to make it appear by positive acts, if there be an opportunity for them, that we bear them no malice, nor seek revenge. Do they curse us, speak ill of us, and wish ill to us? Do they despitefully use us in word or deed? Do they endeavour to make us contemptible or odious? Let us bless them, and pray for them, speak well of them, the best we can, wish well to them, especially to their souls, and be intercessors with God for them. This is repeated, ver. 35, "Love ye your enemies, and do them good." To recommend this difficult duty to us, it is represented as a generous thing, and an attainment few arrive to.

To love those that love us has nothing uncommon in it, nothing peculiar to Christ's disciples, for sinners will love those that love them; there is nothing self-denying in that, it is but following nature, even in its corrupt state, and puts no force at all upon it, ver. 32; it is no thanks to us to love those that say and do just as we would have them. And, ver. 33, "if ye do good to them which do good to you," and return their kindnesses, it is from a common principle of custom, honour, and gratitude, and therefore "what thank have ye?" what credit are ye to the name of Christ, or what reputation do you bring to it? for "sinners also," that know nothing of Christ and his doctrine, "do even the same." But it becomes you to do something more excellent and eminent, herein to outdo your neighbours, to do that which sinners will not do, and which no principle of theirs can pretend to reach to; you must render good for evil; not that any thanks is due to us, but then we are to our God for a name and a praise, and he will have the thanks.

2nd. We must be kind to those from whom we expect no manner of advantage; ver. 35, "lend, hoping for nothing again." It is meant of the rich lending to the poor a little money for their necessity, to buy daily bread for themselves and their families, or to keep them out of prison; in such a case we must lend, with a resolution not to demand interest for what we lend, as we may most justly from those that borrow money to make purchases with, or to trade with; but that is not all; we must lend, though we have reason to suspect that what we lend we lose. Lend to those that are so poor that it is not probable they will be able to pay us again. This precept will be best illustrated by that law of Moses, Deu. xv. 7-10, which obliges them to lend to a poor brother as much as he needed, though the year of release was at hand. Here are two motives to this generous charity.

First. It will redound to our profit, for our reward shall be great, ver. 35; what is given, or laid out, or lent and lost on earth, from a true principle of charity, it will be made up to us in the other world, unspcakably to our advantage; you shall not only be repaid, but rewarded, greatly rewarded; it will be said to you, "Come, ye blessed, inherit the kingdom."
